I say that when the minister announced unilaterally he was withdrawing the bill because he did not have the cooperation of Conservatives, he made a move at that time which was not likely to help national unity. There again, papers, and certain Liberals, small liberals on the other side, accused the Conservatives of being anti-French Canadian because four amendments had been introduced at the report stage to have the minister explain what would be the gold value of the two coins. There were also other amendments which were extremely useful to an understanding of the bill. They were also useful to protect Canadian consumers because Canadian consumers are the ones who will be buying those two gold coins, and they have a right to know in advance what will be the gold content, as Senator Buckwold said to the sponsor of the bill this afternoon. Those are questions we of the Opposition are entitled to ask from the other place. But we were told that the Conservatives were against the Olympics, that they wanted to kill that bill. As early as the next day we were receiving telephone calls from the mayor of Montreal and the Quebec Minister of Industry telling us that they would be losing between $25 and $30 million if the bill was not passed.

I feel that the manner in which the minister wanted to have this bill passed in the house amounted to nothing short of blackmail. Yet, without wanting to withdraw the bill, the minister could have immediately used his majority, as is done in democracy; he could have put the bill to a vote in the house, the principle of democracy would have come into play. That is what eventually happened. The amendments were defeated and the bill was passed.

There is another point I should like to raise.

When Senator Macdonald tells us it is a Canadian project, he is perfectly right. If it is, that means all parliamentarians from anywhere in Canada—Ontario, Manitoba, British Columbia or the Maritimes—have the right to discuss the legislation coming before the House of Commons or the Senate. I do not think anybody can deny that Quebec is still part of Canada, and if a Canadian law that affects that province more particularly is introduced in the Canadian Parliament, a member of Parliament from Vancouver—or a senator from Vancouver or Nova Scotia—has the right to rise, ask questions or move amendments if he wants to improve the bill.

I resent our being called anti-French Canadian in the newspapers because we Conservatives, through amendments proposed in the other place, wanted to get information to protect consumers who will be asked to buy the coins.

Senator Macdonald said earlier, with much good sense and logic, that it is a Canadian project; and the federal government, in my opinion, has no right letting Montreal and Quebec taxpayers pay for the deficit that could reach $300 million after the Olympic Games.

I am glad one of our brilliant senators, the senator from Sydney, raised that question. I think the position of the Canadian government should be reassessed even if at the beginning they said they would not be responsible for the deficit of the games. Although it is said that Montreal Mayor Drapeau and COJO went too far in their expenses, that they did not control them, that there was inadequate planning, Mayor Drapeau himself has an answer; he says it is because of inflation. If the government of the Province of Quebec did not exercise a tight enough control to keep tabs on COJO outlays, the federal government, even if no commitment was made to make up for any deficit, had agreed to provide legislation which would authorize revenue programs for the Olympic Games—and the federal government should have had somebody to exercise a control on its behalf. I do not understand and I will never understand how the federal government can be saying now that if, after the Olympic Games, there is a $300 million deficit, it will have to be paid for only by Montrealers and Quebecers in general.

As I said, Quebec still is a part of Canada, and the games are a Canadian venture, as Senator Macdonald said, and I dare hope our friends opposite who have influence on the government will manage to make it review and change the orientation of its position. Hopefully they will tell us in due time, to provide some sort of relief for Quebec taxpayers, that something will be done after the Olympic Games once the real deficit is known.

[Senator Macdonald.]

We are in favour of the Olympic Games. As Senator Macdonald said, the Conservative Party, the official Opposition here, is in favour of the Olympics. We would have liked to have games of a possibly smaller scope, games that might have been less expensive, but it appears now that we are heading for outlays that have been estimated at many millions of dollars. We must find a way out, because, as Senator Macdonald also said, the prestige of Canada must remain intact. And if it is to remain intact, the Canadian government has a duty and a responsibility to promise the Province of Quebec and Montreal that it will make up for part of the Olympic Games deficit.

[English]

● (1440)

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I am in full accord with this bill and I hope it receives the unanimous support of this house. My reason for making a few comments at this time is that I feel the record of this house should show that there is throughout Canada, particularly in those areas far removed from Montreal, a growing concern arising from the tremendous increases in the costs of the Olympics and by whom this staggering deficit is to be borne. I would not, in fairness to the region of Canada which I represent, want the impression to be left by the addresses we have just heard that there is a general feeling throughout Canada that these staggering deficits should be picked up by the Government of Canada, rather than by the City of Montreal and the Province of Quebec.

I quite appreciate, as do all senators, that during the period since the games were promoted inflation has resulted in very large, uncontrollable increases in many of the costs. While the Olympics are, as has rightly been said, a Canadian project of which it would be the hope of all of us that Canadians from one end of Canada to the other will be proud and enthusiastic, to be factual we must recognize that primarily the promotion of the Olympics in Canada did come from the City of Montreal, particularly its mayor, who has something of an international reputation for going out after large ventures. In fairness to him, he has quite a record of success in what he goes after.

Initially we were told that the cost of the Olympics would be in the neighbourhood of $300 million. There was no great protest and, generally, satisfaction was expressed with that figure. It was a large amount of money, especially in these times, when there are demands for public funds for many other things, but the figure did not cause a great deal of concern. The figures which have been more recently released indicate that the total cost will now be in the vicinity of three-quarters of a billion dollars, two-and-one-half times the figure presented to the Canadian people when they were asked to get behind the Olympic Games as a desirable Canadian project.

We must remember that the great bulk of this money is going into the construction of physical facilities. These facilities are of little or no value whatever to any Canadian citizens outside the area in which they are located.

Certainly, in my region of Canada I do not suppose there will be one in 10,000 who will ever see the Olympic facilities, or reap any benefit from the fact that they have been provided. In a day when we are being told that we cannot do this and cannot do that on behalf of people who have need for things to be done, because of the shortage of funds, it is hard to explain to the people of this country how we can spend three-quarters of a billion dollars on something which is regional by its very nature. This is not criticism of Montreal or the province of Quebec. The simple fact is that since these facilities will be constructed in one region, obviously they will not be of much practical interest or value to people living two or three thousand miles away.

Senator Flynn: That is true also of every other work completed in the country.

Senator Manning: We must remember that this is the second of these projects which have been constructed in the last few years. Expo 67 was a tremendous success, of which we were, as Canadians, very proud. But its facilities also were concentrated in Montreal, representing millions of dollars of investment in public facilities which have been of little or no value to other citizens of Canada.

I am in favour of the Olympic Games and hope this bill receives full approval. However, I would not wish the record of this house to not show that there are a great many citizens outside central Canada, far removed from these facilities who, as I have said, will reap no direct, or only very little indirect, benefit from them, and who will be deeply disturbed if there is a change in the policy of the Government of Canada, under which policy they have been assured that they will not be asked as taxpayers to pick up more of the cost of the Olympic Games than that to which the government has already made a commitment on the part of the Canadian people.

I wish the record to show that that is a concern in my part of Canada at least, and if we are genuinely concerned about the unity of this country this is not the kind of thing to be doing. I can assure you there will be a great storm of protest from some regions of this country if, after the people were assured that they would not be saddled with a deficit of this nature, it is now going to be passed on to people who will derive little or no benefit from the facilities to be provided.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I rise now only to make a few observations. Like Senator Manning, I do not wish the record to show that there was not a voice from the Western region of Canada which would agree, as I do, with the general sentiments of Senator Macdonald, namely, that while we may, as we do, regret the deficit, we may, as we do, regret any exaggerations that may have been made. Nevertheless, coming from Western Canada and the Prairies, I realize that much of what Senator Manning said is far too true. Out there it is easy to criticize when something is in Eastern Canada—easier, perhaps, for some to criticize if it is in Montreal and the province of Quebec.

Senator Langlois: Toronto used to be your target.

Senator Argue: However, I believe that in Western Canada we should take a broad point of view, a Canadian point of view, and we should be careful, if we criticize something in Montreal, that our criticism is not coloured by the fact that it is in Montreal. Would we be any happier if it were in Toronto?

Senator Langlois: No.

Senator Argue: I hope not. As a Canadian I am proud that the Olympics are coming to Canada. I am proud that they are to be held in Montreal, a part of this country. In a general way, as one from Western Canada, I wish to agree with the sentiments of Senator Macdonald. There have been many projects that have come to Western Canada that we would not have had were it not for support from other parts of the country, including Quebec and Ontario.

Senator Flynn: Syncrude.

● (1450)

Senator Argue: Those of us from Western Canada have resented over the years the fact that some people in Eastern Canada did not seem to understand us. But we have the Gardiner Dam and Diefenbaker Lake because Canadians in central Canada felt that, although they might not be money-making projects, they were good for the nation.

The Olympics may not be a money-making project; they may even be a losing project. But, in my opinion, they are good for Canada, and Canadians should stand behind them.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I would like to correct an impression left by Senator Argue.

I did not suggest that this issue had any specific relationship to the city of Montreal in the province of Quebec. I would say exactly the same thing had a project of this magnitude, with this kind of deficit, been built in Halifax, Toronto, Edmonton or Vancouver. The location has nothing to do with it, other than the fact that the facilities being constructed will be of no benefit to other areas of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, up until the last two or three minutes, I had no intention of commenting on the bill this afternoon. But I must congratulate the four senators who spoke before me on their truly Canadian attitude about the great project of the Montreal Olympic Games.

However, I have some criticisms to make about the speech of my honourable friend, Senator Asselin—

Senator Asselin: I knew it.

Senator Langlois: I do not blame him for having tried to dispel the effect of the bad publicity his party got last week following what happened then in the other place. I do not think, however, that he had any reason to talk of blackmail and threats this afternoon, because he has not been able—at least he did not submit any fact—to substantiate his allegation. I know the publicity in the newspapers was bad, that perhaps his party's attitude in the other place was misunderstood, but I do not think it is proper that members of this house should criticize the way parliamentarians in the other place behave.

Now, about the remarks—

Senator Flynn: We certainly have the right to criticize the stand taken by a minister.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Langlois: We have the right to criticize a political statement.

Senator Asselin: Yes, yes.

Senator Langlois: But, if my honourable friend has followed carefully the debate in the other place, he knows that the minister was not making a statement of government policy. He was speaking for himself only. He was not making a policy statement on behalf of the government.

Senator Flynn: He cannot speak for himself.

Senator Asselin: Come on, since when?

Senator Langlois: Come on, when he stated that the bill would be withdrawn, he was speaking for himself. That's what I read in Hansard. But, nevertheless, the rules of the house—

Senator Asselin: I rise on a point of order. A minister of the Crown cannot speak for himself; under the Cabinet solidarity principle, when a minister speaks, he speaks on behalf of the government.

Senator Flynn: Especially when he is the sponsor of a bill.

Senator Asselin: I am very surprised to hear Senator Langlois suggesting such things. A minister cannot speak for himself; when he speaks, a minister always speaks on behalf of the government.

Senator Langlois: First of all, honourable senators, I submit that this is not a point of order. It is merely a correction. I said simply that I had not said that the minister was right, but only that he had stated, when explaining his attitude as mover of the bill, that he was not expressing the political opinion of the government but solely his own as mover of the bill. I feel that no member of the Senate can criticize that attitude. Recently, at a meeting of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, we even modified our rules to allow an honourable senator to quote—not criticize, but quote—a statement made in the other place, solely when it concerned a matter of government policy. Can we go farther than that? No mention was made of criticism. It was merely a matter of quoting a statement. Our rules do not allow us to criticize such an attitude. However, I admit that my honourable friend could make such a distinction, could justify his remarks, but I doubt that we should, in the Senate, base our arguments concerning a bill on the attitude or behaviour of a member of the other place. Both houses are autonomous, and debates must not be pursued from one to the other and grow acrimonious. That is precisely what our rules would avoid by saying that a statement of policy made by a minister may be quoted.

However, I admit that my honourable friend could feel justified in wanting to dispel the bad publicity made about his party in that connection. But I am not prepared to say—I want to be fair to him—that the amendments suggested and explanations requested in the other place were not warranted.

I myself have a question to direct to the mover of the bill this afternoon. I would ask him to tell us—he may have mentioned it but unfortunately I was unable to follow all his speech yesterday—how the Canadian or foreign consumer will recognize the coin which has a higher gold content from the one which has less? Are there serial numbers that will allow him to identify the coin he is buying, whether it is one or the other of the two coins? When he buys from a chartered bank, I readily admit I do not doubt the honesty of those people, but to err is human and a bank employee could make an honest mistake and sell to a customer a coin that is worth less than the one he wants to buy. But I wonder if the customer will have a way of distinguishing, will he be able to determine in his mind what type of coin he is buying since one is worth more than the other? I would like the sponsor of the bill to give me an answer to that question. I think that warrants the opposition that took place in the other house. I do not want at all to criticize the attitude over there but I admit that the situation was not as bad and as reproachable as my honourable friend might have depicted it this afternoon.

Now I come to the speech by my honourable friend from Cape Breton, Senator Macdonald, who spoke like a genuine Canadian, and I commend him for that. Indeed, one never expects less than that on his part. He always talks in an excessively outspoken and honest fashion. He is recognized in this house as a great citizen of this country. I commend him for his attitude. Apparently he wanted to dispel what could be interpreted as a certain animosity against Montreal. Earlier I was somewhat surprised to hear my friend Senator Argue make reference to Toronto when he spoke about certain attitudes taken by Western Canadians but I had always believed that the main target of Western Canadians was not Montreal but Toronto. At least he did clear up that bad impression I had.

But I want to add this about the attitude taken by Senator Macdonald: people seem to forget that the Olympic Games are not taking place in Montreal only. Some will say that I take that attitude perhaps because I have a certain propensity for the sea. I think the most interesting part of the games will take place in Ontario, namely, Kingston, where the Olympic regattas will be held. I think those who decided to divide the Olympic Games between the two provinces wanted the games to be considered as a Canadian event, period, not a regional or provincial undertaking. Once again, I am quite pleased with the position taken by our colleague from Cape Breton.

● (1500)

As for Senator Manning, he took a similar position. I am especially happy about the correction he made following the statement of Senator Argue when he said: "I did not suggest that this issue had any specific relationship to the city of Montreal or to any other Canadian city." It is true. He spoke solely as a real Canadian without referring to regional preferences.

As for Senator Argue, I have also commented very briefly on his statement. I agree with him. I am convinced that the debate we held this afternoon will be beneficial and will put back the Olympic Games issue in its national context, in its Canadian context, because it is only in this context it must be considered.

But I should like also to say a few words about what has been said concerning the expected deficit. I do not fully share the enthusiasm of Mayor Drapeau, a man described as very enthusiastic and enterprising—in fact, I do not see how a man could be enterprising without being also enthusiastic and optimistic. The other day, appearing before the parliamentary commission of the Quebec National Assembly, he suggested that it might still be too soon to talk with any amount of certainty about a deficit for the Olympic Games. In this regard, he was partly supported by His Excellency Mr. Roger Rousseau, the COJO Chairman, who observed that COJO has only carried out an evaluation of the revenues to date, an evaluation which is far from being final; indeed, revenues could be considerably higher than expected, so that the deficit could be greatly reduced. Moreover, as Mayor Drapeau himself indicated, included in the deficit—that is, the excess of expenses over expected revenues—are expenses which are not necessarily operational expenses. Some capital investments, for instance, will remain at least in part in Montreal once the games are over. The Olympic Village will remain there too. If all these are considered as expenses, we could end up with an enormous deficit which would not be entirely a real deficit. I wish this position of Mayor Drapeau were taken into account, a position which can be summarized as follows: We want the deficit to be reduced to the minimum. Let us consider this with an open mind. Let us be optimistic. Let us find other sources of revenues. Let us show some imagination. I think we should consider the Games in that light and remain optimistic as regards the future, and have faith, while at the same time trying to devise new ways of creating and increasing revenues and thus reducing whatever deficit there may be.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I regret, but I cannot help replying to the last remarks of my good friend Senator Langlois.

Senator Langlois: I have not been that sharp.

Senator Flynn: No. But as usual, he has a way of interpreting the rules which would actually prevent us from debating here any problem we are required to debate. He just contended that we have no right to criticize the position of a member of the House of Commons, saying that the minister, in this case the Postmaster General, the sponsor of the bill before us, was merely expressing his own personal views and that accordingly we were to pay no attention to his statement and not to consider it as a statement of the government's position.

I shall first tell Senator Langlois that there is absolutely nothing in our present rules to prevent us from referring to the debates of the other place. If we are not doing it, it is just a matter of tradition.

Second, the proposed rules which will be submitted by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will, as a matter of fact, have the effect of allowing senators to discuss the position put forward by ministers in the other place, because indeed we in this place should be given the opportunity to discuss the government's positions. And those positions are indeed reflected in the statements made, and the positions held by its ministers. No minister, and especially no minister who sponsors a government bill, can ever contend that he speaks in his own name and that he is not committing the government. I entirely reject this assertion.

Third, I do say we can criticize. In the present case, the Postmaster General resorted to blackmail, not openly but in what I call a subtle way. This is a well known procedure to my friends of the Liberal party in Quebec. Because the Opposition held up the debate on this bill at the report stage for one sitting, for one day, they said: "Well, if you do not want to pass it, we withdraw it and you will be entirely responsible for the failure of the Olympic Games or for the increased deficit." This attitude was obviously aimed at blaming the Opposition, at stirring this mentality existing in Quebec, cultivated by our friends, this anti-Conservative mentality which makes Quebecers often feel persecuted when the Conservatives discuss a problem concerning them more particularly. The government said: "You see, they are against you." Well, it was against this attitude of the minister that my colleague Senator Asselin spoke. He had the right to do so. This attitude must be considered as the government's attitude, not only as the position of one of its ministers. The minister made a mistake. He did make amends later, but only because the Opposition made him understand that he went too far. I say it again, Senator Asselin's criticism is quite relevant in this regard.

I would also like to echo an idea put forward by Senator Macdonald. Perhaps because of the Expo 67 experiment, the federal government put itself in a far too rigid situation—when the problem of the 1976 Olympic Games arose—to escape the kind of criticisms mentioned by Senator Manning. The federal government said: "You will only be allowed to have some revenues through the lottery, the sale of silver Olympic coins and government services. Nothing else will be done. We shall not vouch for the deficit." It confined itself to a position that prevented it from having any control over expenses. Today, the expenses are here and the government has still no control over them. As Senator Macdonald said, the 1976 Olympic Games are not only for Montreal or Quebec but for all of Canada. Then, we should all share this responsibility. I suggest that the federal government revise its position, be less fearful than in the beginning and try to find answers to that deficit.

I must admit that I am not too enthusiastic about the financial result of the COJO operation or about the initiatives—exaggerated perhaps—of the mayor of Montreal and some other people. Still inflation is certainly responsible for the major part of these increases. Honourable senators, look at the increase in government spending since 1970. I am not sure that the increase in the total budget of the federal government for the last seven years is not proportional to the cost increase of the Olympic Games project. There might have been some exaggeration. These are not unpretentious games and I think that they might have been simpler. But keeping the initial project in mind, the increase is caused mostly by inflation and so it goes for the increase in government spending.

● (1510)

Senator Langlois: And work stoppages as well.

Senator Flynn: Strikes are certainly another factor. There have been some abuses, yes. But the main problem is the economic situation in general. The only important point I would like to be clear in the report is that the position of the Postmaster General was that of the government and that there was some legitimate reason to criticize it. I hope that those little faint-hearted games will not happen again. I for one, ever since I entered politics, have often been the victim of those little games in the province of Quebec and here in Parliament. I am fed up and I wish to make that clear.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators—

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Deschatelets speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Senator Deschatelets: First of all I wish to thank honourable senators who took part in this debate for their attitude towards the bill, an attitude which reveals their desire to ensure that the games remain on a wholly Canadian scale. I feel that this debate will have helped to clear up many misunderstandings. I also wish to thank them for the support they have vouched to give this bill on second reading.

At this point I should like to answer an extremely important question that was raised by Senator Langlois. It concerns the theoretical debate that was held in the Commons between the minister and the official Opposition about issuing two types of coins having different gold contents.

The only reply I can give here is that one must keep in mind that the gold coin program was set up after discussions with experts on the subject.

I have here, for instance, a document informing me that our country's most important coin collectors not only accepted but even requested that two coins be put on the market—one of which would have a greater gold content and be reserved mainly for coin collectors. Until the last minute, these experts agreed. As far as I am concerned, I must trust them when they state that gold coins will not cause among the public the confusion feared by some honourable senators or some members of the House of Commons.

In this connection, I would like to refer honourable senators to the statement made by Mr. Mackasey, which appears on page 7364 of the House of Commons Hansard of July 8 last, and which reads as follows:

First, may I say that the hon. member's point is a valid point. Earlier on, the hon. member said that the silver content is consistent and does not change. Would the hon. gentleman be satisfied if actually all the gold coin buyers around the world were assured of the precise quantity of gold in the coins and that it will not change in the issue, because the hon. member is making a valid point that people should know the quantity of gold at the time of the purchase? What I am suggesting is a compromise. We are quite prepared to state openly and officially before the coins go on sale the quantity of gold in the two different coins.

I also refer honourable senators to page 7366 of Hansard of the same date, to another statement made by Mr. Mackasey which reads as follows:

In answer to the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) I repeated that I am quite prepared to state consistently the amount of gold in the two coins. The problem is this: precisely when do we know the price at which we buy gold? That is the reason I need flexibility until we buy that gold.

Would the hon. member accept the statement that the amount of gold in the coins would be clearly spelled out before they are put on sale, the moment we have firmly established the price of the gold that goes into the coins?

In other words, I think, honourable senators, we should trust the minister in this very specialized area, and if you are interested I can give you here the differences, at least in appearance, between the two coins.

For instance, in the diameter of the coins, the 14-carat coin, which is the one containing a quarter ounce of gold, is 1.1 inches while the 22-carat coin is 1 inch in diameter.

As for the thickness, the 14-carat coin will be .67 inch while the 22-carat coin will be .75 inch.

As for the finish, the 14-carat coin will be less shiny, while the other coin will receive a more elaborate finish which means the design stands out more clearly.

There will be another difference: the coin containing a quarter ounce of gold will have little dots all around the rim, the same as on a penny piece; the other coin will not feature such dots.

I think we can trust the statements which have been made not only by the minister, for in this area I happen to have more confidence in experts than in ministers, this being a highly specialized field, and I remind you this program is the result of consultations. Let us hope it will be as successful as we wish it to be.

Now, honourable senators, during my comments I raised the question as to whether or not the bill should be referred to a committee. Because it is agreed there may be a deficit or a gap between revenues and expenses since the gold coin program will not cost the federal government a penny—I do not personally think it would be advisable to refer the bill to committee.

I am at your disposal, honourable senators, and if some of you believe this would be advisable, then I shall move accordingly. May I have an idea of your opinions?

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Deschatelets moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Carter for second reading of Bill S-28, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, yesterday in his introduction Senator Carter gave a very interesting history of different organizations that had merged to form what is now known as the Royal Canadian Legion. There was one organization that existed here on Parliament Hill following World War I, and that was the Association of World War I Veterans in Parliament. Its membership included such people as the late Senator Brooks, a former government leader in this chamber; Senator Macdonald, who was later Lieutenant Governor of Ontario; and Senator White, a former Speaker of this chamber. Moreover, I believe we still have in this chamber one member of that organization.

● (1520)

Immediately following World War II the Royal Canadian Legion, taking advantage of the experience learned in re-establishing veterans after World War I, began to draw up its own Veterans Charter. As Senator Carter indicated, many of its suggestions were accepted and became law. However, the Legion's work did not cease in the immediate post-war years. Since 1945 the Legion has always been most active in presenting to the government suggestions for improving veterans legislation.

One branch of the Legion which I often visit claims that it was the first branch to propose the war veterans allowance program, and that that program was approved by the other branches, then by the provincial command and the Dominion command, which in turn presented it to the federal government, at which point the proposal was accepted and became law. That program has been of great benefit to a good many Canadian veterans.

Senator Carter yesterday referred to the fact that the Legion has assisted in youth programs, and while we were debating the Olympic coin bill I thought that perhaps many of the youngsters representing Canada in the Olympics probably received their first professional training through programs initiated by the Royal Canadian Legion. I might add that the branches of the Legion did this without trying to sell any product on television, or anything of that nature. They did it because they were interested in youth.

Bill S-28 is referred to in some Legion circles as the winding-up bill. That does not mean that the Legion is going out of existence. Far from it. However, it does face a problem due to the age of its members. The average World War I veteran is now 81 years of age. The average World War II veteran is now 61 years of age. The executive council of the Legion has recognized that problem, and has had for some time a legislative committee working on it. In the near future a great many small branches will have to close because the membership will drop below the minimum allowed.

The legislative committee has worked for many years, and has spent a great deal of time drafting the proposed amendments to the act. I may question one or two of the amendments, but I would not wish to detract from the excellent work the committee has done.

In my opinion subclause (2) of clause 4 of the bill is rather negative. It states:

Upon the winding up or dissolution of any branch, the property of that branch shall not be distributed to or for the benefit of the members thereof.

But it gives no direction as to where the funds should go. It is my understanding that the funds will, by Legion by-laws, be placed in trust for a period of years until it is felt that there is no longer any hope of revitalizing the particular branch, and that then the moneys will pass to the provincial command. I am certain that may cause much bitterness in many of the smaller branches, which feel that they have worked hard to pay off the mortgages on their Legion homes and, consequently, should have more direction in respect of leaving those funds in their community. They may wish to leave the funds for scholarship purposes or something of that nature.

Incidentally, honourable senators, you might be interested to know that the Legion gives out a great many scholarships each year. In any event, I can just hear a great many Legion members saying that the provincial command has no right to take their money.

Clause 5(2) introduces a new aspect in the legislation, and that is that a branch wishing to mortgage its property or lease its property must receive approval in writing from the provincial command. Here again I feel that there may be a great many complaints at the so-called grass roots level. Obviously, if a particular branch wishes to lease its building it will take the attitude that its members have paid for the building and it is theirs, and why should they have to request approval from someone else.

Furthermore, many branches are now acquiring property, shorefront property or lakefront property, for use by their members and their families. In order to acquire that property they often mortgage their buildings. I would not wish to be a member of a provincial executive which refused a branch permission to mortgage its property so that it could enter into an activity of that nature. Quite often the branch that possesses a mortgage is the most active, because its members feel they must work to pay off that mortgage. Indeed, I have often noticed that once a Legion branch burns its mortgage the interest in the branch deteriorates.

It is my understanding, honourable senators, that this bill, by our rules, must go to a committee, and that there will be representatives of the Legion appearing before that committee. I am sure you will find them quite willing and able to answer any questions you might wish to ask.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Carter speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Phillips for his constructive contribution to this debate. I was particularly impressed by his allusion to the debate on the Olympic coins, and the likelihood that many of the athletes participating in the Olympics next year would probably have received their initial training through programs initiated by the Royal Canadian Legion. He drew attention to the connection between the Olympic Games and the Royal Canadian Legion sports training program because, as he said, many of the Canadian contestants in the games will no doubt have benefited directly from that program. I think it is very useful to have that point on the record.

● (1530)

Senator Phillips raised several other very valid points, and I do not pretend that I can deal with them adequately at this time. This bill must go to a committee, and I plan to move that it be referred to a committee as soon as it is given second reading.

With respect to clause 4(2), which, as he said, is couched in negative terms, it merely prohibits any of the property of the branch being distributed to or for the benefit of the members. The principle is that when a branch is wound up the members should not be permitted to dispose of the property and divide it among themselves. Actually it is the property of the branch, and really the property of the previous members. The branch may have had 100 members, and then seen that membership dwindle down to 10 to 12, or insufficient to carry it on. It is not fair that those 10 or 12 should then divide the proceeds among themselves, when they really belong to a much larger group.

The other point is with respect to branches obtaining permission from the provincial command to dispose of their property. There are two reasons for this. One is to exercise some control over branches to ensure that they will not become overburdened with debt which they are not able to handle. The second concerns the qualification that the branch must get permission "except in the ordinary and usual course of its activities." I made inquiries as to what that phrase meant, and I was told that it would depend on the by-laws of the particular branch. All by-laws of provincial commands are governed by the by-laws of Dominion command—which is the Dominion convention, the ultimate authority. Similarly, branch by-laws must conform to the provincial command by-laws. Within that framework there is some latitude for variation. It does not necessarily mean that every branch would have to get permission. It would vary with the by-laws.

The general purpose of the bill is to provide an orderly way of winding up the affairs of a branch or a command when it can no longer exist, and to provide for the ordinary disposal of the assets or property of such a branch or command. I think that covers the point raised by Senator Phillips.

I realize my answers are far from adequate, but a much more detailed explanation can be received when we consider the bill in committee.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Carter a question? Have all the provincial branches agreed to this bill?

Senator Carter: Yes. These amendments were all approved at the last Dominion convention of the Royal Canadian Legion. That convention was made up of delegates from all branches in the country. So the amendments have been approved by representatives of all the branches that comprise the Canadian Legion.

Senator Grosart: Have they been approved specifically by the branches? In other words, has a draft of this bill been sent to each branch, and has each branch replied that it approved?

Senator Carter: I cannot really say that. If you are asking whether, after the Dominion command approved it, they sent it back to the branches for approval, I can say I inquired about that and was told that that was unnecessary because, they said, the branches represented at the convention gave approval, and under the act the Dominion command is the ultimate authority and so referral back to branches was not necessary.

Senator Grosart: It would be necessary, obviously, if any branch disagreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Carter moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move, seconded by Senator Laird, that rule 95, whereby a private bill originating in the Senate shall not be considered until after one week from the date of referral, be suspended with respect to Bill S-28, intituled: "An act respecting the Royal Canadian Legion".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Senator Grosart: No.

Senator Flynn: I think leave is being asked at this time to suspend rule 45, and not rule 95. When the motion is put, it will be up to the Senate to decide whether it is willing to suspend rule 95, which is something different. I think the question now concerns rule 45. I would grant leave to suspend rule 45, but not yet to suspend rule 95.

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion refers to rule 95.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

The Hon. the Speaker: The first question is whether the Senate is granting leave for the presentation of this motion at this time.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Carter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laird, that rule 95, whereby a private bill originating in the Senate cannot be considered by a committee until after one week from the date of referral, be suspended in relation to Bill S-28, intituled an act respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Grosart: No. Honourable senators, the difficulty here is that under our rules the motion itself appears to be out of order. Rule 88 says:

A motion for the suspension of the rule upon any petition for a private bill—

And this is a motion on a petition for a private bill—

—shall not be in order, unless such suspension has been recommended by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

● (1540)

So far as I know there has been no indication to the Senate that such recommendation has been received from that committee. Perhaps the mover of the motion will comment on that.

Senator Carter: I realize that Senator Grosart is an expert on the rules, and I certainly am not. I sought advice on this matter, and the only advice I was given was that the rules required that the consideration of this bill, which is a private bill originating in the Senate, by a committee be deferred for one week after referral. In other words, the committee could not meet until the expiry of a week after the bill had been referred to it. I have made other inquiries, and was told that there are precedents for this. There have been occasions when rule 95 has been suspended.

I would plead with honourable senators to give serious consideration to this, because there is a time factor involved in the passage of this bill. The fact that this bill is presented to the Senate at such a late date is not the fault of the Royal Canadian Legion. Their petition was presented to our Law Clerk's office on November 15, 1974. That is many months ago. As late as March I was in touch with the office of the Law Clerk, trying to get this matter expedited, but the illness of the Law Clerk and the extra work that has been placed on his assistant have made it impossible to have the bill prepared until now. If the committee is not permitted to consider it until after a week has passed then probably it will not consider it until after Parliament reassembles in October. If Parliament reassembles about the middle of October, we shall probably need a week to get the committee together, and it is very likely that another week will pass before we can send the bill to the other place.

Senator Flynn: The question is not whether you are right in what you are saying, but whether the Senate can suspend rule 88, which is formal. It seems to me that it cannot, if the rule applies at this stage. That is the only point that is being debated at this time. What you are saying now may be applicable to the substance of the motion, but the point of order raised by Senator Grosart is only as to whether, under rule 88, we can give you leave to suspend rule 95.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I could add, so that Senator Carter will not be too frustrated in the matter, that I have every sympathy with the substance of the bill and with his desire to get it through. I must say, however, that I am shocked to be told that a petition was presented to the officials of the Senate on November 15, 1974, and that the bill does not come before us until Parliament is about to recess for the following summer. I would certainly commend to the Leader of the Government that this be looked into.

The reasons given do not make one bit of sense to me. There has been sickness, and there has been work, but to say that, knowing these rules and knowing the problem here, the officials of this chamber could not get this petition to us before now is simply unacceptable.

Senator Flynn: It is not the responsibility of the leader.

Senator Grosart: I am not saying whose responsibility it is, but I would suggest that the responsibility of the leader in the matter as it now stands, since he is concerned with the efficiency of the operations of the Senate, is to find out why this has happened.

Having said that, I must also say that I am very sympathetic with Senator Carter's desire to get this bill through, and I would like to point out that there is a very easy way out for him. Rule 88, if I am right, says that unless such suspension has been recommended by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, the suspension cannot be granted.

It may be thought that I am being too strict in my interpretation of our rules, but this happens to be a very important rule. Its purpose is to prevent a private bill going through the Senate while someone who may be affected by it does not know what is happening. That is why I asked the question about the branches. The answer given was generally satisfactory. On the other hand, Senator Phillips has suggested that there may be branches—that is, there may be persons—affected by this bill who may not agree with some of the amendments. He suggested that they be given the opportunity to come before the committee.

That is really another matter. That is a matter for the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to decide. I therefore suggest that, because of the importance of maintaining this rule of deferring a private bill for one week, Senator Carter might now wish to ask that the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders be called—which can be done at almost any time—and, if that committee agrees, then rule 88 would not be an obstruction to consideration of the bill by committee in less than a week.

Senator Langlois: In speaking to this point of order, I might be accused of interpreting rule 88 too restrictively, but I doubt that rule 88 applies to the present situation. It reads as follows:

A motion for the suspension of the rules upon any petition for a private bill shall not be in order, unless such suspension has been recommended by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

We are now past the petition stage, and are on second reading of the bill.

Senator Grosart: The petition is still before us.

Senator Langlois: The bill is before us, not the petition.

Senator Grosart: The petition is before us.

Senator Langlois: If my honourable friends refer to rule 87, they will see that the examiner of the petition has to report to the Rules Committee. This will explain why we have rule 88, which says that we cannot suspend this examination by the Rules Committee without that committee's permission. I think that is the correct way to interpret rule 88. I have a serious doubt about my friend's interpretation of rule 88. I am inclined to believe that rule 88 does not apply to the present situation.

Senator Grosart: This may be so. We are, however, just dealing with words.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Langlois: This is a bill that we have before us, not a petition.

Senator Grosart: But we are dealing with a petition that has now been introduced as a bill.

Senator Langlois: We are past the petition stage. We are dealing with the bill itself.

Senator Grosart: Let us not argue that. It can be taken both ways. I suggest the easy way out, in order to resolve the problem, is to have the Committee on Rules and Orders called to give this specific permission.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I say a word? I came to exactly the same conclusion as Senator Langlois. I do not think we should be establishing a precedent here. I am no expert on the rules, but it is obvious to me that rule 88 applies only to the petition stage, which we have now passed. We are now on the bill, and rule 88 does not apply.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, I would like to suggest another way out, since the Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Government have expressed sympathy with the plight of this bill. I suggest that rule 3 is applicable. It reads as follows:

Any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended, and the reason for the proposed suspension, being distinctly stated.

That makes it subject to a condition, namely, that the reason be stated. That condition, I submit, has been fulfilled.

Senator Grosart: As much as I would like to agree with Senator Laird, I think that is not a proper interpretation, because the issue before us is as to whether the motion to suspend the rule is in order. This is an entirely different thing.

Rule 3, I am quite sure, does not apply here. Rule 3 provides that if a motion is made for leave, leave can be given. However, rule 88, if it applies—and I suggest that it does, for a reason which I will indicate in a moment—provides that the motion cannot be made. The motion cannot be made, therefore rule 3 could not cover it.

• (1550)

The reason I suggest that rule 88 does cover this is that after some discussion in the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders I made inquiries—I am sorry that I cannot quote at the moment any authorities—and was told that this rule is specifically worded in this manner in order to protect rule 95. It may be, or it may not, that it is to protect those who might be affected by a private bill from the conditions of rule 95, which is for their protection, being waived by leave. This may be so. I can only say that, having raised the point of order, and if it is not the wish of the Senate to have a ruling on it, the simple way out might be for the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to discuss the matter.

I will say no more. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the bill, and am anxious to see it referred to committee. Presumably, if it did go to committee immediately, those branches which might be interested, and to which Senator Phillips has referred, could be called. I wish to make it clear that I am, only raising the point that if this rule applies it should be followed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure there is general sympathy in this chamber with the desire of the Royal Canadian Legion, an organization which we all respect, to have this matter expedited. In my opinion, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has certainly made a valid point by questioning why it has taken this length of time for the bill to be brought before us. I wonder whether it might not be in the best interests of all to have an interpretation from the Chair as to this particular point raised by the honourable senator. Such a ruling may make it unnecessary to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, rule 88 deals with a petition, whereas rule 95 refers to a bill. With respect to Bill S-28, the petition was read yesterday, and the report of the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills was laid on the Table. It states that the Rules of the Senate were complied with by the petitioners. Then the bill was presented and read a first time. The Honourable Senator Carter's motion is for the suspension of rule 95, which provides for one week's delay before a private bill can be considered by a committee.

The Honourable Senator Carter obtained leave of the Senate to move his motion for the suspension of rule 95, by authority of rule 3, which reads as follows:

Any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended, and the reason for the proposed suspension, being distinctly stated.

The Honourable Senator Carter then moved his motion and the question was put. However, if honourable senators wish to comment further, I will hear them and reserve my decision until later. If not, I rule that the Honourable Senator Carter's motion which was moved, with leave, pursuant to rule 3, is in order.

I therefore put the question again.

Senator Flynn: The question has been put.

Senator Langlois: We were on the merits.

Senator Flynn: Her Honour the Speaker has made a ruling on the substance of the motion, and I do not believe anyone feels like appealing it. We had some doubts and wished to clarify the situation.

However, on the merits I would like Senator Carter to assure me that he will take the necessary precautions to have all those interested notified of the meeting of the committee. I also wish him to acknowledge this responsibility to the Senate, because after all, when we give him leave to proceed tomorrow rather than a week from now we may be affecting the rights of individuals. It is his responsibility to assure us that no harm will result from the leave he seeks, and we would grant it on that condition.

Senator Carter: I will give my honourable friend as much assurance as I can. I am not sure how much assurance he requires. If he is asking that I assure him that every branch in Canada will be notified, I cannot give him that assurance. However, I can assure him that all the officials interested in this bill will be notified.

Senator Flynn: Are you satisfied that we would not be taking an undue risk in doing that?

Senator Carter: I can give you that assurance now. We all have laws and rules with which we do not agree, but we abide by them. Even if branches such as those mentioned by Senator Phillips do not agree with these amendments, I must point out once more that the amendments have been approved by the Dominion convention, at which all the branches were represented and concurred. There is, therefore, no point in referring them back to someone who might disagree with them. The power of the Dominion convention in matters such as this is ultimate, and no branch can do very much about it except obey the rules which have been agreed upon by the majority.

Senator Grosart: I am sure the honourable senator has attended conferences at which all present did not agree with the decision of the majority. However, I am not raising that point.

Senator Perrault: We do not always agree in this chamber.

Motion agreed to.

PETRO-CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cook, seconded by the Honourable Senator Paterson, for the second reading of the Bill C-8, intituled: "An Act to establish a national petroleum company".—(Honourable Senator Grosart)

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wish to stand this order until the next sitting of the Senate. I am prepared to go ahead, and wish to assure the Leader of the Government that I have no intention of delaying the discussion of this bill. I have some comments to make on it but, as I expect I may be called upon to say something on another motion today, I feel that at this moment perhaps discretion is the better part of valour.

Order stands.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, (NO. 3)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the second reading of Bill C-67, to amend the Customs Tariff, (No. 3).

He said: Honourable senators, this bill has reached us sooner than I think we anticipated. It was passed last night in the other place and, with leave, we have agreed to proceed with it today.

The bill we are now looking at will implement the Customs Tariff changes contained in the notice of ways and means motion which was tabled in the House of Commons on budget night, June 23. The Minister of Finance said in his budget speech that, because of the multilateral trade negotiations now in progress in Geneva, many requests for tariff changes will have to be considered in the course of these negotiations. He did, however, propose about a score of tariff reductions to come into effect on June 24.

One measure which I think is of considerable and widespread interest is the liberalization of the so-called gift item. In the course of preparation of the budget, the minister received a number of representations requesting an increase in the $10 limit on gifts which could be sent by persons abroad to friends in Canada, or brought into Canada by non-residents as gifts to friends, without payment of duties and taxes. More important, however, were the representations objecting to the requirement that duty and taxes be paid on the full value of gifts when the value exceeded the $10 limit, even by a small amount. In response to those representations, it is proposed by this bill to raise the present valuation limit on gifts from $10 to $15. In the event that the value of the gift exceeds the new limit of $15, duty and taxes will be assessed only on the amount in excess of this limit.

● (1600)

This may not seem to be a large increase, but it is an item that can be subject to some fraud. I might point out that the similar limit in the United States tariff is still $10.

Continuation of the temporary duty-free entry provisions for aircraft and aircraft engines, one of the more important items in the appendix to the bill, and for certain petroleum products, is also proposed. Free entry for petroleum products such as gasoline, fuel oils, aviation and diesel fuels, for which free entry would have expired on October 23, 1975, will be extended until June 30, 1977. Aircraft and aircraft engines of types or sizes not made in Canada will be allowed duty-free entry for a further year until June 30, 1976.

Customs duties are being eliminated in respect of a number of other products, either by the introduction of new tariff items or by the amendment of existing items. I know that honourable senators from some agricultural constituencies will have noted that duty-free entry is being provided for air conditioners for installation in combines. Also, in response to numerous representations, duty-free entry is being proposed for liturgical and certain other printed music, and for hymn books.

As honourable senators are aware, we are generally obliged to go back and look at the original first reading text of a bill as presented in the House of Commons for any explanatory notes. Such explanatory notes are of particular value in respect of this particular bill. I note that honourable senators and I have just now received the third reading text! It is without amendment, and appears to be exactly the same as the first reading text, which is also in our desks.

Unlike last year, the third reading text, to my gratification, does include an annex or schedule which reproduces, item-by-item, the individual items that are affected by the proposed changes in the last budget. Without this representation, or additional presentation, of the ways and means budget details, it is very difficult, having only a third reading text—as was the situation last November—for honourable senators to debate and consider here or in committee a budget bill. However, I am gratified that this time—and I think perhaps it is due to the complaints voiced in the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and in this chamber last year—the third reading text of this bill does contain a schedule with a copy of the details as presented in the ways and means budget resolutions.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the Senate.

Senator Choquette: Before the Senate adjourns, might I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he has any information at all as to whether we will be able to adjourn for the summer on Friday? We seem to be going through a great deal of legislation rather rapidly, and I am sure we would all give a helping hand if we had that assurance. Can the Deputy Leader of the Government give us that assurance?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I can inform you that before the Senate assembled this afternoon I had a discussion with the Leader of the Opposition, and he is just as much in the dark as I am as to when we will be able to adjourn for the summer.

Senator Grosart: That is unusual.

Senator Langlois: Hopefully, we will get the remainder of the legislation which is on the priority list of the government before the end of the week. That may mean that we will have to sit on Friday and Saturday in order to finish this week, in which case the other place would have to agree to sit on Saturday.

In our discussion at noon today, the Leader of the Opposition and I agreed that before the doors of the Senate are opened for tomorrow's sitting we will have a free discussion on this subject, at which time we might perhaps be able to make a decision in the light of events as they will be known to us then.

Senator Grosart: Does the Deputy Leader of the Government have information that we will have the necessary facts from the other place?

Senator Langlois: I said "hopefully." I cannot go any further than that.

Senator Grosart: Hope springs eternal in the human breast.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 17, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that Bill C-70, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act, had been referred to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra) had been substituted for that of Mr. Dinsdale on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Stewart (Cochrane) had been substituted for that of Mr. Corbin, and that the name of Mr. Saltsman had been substituted for that of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Army Benevolent Fund Board, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 13 of the Army Benevolent Fund Act, Chapter A-16, R.S.C., 1970.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Senator Buckwold, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, tabled its fourth report as follows:

Wednesday, July 16, 1975.

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service has the honour to present its fourth report as follows:

Pursuant to the Order of Reference of the House of Commons of Tuesday, July 15, 1975, the committee has examined Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act" and has agreed to report it without amendment.

A copy of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence relating to this bill (Issue No. 41) is appended.

Respectfully submitted.

Sidney L. Buckwold,
Joint Chairman.

OLYMPIC (1976) ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Macnaughton, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-63, to amend the Olympic (1976) Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Deschatelets: With leave, I move third reading of the bill now.

Senator Flynn: Is there any special reason for moving third reading now?

Senator Deschatelets: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Flynn: If it will start the processing of the minting of the gold coins, I will give leave.

Senator Perrault: All that glitters is not gold.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Carter, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-28, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Senator Flynn: It is, of course, very difficult to treat this bill otherwise than we treated the previous one, but I should like to have put on record that the reason for giving leave at this time is so that the bill can go to the other place and any omission on our part can be corrected.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to take a minute of your time to express my thanks and appreciation to all senators, with a special word of thanks to Senator Flynn and our friends in the loyal Opposition, for their assistance and cooperation in expediting the passage of this bill.

I should also like to take advantage of this opportunity to correct a statement I made yesterday, which is to be found at page 1207 of Hansard. At that time I said:

The fact that this bill is presented to the Senate at such a late date is not the fault of the Royal Canadian Legion. Their petition was presented to our Law Clerk's office on November 15, 1974.

I find that the reference to that date is not completely accurate. The petition was signed on November 15. What was presented to the Law Clerk's office on that date was a preliminary draft of the amendments, which was presented to the Law Clerk for his comments, which he gave at that time. The amendments were then advertised, in accordance with rule 86, and the petition was actually filed with the Senate on May 28, 1975, not on November 15, 1974, as I stated yesterday.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

● (1410)

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-50, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Greene: With leave, now.

Senator Flynn: Is there any good reason?

[Senator Carter.]

Senator Greene: I might point out to my honourable friends opposite that Senator Macdonald, in his very helpful and constructive speech on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition on second reading of this bill, indicated—and I believe he was speaking for his party—that they were willing to pass it without its going to committee, which meant it would have been passed yesterday. On this side we felt that it would only be right that the bill go to committee, to give the Opposition and anyone else who wished to have a say an opportunity to examine the bill in further detail. The committee met yesterday. Her Majesty's loyal Opposition was ably represented there by Senator Haig. It seems to me that in keeping with the spirit of Senator Macdonald's speech on second reading, Her Majesty's loyal Opposition indicated they wished the bill passed as summarily as possible. That is why I am taking the opportunity of asking leave at this time, so that it might be passed now, in accordance with what was requested by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition on second reading, as well as the wish on this side.

Senator Flynn: I am in a good mood today; leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AGRICULTURE

CROP INSURANCE PROGRAMS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, some time ago the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture undertook a study of crop insurance programs. This study is still going on, but in order to keep the Senate informed and in order to make possible some interim recommendations, I have the honour to present, in English and in French, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on crop insurance programs. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix A, pp. 1227-1229.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Argue moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Quart be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator MacDonald on the list of senators serving on the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, at this stage I should like to inform the Senate that later on I will seek leave to revert to Notices of Motions in order to move the adjournment motion after due consideration has been given to the exchanges which took place between the leaders of this house before the doors were opened this afternoon. I hope to receive further information from the other place with respect to the possibility of adjourning this session next week.

SMALL FARMS DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

NUMBER OF LOANS APPROVED FOR PROVINCES—COMMENT ON ANSWER TO QUESTION

Senator Michaud: Honourable senators, I wish at this time to express my thanks to the Honourable Leader of the Government for providing the Senate with the statistics I had requested with respect to the number of applications under the Small Farms Development Program approved for each province to June 30, 1975. These statistics can be found at page 1198 of yesterday's Debates of the Senate, July 16, 1975.

I should like now to comment briefly on those statistics. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, as honourable senators will recall, met in Moncton, New Brunswick, on June 13 and 14, 1973, to resume its study of certain aspects of agricultural problems in Eastern Canada. At the opening of the proceedings, the Chairman, the Honourable Senator Argue, made the statement that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture would consider the matter of marginal, submarginal and abandoned farm lands in Eastern Canada, noting in particular the situation in Kent County, New Brunswick.

In the light of those statistics, which have now been published, one thing is clear: the agricultural problem as it concerns small farms in New Brunswick, and in Kent County particularly, is far from being solved. Further inquiries into the matter have revealed that, out of the total of 117 applications registered at the different offices of the Farm Credit Corporation in New Brunswick since the inception of the Small Farms Development Program, only 12 have been registered at the Moncton office. When one realizes, however, that the Moncton office serves both the Kent County and the eastern New Brunswick area, it becomes obvious that the situation which these figures reveal will undoubtedly stimulate a further investigation into the matter by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, since it will no doubt wish to learn why this legislative measure is not producing in the Atlantic provinces, generally, the results anticipated when the measure was adopted by Parliament in 1972.

● (1420)

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I did not intervene when Senator Michaud said that he would make some comments on the answer, out of respect to him and his interest in that particular subject. However, so that what has just happened will not be regarded as a precedent, I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to rule 32, which reads:

A debate shall not be in order on a mere interrogation, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the interrogation and by the senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer shall not be allowed.

My understanding is that that does apply to the question period. Again, I apologize to Senator Michaud, because I respect him greatly and it is possible, when we look again at our rules, that it may be decided that mere interrogation might refer to something other than the question period.

THE SENATE

UNIFORMS OF PROTECTIVE STAFF—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, on Wednesday, July 9, I drew attention to the fact that the members of our protective staff were still wearing their winter uniforms, and I asked the Leader of the Government whether something might be done to permit them to wear their summer uniforms. I was pleased to be informed at that time that the leader had already raised this question on his own initiative. In any event, I recall that when I raised the question in the house there was some general applause. I took it that it was the feeling of honourable senators that our protective staff should be allowed to wear their summer uniforms and not be kept in stifling winter garb until one of them dropped dead of a heart attack. We might then all of a sudden decide that something should have been done about it.

I see that Senator Greene is wearing his summer tunic this afternoon, and I congratulate him for it. Sometimes I wonder who runs the Senate. I think the senators should run the Senate, and it is my feeling that senators want their protective staff treated humanely and that they be allowed to dress in their summer uniforms. I want to inform the house that unless action is taken at an early date I am going to formally move in this chamber that the Senate issue such instructions.

Senator Choquette: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I assure honourable senators that conversations have been held on this particular subject, which was a commitment I believe I gave on Wednesday, July 9. At the same time, I would like to suggest that in any institution of this kind—and I am not speaking only about those who serve us so well on the protective staff—there has to be a standard of dress and decorum established, and I am one who believes that certain standards are necessary in Parliament, both in the Senate and in the other place. There are established standards of dress and decorum in similar institutions in our country. They are a part and parcel of the traditions of these institutions. I think, however, that common sense should prevail when conditions clearly point to the desirability of flexibility in regulations of any kind.

Senator Argue: I would point out that the members of the House of Commons protective staff have been in their light uniforms for many weeks, and I cannot see that it takes anything away from the decorum of the other place.

Senator Perrault: There is some difference between the functions and duties of the two protective staffs, but I want to assure the Senate that conversations have been held on the matter.

Senator Choquette: Summer will be over before the conversations are over.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps we will be discussing then whether they should be allowed to wear their overcoats when winter comes.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT, 1972

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, (NO. 3)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Benidickson for the second reading of Bill C-67, to amend the Customs Tariff, (No. 3).

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Benidickson has given us as detailed an explanation of this bill as we need for present purposes. It is essentially a customs tariff housekeeping bill in that it deals with 14 tariff items as set out in the schedule. None of them represents in any way a very important change in the tariff, the majority merely continuing existing free entry already granted on a temporary basis for various reasons, but mainly because they are products that are not made in Canada. Therefore, these continuations of free entry are temporary so that the Minister of National Revenue will have an opportunity at any given time to change the category if it appears that a competitive item is being made in Canada.

It may interest honourable senators to know that customs tariff and excise revenues still constitute a substantial part of the income of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Excise duties and revenues last year brought in $749 million, and customs import tariffs brought in $1.81 billion, making a total of $2.5 billion, which is no small part of the total revenues of the federal government. I say that because it is sometimes assumed that the result of excise duties and customs tariffs is the protection of industry in Canada, although that, of course, is one of its main purposes.

The largest item here deals with aircraft and aircraft engines, with imports amounting to about $400 million. These aircraft and aircraft engines are of types and sizes that are not made in Canada. This free entry has been granted since 1952, and has been continued for the reasons I have just indicated. The present free entry expired on June 30 last year, and was not renewed because of the defeat of the government on its budget at that time, but it has been carried on by means of remission of duties by Order in Council. It was renewed in the budget of November 18 to continue until June 30, 1975. So that in passing this bill we will be authorizing the government to permit continued free entry for these items.

[Senator Perrault.]

Then there are some of the usual motherhood items—free entry of various religious publications, hymn books, liturgies, and so on. There is a group of petrochemical items—gas (aviation), gas (light, heating, diesel), petroleum feedstocks, heavy fuels, and so on. The importation of these items, which last year came to a value of $160 million, is continued as free entry.

Then there are farm items which Senator Benidickson called attention to. There is provision for air conditioners for farm combine harvesters, on the very sound ground that air conditioners for farm tractors are already entry-free.

As a gesture to the print media, polymer plates for letterpress printing will in future be granted free entry, at least until next year. At the moment these are not made in Canada, and the request for this exemption comes from the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association. It is interesting to note that this application was opposed by the manufacturers of a different type of plate, namely, that which is used in offset printing. The government, however, has granted free entry for the time being on the grounds that this particular type of letterpress plate is not made in Canada.

● (1430)

Senator Benidickson drew particular attention to the increase in the value of gifts permitted to be received by Canadians, usually by mail and sometimes brought in by non-residents. This increase, Senator Benidickson told us, is from $10 to $15. This may not sound like a huge increase, but we are told there is a very good reason why it is not higher. The reason why Canadians are not permitted to receive gifts from abroad to the value of more than $15 without paying duty is that if this amount was raised substantially it would possibly give rise to many abuses.

A second change has been made here. At present, if a gift item valued at more than $10 is received, the duty is assessed on a total value and not merely on the overage.

This is to be corrected in respect of the increased value of $15, but it does not apply, I regret to say, to alcohol and tobacco products.

That is about all there is to the bill. I thank Senator Benidickson for giving me access to some facts that made it unnecessary for me to ask some detailed questions which I might otherwise have asked. All the items are covered by a ways and means motion introduced in the other place on mini-budget night.

Senator Benidickson has asked whether we on this side of the house consider it necessary for the bill to go to committee. I would think not. I am authorized to say that so far as we are concerned we do not feel it is necessary for this bill to go to committee.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Benidickson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I will merely point out, as I did yesterday, that the list of items affecting our tariffs by reason of this bill is unduly slender this year, largely due to the fact that discussions are going on at present on a multilateral basis at Geneva. There are just about a score of alterations at this time.

I have had some experience with bills of this type over a great number of years. I am concerned about them, and pay some attention to them. I do not find anything controversial about this one, and I am glad to hear Senator Grosart say, on behalf of the official Opposition, that he does not feel it necessary this year to refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which I believe dealt with all budget bills last year. If that is the wish of honourable senators, I will not, of course, make the usual motion.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, in view of the unusual situation existing because of the approach of the summer recess, if it is your wish to report the passing of this bill promptly to the other house, I will move, with leave, that it be read the third time now.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in view of the atmosphere prevailing, I see no alternative but for us on this side of the house to agree. I would like to make the caveat that I do not want this to be regarded as a precedent, particularly in respect of the bill that might shortly follow this one on the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PETRO-CANADA BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Monday, July 14, the debate on the motion of Senator Cook for second reading of bill C-8, to establish a national petroleum company.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators will, I am sure, recognize the reason why I am rising a second time on a bill in the same day. I may, in fact, be required to speak a third time today on another motion.

Senator Choquette: We always like to hear you.

Senator Grosart: The heat is on, in more ways than one at the present time, and I am sure honourable senators will forgive me for trespassing on their time to the extent that I shall be today.

This bill, concerning the intention to form a crown corporation to be known as Petro-Canada, has had a long and tortuous passage through the other place. In fact, it was introduced originally in October of last year, with second reading on March 12. It has been the subject of eight long debates and some 14 committee sessions in the other place.

The sponsor of the bill, Senator Cook, quoted the minister as saying that the bill is neither lengthy nor complex. I am afraid I shall have to disagree with him, because I find it lengthy and extremely complex. But that was not Senator Cook's description of the bill. I am sure he was aware of the danger of what we now call the Laird syndrome; that is, rising in the Senate and saying, "This is a simple bill." That is a very dangerous thing to do.

The more I study the bill, the more convinced I am that it is an absolutely unnecessary piece of legislation. There can be no question that the objectives, the very laudable objectives, of the government will not, and cannot, be achieved by this bill, and that those laudable objectives could all be achieved by a much more simple and more effective type of legislation.

The bill purports to set up a proprietary crown corporation under the schedule D classification of crown corporations in the Financial Administration Act, with very large powers. This seems to be the first occasion on which we are being asked to approve the formation of a crown corporation to operate in this sphere where there is no question the private sector is already operating efficiently.

To support that, I quote the minister himself, who said:

This does not mean that the government finds that Canada has not been well served by private enterprise in the petroleum industry. Private companies, whether Canadian or foreign-owned, have generally worked vigorously to develop our oil and gas resources, to create transportation systems for them, and to refine and distribute efficiently oil products. The privately owned Canadian oil industry has a good record of technical and managerial innovation.

Yet in this climate the government has decided to intervene and form a crown corporation whose prospects could not be much slimmer than they are.

The reasons given by the minister are these:

The government does not feel assured that the private sector can be relied upon to mobilize all of the enormous amounts of capital which will be required to secure energy development consonant with Canadian needs over the longer term. Nor can it be certain that, faced with attractive investment opportunities and geological possibilities abroad, the private oil industry will be able to concentrate as much effort on our own petroleum prospective areas over the next decades as our needs require.

That is all very well, if there were some evidence produced by the government, or by someone on behalf of the government, that this is so, that this fear is grounded in any kind of factual background.

● (1440)

What is the background? Taking the last 40 years of operation by the private sector in this particular area, in 30 years it has just broken even on its investment. Its return after 30 years' operation is exactly what the industry as a whole has put into oil and gas exploration, distribution, marketing, and so forth. We are faced at the present time with a situation where it is said that we have about 10 years' supply of these resources, as we now define them, left. What better record could the private sector, or anyone else, have than that? Taking the 40-year period, in 30 years' operation the private sector has broken even on its investment, and we still have 10 years of reserves.

The fact of the matter, of course, is that other countries have not done anywhere near as well, whether in the private or public sectors. Other countries with large potential oil reserves are only now beginning to exploit them. In Canada, the private sector has done what the minister described as a first class job. Why is he now worrying about the future? Perhaps he knows things that we do not; if so, he has not told us. He may, of course, be relying on the fact that in the last year or so there has been a tremendous drop in the amount of drilling, and in exploration generally. The drop has been significant. Last year, drilling dropped by 8 per cent, and this year it is estimated it may drop by 25 per cent. Production last year dropped by 6 per cent, and this year it is estimated it may drop by 7 per cent.

If the government is telling us that its fears are grounded on that fact, the argument, I would have to say, falls flat on the ground. The only reason this situation has developed has been government taxation policy. I am not speaking of only one level of government. The federal government has not been behind other governments in taxing business for the level of exploration that seemed to be necessary to maintain our self-sufficiency in oil for the time being. It has succeeded in driving small and medium-sized companies, many of them Canadian, out of the country. The rigs are still leaving the country, and that is only because of new government policies, particularly policies that have come into effect since the last full budget.

This is not just my opinion. As good an authority as John Meyer, known to many of us, and not as a partisan observer of the economic scene, says:

This is the ministry, after all, which largely by its own efforts has succeeded in bringing an early end to the petroleum self-sufficiency which Canadians had been led to believe would last indefinitely.

For these reasons, honourable senators, I say that this bill is unnecessary. It will create the sixtieth crown corporation set up by this government. Some honourable senators may feel that a crown corporation in this field might be successful. However, the record of crown corporations clearly shows that they, by any standard, have the highest record of ineffectiveness among any group of 60 corporations that you could choose.

The total assets now of all crown corporations amount to over $17 billion. The return in dividends last year from all crown corporations amounted to $8 million, or something like .004 per cent. It is fair to say that not all crown corporations are set up with the intention of making a profit. However, the minister has described this bill as an exercise in public enterprise, and Statistics Canada, and others, provide the figures I have just quoted under the heading of "Government Enterprise." If these are the results we are to look for from government enterprise in this field, I again say the bill is completely unnecessary.

As I said, there are at present 60 crown corporations, and those 60 corporations now have 120 subsidiaries, for a total of 180 companies in the general category of crown corporations. In quoting the figure of $8 million in dividends last year, I should mention that that includes the profit from such corporations as the Bank of Canada and the Canadian Wheat Board, which are not officially classified as crown corporations. Without those being included, the return would have been nil.

I recall reading a study put out by the government in 1973 called: "An Energy Policy for Canada—Phase 1, Vol. 1, Analysis", which dealt with the question: Is the crown corporation any part of the answer to the energy problem in Canada? That study was broken down into pluses and minuses, reasons yes, and reasons no. I, for one, and I know many others, certainly reached the conclusion that the government had decided as a result of the study in question that the weight came down on the "no" side. That study seemed to indicate that there were more reasons why we should not form a crown corporation in this field than there were reasons why we should.

It has been said that one of the reasons for establishing a crown corporation in this field is so there would be a Canadian government presence. Of course, that presence is already there. The federal government has a presence in Panarctic and also in Syncrude, and we are told that some of the money that will be requested by this bill will be used either to take over or to increase the government's participation in those companies.

This seems much more like a straight political decision than an economic one. One could understand why the government may have been concerned about the fact that it has no national energy policy. It has been talking about announcing one for years, but we do not have one as yet. One gets the impression that this bill is just window dressing—just a cover-up.

It is inconceivable that Petro-Canada would have any success. It is inconceivable that the government even wants it to be successful, certainly in the short term. Why? The bill would authorize a government equity investment of $500 million in this corporation, and a debt investment of $1 billion. The government admits it might require $1½ billion to make this corporation operative. Then an announcement was made that the government would draw down only $150 million a year for the first five years. Surely, any confession of inadequacy more than that is hardly needed. What will $150 million a year do to set up a Canadian enterprise presence in this field?

But that was not all. The government then said, "But for the first year we will arrange to appropriate $50 million. We are not too sure about that." And then the other day the government said, "No, no, $10 million is enough." So, the government cut its own $50 million requirement to $10 million. We start out with the pretense, the hoax, the charade of a $1½ billion corporation spending $10 million in the first year in establishing what has been described as an urgent case for government intervention. What is urgent about it?

The government then admitted that it will take 10 or 15 years to get this corporation operating. We have the evidence before us, a statement by the government itself, that our resources will run out in 10 years. Surely there are grounds for my saying that this is a hoax and a charade put before us for political rather than economic reasons.

● (1450)

Because of government policies, the position is now such that Canada is the only country in the world with a substantial oil and gas potential where productivity has actually declined in the last year, and this can be tied clearly to this government's meddling in something about which it knows little. As a matter of fact, one of the reasons given for this bill is that it will help the government to get to know something about this business. We already have the National Energy Board. It is a fantastic confession that the government needs to spend $1½ billion in order to learn something about as important an aspect of the Canadian economy as this.

The situation clearly is that the government is talking about moving into a void created by itself, by forcing out elements of the private sector, many of them Canadian, merely by the restraints, taxation and muddling of its policies in the last year or so. The reduction in productivity in the last year as a result of this government's actions is, I am told, equivalent to more than the entire capital of Petro-Canada. It is argued that the big five in this industry are foreign-controlled. It is quite true that that represents 90 per cent of the control of the industry. Here again, as I said earlier, we need something more than the vague assertion of foreign control to justify any suggestion that Petro-Canada control will be any better.

It has been said over and over again by leaders of the industry that the present climate in Canada, created by government—not only the federal government but other governments—is such as to drive out the very people we need to explore, to drill and to find the oil necessary to maintain our self-sufficiency ten years from now. The clear evidence, some of which I have quoted here, is that the government has greatly discouraged the major operators in this respect. How often have we heard it said by government spokesmen that the real function of government is to create the climate in which the private sector can achieve the productivity we need to meet all claims on the public purse? Here is the clearest case I have ever encountered where the government itself has created a climate in which the private sector cannot produce, and has had to say so to the government.

I am not one of those who say that there is never a place for crown corporations. There are examples of successful crown corporations, although not very many. I can think of only two or three out of the 60 that I would put in that category. I have examined the whole record, I shall not go into it now, but I point out that there is a complete record available of the investments, the assets, the liabilities, the net worth, the profits—if there are such—the returns on loans by the government, and the dividends. It is a dismal record, even for those crown corporations that were set up with the intention that they either pay their own way, carry themselves, or return a reasonable profit, because corporations under Schedule D of the Financial Administration Act are of a type, of course, which do not normally get their funds from annual appropriations.

Another aspect that alarms me is that the government has decided to create this new crown corporation, and to go into the last kind of business for which the government should be using taxpayers' money to this extent. This is a high risk venture. The minister himself agrees with that. He said:

—we are going into this venture in realization of the fact that the hazards of exploration risk, technical and commercial uncertainty await the venture.

Incredible. We are now going into a high risk business with taxpayers' money.

On another bill I said one of the things that has disappointed me about the whole government approach in this field is the fact that it has not up to now set aside any part of the revenues accruing from gas and oil production in Canada for further exploration. Some honourable senators might reply, "This bill is your answer." It is not. What I was asking for on that occasion was the setting aside of some part of the existing revenues for that specific purpose. I suggest that if the government wished to obtain a restoration of exploration productivity, it could have done so very simply in that way.

The industry has asked for this; provincial governments have asked for it. They have asked that the federal government bring in legislation which, after exploring the matter with all those knowledgeable in the subject, will say, "Here is a fair price for oil, taking into account that it will require so much per year on a percentage basis or dollar basis to maintain the level of exploration that Canada needs." That is all that needed to be done. Companies in the field would have welcomed it, because they would have known that there was a price available to them, and that they were required to use a certain percentage of that—a percentage that could be decided by the government—to continue exploration.

The minister has made it clear over and over again that the main activity of Petro-Canada will be in exploration. One can only say, in parenthesis, "With what?" With $10 million this year? When are they going to start?

Rather than this bill, this strange crown corporation venture into a high risk field, I suggest that a much better alternative would be, first of all, the development of an overall national energy policy. There have been references to possible activities of Petro-Canada in atomic energy, with the provinces in electric energy, and so on. If they are going to do that, they might need to change the name from Petro-Can to something else.

An indicator of the absurdity of this whole thing occurred to me when I read that the original name the government had for this corporation was "Oil-Can," until somebody pointed out to them that there was a famous joint in Vancouver's Gastown known as "Oil Can Harry's." Perhaps it is a shame they changed the name. I think it would be better if this bill went down into history as "Oil Can-Canada."

Senator Perrault: That is better than "Trash-Can."

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Cook speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, as I pointed out, all this bill does is to give Petro-Canada its charter. The policy and operation of Petro-Canada will always be subject to government approval, and in the final analysis to Parliament itself. It must also be remembered that Parliament will control the budget and funding of the corporation, and there will be ample opportunities to examine and comment on the business of the company.

● (1500)

As I have mentioned, only the future can tell whether the creation of a national oil company will prove to be a good move or a bad move. I think no good purpose would be served in my debating the issue further at this time. Even if I could convince those who oppose the bill, it would probably be the case that:

He that complies against his will

Is of his own opinion still.

Therefore, without further ado, honourable senators, I will leave the fate of this bill in your capable hands.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I put a question to Senator Cook? He made what was to me a remarkable assertion, that the finances and operations of this company will be determined by Parliament. My information is that one of the great drawbacks of this bill is that this corporation is in no way subject to parliamentary control. Would Senator Cook give me some basis for his statement to the contrary?

Senator Cook: Surely, in the final analysis it is parliamentary control. If the honourable senator refers to the bill, he will see a clause that provides that the corporation will be subject to directions. Clause 7 of the bill says:

(2) In the exercise of its powers, the Corporation shall comply with such policy directions as may from time to time be given to it in writing by the Governor in Council.

(3) Three months before the commencement of each financial year of the Corporation, the Corporation shall submit to the Minister, in such form as the Minister may prescribe, its capital budget for that financial year including therein the capital budget of such subsidiaries of the Corporation as the Minister may prescribe and setting out therein the proposed capital expenditures and commitments of the Corporation and such subsidiaries.

(4) The Corporation may submit to the Minister supplementary capital budgets in such form as the Minister may prescribe.

It will be seen, therefore, from those three subclauses (2), (3) and (4), that, first of all, the corporation has to comply with such instructions as may be given to it by the Governor in Council and, which is equally important, the corporation's budget must receive the approval of the Governor in Council.

I think the honourable senator is a capable enough businessman to know that the budget and expenditure of the corporation is the focal point, and if the budget is subject to the approval of the Governor in Council that is, in effect, saying that most of the major activities of the corporation are subject to the approval of the government. That is to be taken in conjunction with subclause (2) which says that the corporation has to carry out such policy directions as may from time to time be given to it in writing by the Governor in Council.

[Senator Cook.]

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator permit me to ask him if he is not somewhat surprised at the answer he gave me? Seven or eight times he referred to control by the Governor in Council, and three or four times to the Cabinet, but not once did he mention the word "Parliament."

Senator Cook: Surely the honourable senator will agree that the Cabinet is subject to Parliament, when it comes to the final analysis, and therefore my statement that the corporation is subject to Parliament is perfectly correct.

Senator Grosart: It was, in the good old days.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Cook moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

FORESTRY

DEVASTATION OF FORESTS OF EASTERN CANADA BY THE SPRUCE BUDWORM—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, July 10, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Burchill calling the attention of the Senate to acceleration in the devastation of the forests of Eastern Canada and adjoining areas by the ravages of the spruce budworm.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I simply wish to say a few words about the statement of Senator Burchill with respect to the ravages of the spruce budworm. Several other honourable senators from the Maritime provinces also mentioned the damages in their provinces. I would add that several forest areas in the province of Quebec, including the Laurentians, have been hit by that disaster.

Last October, I read in the papers an article dating back to July 17, 1974, according to which Dr. Samuel Singer had discovered a bacteria which could kill billions of young mosquitoes without any apparent side effect on the environment; that bacteria might help prevent huge devastation. Dr. Singer added that he spotted that bacteria in 1972 and later increased its destructive abilities through selective breeding. He hopes to start production for commercial purposes within five years. Tests are now under way in Nigeria and will be carried on this year.

I later was in contact with the Minister of Agriculture, and in a letter dated October 7, 1974, he wrote to me, and I quote:

For agricultural purposes, we use a bacteria similar to the one mentioned in the article concerned, called Bacillus thuringiensis. It is the only bacterial agent produced in industrial quantities to be used legally in Canada. We used it in our Harrow, Ontario, research centre, for experiments on tobacco and cabbage bugs, and also in our Saint-Jean, Quebec, research centre, against the corn ear worm. This bacterial agent has remarkable insecticide properties without undesirable side effects on the environment.

The Department of the Environment experimented with the Bacillus thuringiensis on the spruce budworm. Thus, in 1973, 10,000 acres of forest were treated in the Temiscouata area; 1,000 acres of forest were also treated in the Macaza area in 1974. The results of those experiments were extremely encouraging.

I say that, honourable senators, to stress the fact that the fight against the spruce budworm has now become scientific in nature. I am even told that the experts of the Department of Agriculture are using radar to study the movement and the natural habitat of the spruce budworm in order to locate them and destroy them more efficiently.

I wanted to say that in support of the request made by several honourable senators that this whole question be looked into by our Committee on Agriculture on our return in the fall. I wonder if it might not be useful for the Chairman of our Standing Committee on Agriculture to get in touch with the experts of that department and ask them to get ready to brief us, when we come back, on the damage caused by the spruce budworm in Canada, the areas that are most severely affected, and the program the department intends to implement next year.

In closing, I would like to say this: the spruce budworm is no longer harmful at this point in time; it has turned into a butterfly. However, in many places, especially in the Laurentians, some people take advantage of the credulous public to sprinkle properties for $50 and $100 when the budworm is no longer damaging trees. I have noted that last year the CBC aired several announcements to alert the public about that. I have not seen any this year. I hope that the CBC will again warn the public that the budworm is no longer harmful for the remainder of the year. I therefore support the request which has been made. I think that the Senate could play a very important role for the benefit of the public and our forest resources.

● (1510)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, on July 9, during the debate on Senator Burchill's inquiry calling the attention of the Senate to the acceleration in the devastation of the forests of Eastern Canada and adjoining areas by the ravages of the spruce budworm, I undertook to obtain answers to several questions raised by honourable members.

The Forestry Directorate of the Department of the Environment has given me background information on many of the items discussed. Because that information takes the form of a rather detailed and technical paper, I will ask leave to have it printed as an appendix to today's Hansard. Despite its technical aspects I am sure that those concerned with this problem will find the paper of real interest. Before submitting the paper as an appendix, I should like to make a few remarks on the subject in summary form.

First of all, the spruce budworm is a native of the northern evergreen forests of North America. When fir-spruce forests mature over large areas and the spring weather is warm and dry, budworm populations can explode to epidemic proportions within a few short years. Such an epidemic, if left uncontrolled, will result in extensive tree mortality after three or four years. We are now in the midst of such an outbreak, and I have just been informed by the forestry directorate that the epidemic presently covers 112 million acres of fir-spruce forest in Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes, and Newfoundland. Thus, there is every reason for concern on the part of honourable senators, and I find it heartening that they have proceeded as eloquently as they have to bring the problem to the attention of the Senate, and, through the Senate, to the people of Canada.

Incidentally, references in the discussion to "the life of the spruce budworm," and "the sex life of the spruce budworm," might seem humorous or facetious to some people, but the subject is anything but humorous. Surveys of tree mortality made available to me show that close to 500 million cords of fir-spruce have been killed by the budworm in this century. That should have been enough wood to sustain the current annual harvest for 30 years in Eastern Canada. I hope such facts are brought to the attention of the people of this country through the media as well as through the speeches that are being made by the senators on this subject, because it is an alarming situation. Of course, some of that wood killed by the budworm would not have been utilized, and even in the more accessible areas some of it could only have been salvaged within two years. But, clearly, the budworm can cause serious setbacks to established industries, which in the case of New Brunswick constitute up to 20 per cent of the economic activity of the province. So, you can see the substantial effect the budworm can have on the economy of our provinces.

At this point I would ask that the technical paper I have referred to, which I think will be of real interest to honourable senators, and, I hope, to the people of Canada, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day. It is entitled: "The Spruce Budworm Problem."

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of paper see appendix B, pp. 1230-1232.)

Senator Perrault: One aspect of the problem not covered by the paper concerns direct federal financial assistance in large-scale aerial control programs. Several million dollars—approximately $4.5 million—are spent annually by the federal government in research and advisory services to the provinces and industries related to forest pest control. A significant proportion of those funds is directed towards the spruce budworm, which is recognized as the major forest pest problem in Canada.

Many aerial spray programs have been carried out since the passage of the Canada Forestry Act in 1949. A considerable number of those were paid for exclusively by provincial governments, forest industries, municipalities and landowners or, cooperatively, by various groupings of those agencies. A few control programs on federal lands were financed solely by the federal government. Numerous cost-sharing agreements on aerial control programs were entered into by the federal government with the provinces, at the formal request of the latter.

Let me give you a short summary of the federal government money spent on various problems relating to insect control, particularly the problem of the spruce budworm. In New Brunswick, between 1953 and 1968, the federal government contributed $7,239,000 to control the spruce budworm. In 1973 the amount in New Brunswick was $631,000 and in 1974 $565,000. In the province of Quebec the spruce budworm control program received $3,487,000 in 1973 and $2,035,000 in 1974. Also in Quebec the program to control the Jack-pine sawfly, another indigenous pest, received $94,000 in 1965 and 1967.

I will not go through all the provinces, but just give you one further example. In Newfoundland in 1969 the program to control the hemlock looper, another perverse ally of the spruce budworm, received $625,000. Those federal funds were invested in a federal control program there. In British Columbia, as far back as 1957, a program to control British Columbia's variation of the species, the black-headed budworm, received $60,000. The federal contribution was one-third of the total cost of the agreed programs carried out from 1953 to 1968.

Owing to budgetary limitations, federal financial assistance for aerial spraying operations was largely withdrawn from 1969 to 1972, but, as a response to continuing requests from provinces for assistance, the federal government adopted a revised policy and procedure for entering into cost-sharing agreements on forest insect control programs. The federal contribution was based on a formula which included a threshold value for each province, above which federal support was provided at an escalating rate, rising from 25 per cent of the first $250,000 above the threshold to 50 per cent of costs in excess of $1,250,000 above the threshold.

Due to budgetary constraints, direct federal assistance in sharing costs of operational control programs was terminated as of April 1, 1975. The provinces were informed of this decision well in advance of 1975 spray operations. However, at the request of the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Fisheries, the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, a task force has been established to review the whole question of federal financial assistance to the provinces in emergency situations resulting from destructive agents such as insects, disease and fire. The task force report is now in hand, and I can report that it is now awaiting departmental approval. I hope that out of this can come some constructive action to meet what appears to be an emergency situation.

Senator Choquette: May I just refer to all these figures that we have received? We have heard about grants or donations by the provincial and federal governments, but I should think that the lumber companies, the manufacturers, in all those provinces, would contribute money to some extent, and we have not heard those figures. Is it one-third: one-third, or two-thirds: one-third? Do you have any figures on that?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: I am unable to provide any specific figures on that particular aspect of the control of the problem, but I shall certainly undertake to try to obtain that information. The reference in my remarks to programs involving landowners and various groupings of agencies such as municipalities and forest industries, and so on, very definitely suggests that there has been a cooperative endeavour on the part of the forestry companies themselves, but I do not have any of the specific figures.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate in this debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

● (1520)

SCIENCE POLICY

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Special Committee on Science Policy, presented in the Senate on Thursday, July 10, 1975.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators who want to put my remarks into perspective may refer to the report I presented on July 10, which was printed as an appendix to our Hansard of that day, beginning at page 1171.

[Translation]

One of the main recommendations in the committee's report is that our present mandate be terminated. Our mandate was to prepare a conference in which the main decision-makers at different levels of our national life would have participated. During this conference, the participants would have been invited to take position on the feasibility and, if possible, the structure and functions of Canadian institutions of futurology, or of organizations responsible on the one hand for systematically studying the long-term future of our country and, on the other hand, for circulating in a usable form, valid information on the future of our country, so as to improve its decision-making process, both in the public and the private sectors.

[English]

I want to stress at the outset that this report was adopted unanimously at a meeting which was extremely well attended by the members of the committee.

When we started our work no other Canadian institution, not even the government, was really interested in futures research and information, as activities essential to the development of what we call more and more anticipatory democracy. We, therefore, had to start from scratch.

We did not want the proposed conference to be like so many others where participants go without any preliminary preparation to listen passively to a group of guest speakers delivering long lectures. Such meetings, as we all know, are most of the time futile and frustrating. We wanted the participants, who would have been top Canadian decision-makers representing the different segments of our society, to really participate in the design of democratic institutions capable of helping them to invent the future together. This would have been an unprecedented-ed event in our history. This is why we intended to select these participants several months before the conference, and to send them well in advance a series of four working papers covering the main topics to be discussed.

Such an approach required a good deal of preparatory work, but we believed that it was justified by the complexity and the importance of the objectives to be achieved. In the process, we have established contact with many of the best experts in the world in this field, and we have accumulated the most complete and up-to-date information on futures studies that exists in Canada.

We have also prepared a number of background papers which were eventually compressed into a document entitled "Managing the Future: Conference on Anticipatory Institutions." It was supposed to be the first conference paper to be made available to the participants, and was intended to be a general presentation of the various topics to be discussed.

This document attempts to justify the need for more and better futures research in Canada, and for a national futures information network designed to improve decision-making in the private as well as in the public sectors. It describes in general terms two institutions—a Canadian Centre for Future Studies and a commission on the future called Futures Canada—which could have met these two needs. It presents also the format of the proposed conference which would have considered these needs, and the feasibility of these institutions as means of meeting them.

We felt that this document should be distributed privately to a number of experts in Canada and abroad for comment. Most of these people have reacted favourably to our proposals, and have stated that the organizational model we were proposing would be unique in the world. I hope that some of my colleagues will refer to these comments during this debate.

The government has also reacted positively, although perhaps too rapidly, to the substance of the message contained in our document. It has recognized the imperative need to bring the consideration of possible, probable and preferable long-term futures into the present decision-making process of private and public organizations through better research and information. The Prime Minister's letter to me, which is partly reproduced in our report, clearly recognizes our concern in this area and the need to do something about it.

Mr. Nixon's letter, written when he was still Deputy Secretary to the Cabinet, to Dr. Carrothers, the President of the Institute for Research on Public Policy, makes this government acceptance of our main message even more obvious. This letter, written by Mr. Nixon, which is also reproduced in our report, uses the same terms and the same reference dates for research that we have utilized in our document.

However, these two letters also reveal that the government has decided to assign the new functions and responsibilities described in our document to the Institute for Research on Public Policy on a contractual basis rather than wait and consult, as we were proposing to do, a representative group of Canadian decision-makers on what should be a proper institutional framework to carry out these activities effectively. The Prime Minister, in his letter to me, which was written in French at the end of February, says in reference to the institute:

[Translation]

It would seem in effect that this organization should initially be given the responsibility of the important tasks which you have so well defined.

[English]

As far as I am concerned, I still prefer the strategy and procedure that we intended to follow as a genuine exercise in participatory democracy and as a better launching pad for inventing the future on a collective basis. But I can understand the Prime Minister's predicament. He had strongly supported the creation of the Institute for Research on Public Policy in 1972, and yet he wrote in his letter to me of February 1975:

● (1530)

[Translation]

This organization has taken longer to start than I had hoped.

[English]

In other words, the Prime Minister saw in this new research and information mission that we had defined in our document an excellent opportunity for inducing the institute to launch a major program which it undoubtedly needs to function properly.

The committee had also envisaged that possibility in its document. But, we expressed the view:

—that this institute should concentrate its activities on research and development leading to social innovations and to the improvement of social policies in such fields as health care, education, social security, pollution, urban living, leisure, crime prevention and criminal rehabilitation.

We concluded:

However, we do not feel that it should act as the central institution in the proposed network (of future studies) and the main agency responsible for macroscopic research. The institute has not really started to operate yet and if it were to assume this major responsibility there is a good chance it could not simultaneously develop and serve its main mission.

This is very likely what will happen as a result of the government's recent decision unless the institute accepts to become a gigantic organization, which would be clearly undesirable. In any case, this government decision makes the continuation of the committee's present activities useless. Indeed, it would be ridiculous to continue to prepare and to hold a conference for the purpose of determining the feasibility of a commission on the future when the activities and responsibilities of the proposed commission have already been assigned to the Institute for Research on Public Policy.

We should not feel, however, that the committee's work up to now has been useless. On the contrary, as I said before, most valuable information has been accumulated and we propose to make it available to the institute so that it will not have to start from scratch as we had to do.

Moreover, we intend to publish this basic document. Thus, it will be available to the growing number of Canadians interested in this field. It will show to the public that this new and most important venture was initiated by the Senate. It will serve for future reference to appraise the activities of the institute as it continues our work.

Finally—and this is perhaps the most positive result of our work—we have succeeded in making futures research and information a new and high priority of the Canadian government. Gouverner c'est prévoir. But prior to the beginning of our operation, long-term forecasting was nonexistent in government with the result that decisions were always taken on the basis of short-term considerations which can often be disastrous.

The committee feels, however, that it should not, at this stage, completely abandon its interest in this field.

The Institute for Research on Public Policy has now accepted a new and highly complex mission which is too important to be allowed to fail. The institute has been generously funded, but after three years of existence it has not yet completed any project, and it has not established its credibility in our country. It may well be that its new assignment will be its salvation, but to succeed in this endeavour it will need all the help it can get.

This is why the committee feels that it should be authorized to monitor the activities of the institute and of government departments and agencies in the area of futures research and information. We should make as sure as we can, through advice and criticism if necessary, that truly co-ordinated national networks in this area will be effectively built. The initial investment we have made and the expertise we have acquired in this area surely entitle us to play this important watchdog role.

I hardly need to explain further the other aspects of the new mandate that we are seeking. Throughout our inquiry, a great number of individuals and groups have proposed that the committee should become permanent so as to provide a continuing public forum where major issues of science policy could be raised and discussed. This is not what we are recommending in this report, although there is no such forum in Canada, even in the other place. Most other advanced countries, including the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Sweden and Holland have parliamentary standing committees or select committees designed to accomplish this function on a continuing basis.

However, since the volumes containing our 73 specific recommendations and other suggestions have been published, we have said repeatedly to government departments and agencies, as well as to numerous private groups, that Senate committees do not necessarily work like royal commissions and wind up their activities once their reports are published. This opportunity for follow-up activities is precisely one of the great advantages we have over these royal commissions or outside task forces and consultants.

We published our last volume on science policy in the fall of 1973. It was a call for important changes in the formulation of policies and in the government organization related to science, technology and innovation. A great number of our recommendations have been accepted by the government, but we have no way of knowing exactly how effectively they have been implemented except by calling back before us those who have that responsibility.

We presented an overall plan of action, and there is good reason to believe that the response to several important aspects of this plan has been minimal compliance with our demand for change. This is the normal response to be expected from most bureaucratic systems. As Donald Schon has shown, this minimal compliance:

—is particularly effective where those pressing for change cannot distinguish significant from token compliance, or can muster their forces only for an initial assault. In this respect, established social systems have the advantage; they are able to exert continuing energy in the service of their stable state, whereas those attacking can seldom sustain their attack.

In the Senate, through our committees, we can not only muster our forces for an initial assault but we can also, if we want to, sustain our attack to fight resistance against desirable change.

● (1540)

Our report on science policy has had a significant impact in other countries, and our overall plan of action, which we compressed in our last volume, has been implemented in its totality, insofar as it was relevant to national conditions, of course, by the Dutch government. In Canada we do not feel that government response has yet been adequate. That is why we would like to go back and see what happened to our recommendations.

When the government decided to accept our recommendation to set up the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, it stated in the preamble to the ministry's terms of reference that:

Science and technology vitally affect the well-being of Canadians, and the future of Canadian society as a whole—

And that:

—the need for policies directed towards the most effective use of science and technology, in the achievement of Canadian national goals, has become increasingly urgent.

I fully subscribe to these statements, but feel that the government has failed to achieve its own objectives. Government support for science, technology and innovation continues to be inadequate, uncoordinated and wasteful. That is why our committee should be authorized, through the adoption of this report, to go back to its former mandate, not to start a new inquiry but to uncover the areas where our demand for change and improvement has been met with minimum compliance, or simply with autocratic and bureaucratic rejection. Let us show that we can also be a chamber of sober continuing thought.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in rising for the third time this afternoon, perhaps I should say "three times and out". I would have liked to adjourn the debate, and later make some comments that I was asked, when in committee, to make in respect of the report. However, it is the desire of the committee—and, I hope, the wish of the Senate—to conclude this debate today, if possible, so that the recommendations in the report can be implemented in due course.

It is, of course, with mixed feelings that I support the recommendation of the committee, of which I am a member. It was a difficult decision to opt out, possibly temporarily—I will explain that in a moment—of this project of the Senate of Canada, which certainly would have made the Senate a leader in activism in Canada, in what has become one of the most important aspects of political and other decision-making in the world. It would also have made Canada a world leader in the establishment of a national commission on the future, and, of course, it is our hope that these very high targets that we set for ourselves will be accomplished in this new arrangement.

As Senator Lamontagne pointed out, we had very little choice in this matter, although some members of the committee felt that we should perhaps carry on with our own mandate. Out of respect for the intervention at the very highest level—the Prime Minister's level—we felt that without the full support of the Prime Minister and the Cabinet our mandate would not be completed as well as it would if we had that support.

We did specifically ask the question of those representing the institute, which will now take this over, if they felt our carrying on would duplicate the work of that body and, if so, whether or not it would be in the public interest. The answer given to us quite clearly was that we would be duplicating that work, and that it would not be in the public interest.

We accepted that assessment of the situation. This house can take great satisfaction from the fact that it was the Senate which suddenly—the word “suddenly” is the correct word—created an awareness in Canada of the importance of the science of futures, futurism, or whatever it may be called, in political decision-making. We are, of course, very happy that our opinion of the importance of this subject has now been fully recognized at the highest levels. We feel that we have brought this subject out from the shadows of academic and theoretical thinking into the full sunshine of Cabinet activity, and that our mandate has now been transferred to a government-appointed body. It is true that it is not a crown corporation, but it is a government-appointed body, and, what is perhaps more important, it has funds far greater than the Senate committee could ever expect to have.

We regret, of course, that the Senate will not receive the credit for carrying this on to a conclusion, although it is possible in the future that we may have to come back to it, for the simple reason—and this will interest honourable senators—that the Institute for Research and Public Policy has not yet accepted the mandate from the Prime Minister's Office. Indeed, they have told us they could not say yes or no until they had spent $60,000 on a feasibility study. I am not questioning the validity of that statement. They will, in due course, give an answer, and I for one am reasonably sure—as I believe are all members of the committee—that the answer will be “yes.”

As members of the committee, we must have some personal regrets, because many of us spent a great deal of time acquainting ourselves with this subject, and preparing ourselves to pull our weight in committee. Many Canadian institutions and prominent persons will regret that the Senate is not carrying on, as is evident from the many expressions of support and willingness to participate that we have had. It is very significant that for the first time in the history of the Senate, a body as important as the Economic Council of Canada sought to make this a joint venture with them. The council will, I am sure, be disappointed that it is not going ahead on that basis, but it will, of course, make its input into the new arrangement.

We have agreed to turn over our files, particularly that important document, which is the summary of our approach, called: “Managing the Future—A Conference on Anticipatory Institutions.” That and other documentation will be turned over to the institute. I have no hesitation in saying that this constitutes by far the most important material that has been assembled in Canada on this subject, and it will obviously be of great use to the institute. As a matter of fact, I even suggested to the director of the institute, when we sat down to discuss this, that they might be prepared to pay for it. Perhaps the chairman will pursue that further. It would be nice for once to see the Senate get back some of the money it has spent on contributing, as it so often does, to the public interest in many matters.

Senator Choquette: Have you any idea of how much this committee has spent?

Senator Grosart: I am sorry, I do not have that information.

Senator Choquette: I would like to know if it is true, for instance, that this committee has cost more than any other committee since the Senate has been in existence. That is my first question. You must have some approximate figures there.

Senator Grosart: I do not have the figures before me. I can only say there is no question in the minds of members of the committee, as expressed at the meeting, that the money has been well spent. This is not the opinion of just one or two members, and certainly not of one person. The matter was discussed in detail at a full meeting—the fullest meeting I have seen of any committee. The operation of the committee at that time was fully approved, and there was enthusiastic support for carrying on, in the limited way, what the chairman has proposed.

● (1550)

In such matters it is difficult to bring about a cost-benefit analysis, but I, for one, as a member of the committee, have no doubt that the money has been well spent. That, I can assure the honourable senator, is an opinion that is supported by people and institutions of the greatest importance in Canada, and I will give him the names of some and their comments in a moment.

Senator Choquette: That will still not answer my question. We can go on indefinitely in that vein.

Senator Grosart: Well, if the honourable senator wishes to make a speech I will take my seat.

Senator Choquette: I have asked a question.

Senator Grosart: The honourable senator has asked a question and I have given my answer, which is that I do not have the complete figures of the operation of the committee over the period of some five or six years. I am sure those figures are available, if the honourable senator wishes to have them, and I would be more than pleased to hear his comments on them item by item.

Another matter of regret, of course—for me personally, and I think for most members of the committee—is that Senator Lamontagne, apparently, will not be able to carry on and get the final credit for what would have been a great achievement, and which will, I think, still be a great achievement. It was Senator Lamontagne's concept from the start. It was Senator Lamontagne who organized the work so well carried out by Mr. Philip Pocock and his staff. It was Senator Lamontagne who was the first—generously, but I am sure with some regrets—to agree to turn this matter over to this larger condominium of public policy. I can say from personal knowledge that today the name of Senator Lamontagne in this whole area of science and technology, and the study of the futures, is a household word around the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grosart: If there were no other benefit to the Senate from the amount of money that has been spent, I would say it is sufficient that this Senate is regarded in some of the most important circles of intelligent thinking around the world as having taken a position greater than that of any other Parliament on this particular matter. If honourable senators feel that is an exaggeration, I invite them to listen to the words of Alexander King, the Director for Scientific Affairs of the OECD. He made the statement that no Parliament anywhere had made the kind of contribution to national science policy that this committee has made.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grosart: I apologize for that deviation, but I thought it necessary in the event that anyone wishes to question the worth of the committee chaired by Senator Lamontagne. I myself have disagreed with him on many occasions, but on the overall question of his contribution to Canada, to the Senate, and to the world in this field, I will not take the back of the stage for anybody.

Some honourable senators may be concerned and mystified about this business of futurology, or whatever it may be called. It has all sorts of names, and perhaps one of its greatest problems is that we have not come up with a good name.

Senator Perrault: Brand X.

Senator Grosart: "Futurology" sounds a little bit like astrology. "Futuristics" is an attempt to make it sound scientific. Some have even called it "futuribles," stressing the many alternatives which are essential in this area. It has even been called stoxology, the science of conjecture; mellology, the science of the future, and alleotics, the science of change.

Senator Choquette: Has anybody tried to call it "futility"?

Senator Grosart: Yes, as a matter of fact. I spoke of alternatives, and this is very definitely one of the approaches we are taking—that is, to look at the alternatives. One of the alternatives, of course, is futility, but the one on the side of which the world has come down is utility.

Senator Perrault: The future of your party.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Grosart: The description that is most commonly used now is the science of futures. It is in the plural to stress the fact that we must think in terms of many futures. The old idea of sitting down in a group and saying, "This is what we must do" or, "This is where we will wind up," has gone. Today, futures looks at the present—that is, here—and assesses it, the future—where will we go? Where should we go?

The best analogy I have is automobile headlights. It is a question of lighting up the road ahead. The better the lights, the more certain will be your progress along that road. A good example in the same general metaphor can be taken from the experience of the American automobile companies, a classic example of bad planning because of a poor disciplinary position in respect of futures forecasting. We all recall that the automobile companies were given the message some years ago when the small European cars were being imported in substantial quantities into the United States. The automobile companies just did not get the message. The message, of course, was that gasoline prices were going to rise; that people were going to be concerned with the cost of getting from here to there. As somebody has said, had they spent a little more time on a futures scenario than on tail fins, they would not have run into the problem that they did.

That is a perfect case of the proper use of the science of the futures. Had there been a full expert examination of futures five years ago, the OPEC situation would have been anticipated. That would have been a perfect futures exercise. It did not happen, but it is inconceivable that the right kind of exercise in this field would have missed that possibility, because it was always there.

I will not go into any further discussion except to make one distinction that I think is important, and that is the distinction between the predictive approach in futures and the normative. The predictive approach is merely the extrapolating from what we know now what is going to happen. This, with due respect to Senator Lamontagne, who is a member of the Club of Rome, can wind up with the doomsters' approach. In other words, if we keep on going the way we are, we are all going to a collective hell.

The normative approach looks ahead and asks: What should be the future? What possible futures are there that would be publicly acceptable, that are desirable? This, again, is the here-to-there approach.

In other words, what we are doing in this discipline is asking: Where are we? Where are we going? It is as simple as that, but as sophisticated as the science has become.

Senator Choquette: What is the answer? Where are we going and at what cost?

Senator Greene: We are not going home.

Senator Grosart: I do not know the answer. If I or anyone else knew where we are going, we would not need futurology; we would not need this Senate; we would not need governments. We could just say, "This is where we are going. It is inevitable. We cannot do anything about it, so let's just give up."

I would like to indicate that this is not an astrology type of discipline. To give one example, Senator Culver—who is known to many members of this house, and one of the key figures in the Canada-U.S. exchanges—when he was a member of the House of Representatives, introduced a motion which required that all committees of the House of Representatives develop a futures research and forecasting capability, and that is now in the rules of the House of Representatives. There is a futures branch in the Congressional Library. The Aviation Forecast Board of the Federal Aviation Administration has actually set up a study called "Alternative Aviation Worlds for 2000."

● (1600)

As I said, there is no national commission on futures anywhere in the world. Ours, we hope, will be the first. There are, however, state commissions in the United States. Hawaii was the first; it has had a commission operating successfully for some years. There is one called the "Washington Alternatives"; another called "Minnesota Futures"; there is "Goals for Dallas"; and another one called, "California Tomorrow."

It is a practical science, and I am sure none of us on the committee regrets the opportunity we have had to learn something about it, and apply it to our own duties here in the Senate and elsewhere.

I think I speak for the committee when I say that for all these reasons, in agreeing to transfer our mandate to this other body, we wish it the very best of success. We will follow the program with great interest.

Perhaps I might conclude with a small caveat. One of the concerns I have about the success of the institute in this field is that it may not fully get the message of the importance of public participation in any discussion of the future. Senator Lamontagne used the phrase "participatory democracy." In the short time we were able to look at this problem we discovered that not one single thing is more important than to make sure that there is public participation on a wide scale. Future alternatives imposed from the top are useless. They must come up from a broad consensus of the public. The institute may have a tendency to be elitist, but I hope not. I can only pass on to them through this medium this statement of Johan Galtung, one of the outstanding men in this field, who said:

It is hard to imagine a field where elitism is more dangerous than in futures research.

With the regrets I have expressed, honourable senators, and hopes for the future, I support the report and commend it to the Senate for approval at this time.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few brief remarks on the future mandate rather than the mandate of the futures which, if the committee's report is accepted, will become the mandate of the past.

As Senator Lamontagne has pointed out, this recommendation has come about because the mandate has actually been transferred to another body. As we take on a new mandate, I think it is useful for us to remind ourselves at this time of the background against which this new mandate is being sought. The outline of this mandate can be found in the earlier reports of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy, published in 1970 to 1973. In the first place, I should like to draw attention to chapter 10 of volume 1, published in 1970. That chapter is headed: "The Need for an Overall Science Policy," and on page 283 the chapter is summarized as follows:

CONCLUSION

To attain the economic objectives of the first generation science policy, we put the emphasis on science and government laboratories, in the hope that they would foster new industrial technology. This strategy failed. When it came to social objectives, we made another strategic mistake. We believed that we could succeed merely by devoting huge sums of money to them.

Every year we are building more schools, more universities; we are providing easier access to education. And yet we have more student unrest and more parental concern that our children are not getting an adequate preparation for real life.

We are spending large sums to improve housing conditions, but our cities are becoming more and more crowded and inhuman. We are spending over three billion dollars every year on social security—

It is up to $5 billion or more now.

—but the poor are becoming relatively poorer and more and more restless as they live, through television or otherwise, closer to affluence. We are building more hospitals and providing for free hospitalization and better medical care, but a greater number of people die of incurable diseases, and the mysterious diseases of the mind are spreading.

Our obvious failure to cope with our collective problems forces us to recognize that we do not even understand the true nature and the real dimensions of most of these difficulties. In other words, we are just beginning to realize that we have seriously neglected to support research and development activities in these crucial sectors. No wonder they still remain so puzzling and so frustrating to us.

Honourable senators, when the Institute for Research on Public Policy was created it was my hope that they would give priority to these problems, which we outlined in our first report and to which I have just referred. Unfortunately, that is not now going to be the case, because that body will be occupied with other matters—in fact, with the mandate that was given to us—so this big void still remains to trouble us. I think one of the duties of the committee will be to point out to the government that here is this tremendous problem being neglected, and try to find out what plans they have or what they intend to do about it.

The first report of the committee, published in 1970, also pointed out that Canada is still employing an industrial strategy that is 100 years old, and designed for another age and for other conditions. This strategy still rests mainly on the twin pillars of exploitation and export of natural resources, together with a fragmented branch plant secondary industry existing behind a wall of high tariff protection. It is within this type of industrial strategy that Canada's science policy, such as it is, has been developed, and the committee found it had many deficiencies. For example, our national R & D effort was a fragmented policy divided mainly between government, industry and the universities, each sector going its own sweet way oblivious of the existence of the others. Senator Lamont-tagne referred to them as the three solitudes. In addition, some R & D was also being carried out by the provinces.

There was no co-ordination, no integration, no consultation whatsoever between the various sectors, not even between the various government departments that make up the public sector. The emphasis was mainly on pure and fundamental research, particularly in the universities, with self-perpetuating programs of ever-widening scope and generalization, and no provision for termination after goals had been achieved, or even after it was clear that the program was doomed to failure—in fact, no criteria whereby a program would be judged, as to whether goals had been accomplished or could not be achieved.

The committee found there was no inventory of R & D programs and no science budget, and therefore no means of determining the overall annual expenditures. There was no way of determining what programs were redundant or how much overlapping existed. There was no adequate fund of science and technical information in Canada about what goes on either at home or abroad. In my opinion, that situation still exists.

● (1610)

Furthermore, the committee found that too much research and development was being done in government laboratories and too little in industry. In this respect, Canada stood in marked contrast with other advanced countries where most research and development is performed by industry—70 per cent in the United States, Sweden and the United Kingdom, compared to 35 per cent in Canada. Moreover, Canada relied more heavily on the academic sector for the performance of scientific research. The figure is 25 per cent for Canada, compared to 12 per cent for the United States and 7 per cent for the United Kingdom.

The best estimate of the total expenditures at that time—that is, in 1973—was about $1.25 billion in Canada. These funds were divided in the ratio of 61 per cent for scientific research and 39 per cent for technical development, whereas in the United States, the United Kingdom, Switzerland and Sweden the proportions were reversed. Furthermore, in Canada very rarely did science research lead to technical development and innovation resulting in new products, thus contributing to the economy and the gross national product, whereas other countries derived as much as 65 per cent of their GNP from technological development and innovation.

In Volumes 2 and 3 of their report, the committee made certain recommendations to remedy this state of affairs, and outlined the kind of organization they believed essential to make the remedy effective. Now, as I conceive it, our new mandate will enable us to go back and check these points again, and see how far the picture has changed. For that reason I have much pleasure in supporting the adoption of this report.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, if no one else wishes to participate in this debate, I would like to thank those who have participated already, and more particularly Senator Grosart for all the compliments he paid me—some of them undeserved, I am sure. I am very grateful for what he had to say about my role as a member and chairman of the committee.

Without any other consideration or addition to what I have already said, I move that this report be adopted.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have been informed that Senator Flynn would like this debate adjourned on his behalf. Therefore, on behalf of Senator Flynn, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, July 21, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I wish to apologize for having been unable to obtain the necessary information to make the usual statement of business in store for next week, due to the uncertainty which prevailed until a few moments ago as to what was in store for us this week and, more so, next week. However, I can briefly say that next week we will endeavour to dispose of the items remaining on the Orders of the Day, and deal with the two bills which are expected from the other place.

In deciding to adjourn today until Monday evening, we have taken into consideration the views expressed earlier by both leaders in this house before the doors were opened. We have been unable to accept the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition to adjourn until Tuesday evening with the possibility of recalling the Senate earlier—that is, on Monday—if necessary, by sending telegrams to senators on Saturday evening. Having regard to the present heat wave, it is expected that honourable senators will enjoy a long weekend, and it might be quite difficult, if not impossible, to reach them by telegram as late as Saturday evening. Even if it were possible to reach them at that time, some of those living at the extremities of our large country would be unable to find accommodation for travel to Ottawa in time for Monday evening.

There is also this other consideration, that today we have referred one bill to a committee, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is quite possible that the two bills which are expected from the other place early next week will have to be referred to that same committee, so it will have quite a lot of work on its hands next week. Consequently, we have thought it desirable to provide ample time for that committee to sit, if necessary, on Monday and Tuesday.

I was informed only a few moments ago that it is quite possible the other place will not take more than two days next week to dispose of the legislation which is scheduled to come to us before we adjourn for the summer recess. This means that we should get those measures by Tuesday evening or, at the latest, Wednesday. Therefore, I think we need Monday and Tuesday for committee meetings to deal with legislation presently on the Order Paper and that which may come from the other place.

With this in mind, and having duly considered the views expressed by both leaders earlier today, we have come to the conclusion that it would be advisable not to sit tomorrow, but to adjourn until Monday evening instead of Tuesday evening. I commend this motion to the house.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, July 21, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 1212)

CROP INSURANCE PROGRAMS—REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Thursday, July 17, 1975.

On March 20, 1975, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture in accordance with its terms of reference undertook an examination of crop insurance programs in Canada. The committee now seeks to inform the Senate of its progress and to make some recommendations for changes in certain aspects of the crop insurance programs in Canada.

After many years of consideration and numerous studies the Crop Insurance Act was passed by Parliament in 1959 to provide assistance to the provinces in making all risk crop insurance available to the farmers of Canada. The Act has been amended four times since that date, in 1964, 1966, 1971 and 1973, to improve the quality of the crop insurance offered and to permit its extension to greater numbers of farmers. Crop insurance is now available in every province in Canada and to most of the farmers of Canada. This progress, this federal-provincial co-operation, in providing an essential program to the farmers of Canada should be applauded.

The purpose of crop insurance is to provide protection to the farmer against crop losses caused by natural hazards beyond his control. It provides the insured farmer a guarantee of a specified number of production units (bushels, pounds, etc.) of a specified grade for the insured crop. If production falls below the level of the guarantee and if the cause of the shortfall is a specified peril then the farmer is paid an indemnity on the loss of production. The guarantee can not exceed eighty percent of the average yield and it is designed to return to the farmer the costs of production for the crop lost.

The federal and provincial governments provide assistance to the farmers in covering the cost of crop insurance. The Crop Insurance Act contains two federal-provincial funding formulae. The first provides for the equal sharing by the two levels of government of the costs of administering the plan and for the participation of the two governments and the farmer in paying the premium costs on the basis of twenty-five percent by the federal government, twenty-five percent by the provincial government, and fifty percent by the farmer. The second formula provides that the federal government and the farmer will share the premium costs and that the province will pay the costs of administration. The farmers of Canada are thus able to participate in a crop insurance program at a reasonable cost and since 1973, when the formulae were altered to reduce that cost to the fifty percent level the number of farmers participating has increased considerably.

Crop insurance is a valuable program and more and more farmers each year have been permitted to participate and have chosen to participate. For example, in 1971, when crop insurance was available in all the provinces except Newfoundland and New Brunswick, 46,326 farmers participated and a liability of 130.9 million dollars of coverage was carried. In 1974, with crop insurance available in all provinces, 84,781 farmers participated and a liability of 657.2 million dollars was carried. Expectations are that in the current year over 100,000 farmers will participate and that total coverage will exceed 955 million dollars.

Crop insurance has grown, it has been accepted, but how well does a program designed and developed fifteen years ago primarily for the Prairies meet the needs of farmers all across Canada today? It was this question that motivated your committee to undertake a review of the crop insurance programs in Canada. This examination is not complete, there are several important problems to which the committee wishes to give further consideration. These include the existing loan assistance and reinsurance provisions, the suitability of the present crop insurance legislation in relation to the smaller provinces, the possibility of extending crop insurance legislation to include livestock insurance, and the relationship between crop insurance and income insurance.

There are some problems with crop insurance that the committee believes should be brought to the attention of the Senate, the federal and provincial governments and the public and about which the committee desires to make some recommendations. These include the variation between provincial programs in the rates of interest charged on the late payment of premiums, the existing spot loss coverage, and the lack of uniformity across provincial borders of insurance programs for crops produced under similar conditions.

Your committee is concerned about the penalties levied upon the failure to pay crop insurance premiums on time. It believes that a penalty should be assessed for late payment and that a discount should be given for prompt payment and it recognizes that the crop insurance agencies should not be considered as credit granting institutions. However, your committee has concluded that the variation in the interest rates charged across Canada is too great and that some rates are clearly out of line. For example, in the Provinces of Manitoba and Prince Edward Island the delinquent insured is charged at a simple interest rate of six percent on the unpaid balance while in the Province of Saskatchewan the insured can be charged, if he fails to pay before December 1st, a penalty of fifteen percent of the unpaid balance, that is an effective rate of 4.3 percent per month for the period August 15th to December 1st. Such a monthly rate is clearly unjustifiable, as is that charged in the Province of Alberta which is an effective rate of 2.9 percent.

Your committee therefore recommends:

That the provincial crop insurance agencies give serious consideration to charging on the unpaid balance of the insured's crop insurance premium an interest rate of no higher than twelve percent per annum simple interest.

When they appeared before the committee the crop insurance agencies of Alberta, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick recommended that spot loss coverage be widened to meet the needs of the farmers in their provinces. The spot loss option covers damage by a specific peril to a portion of the insured's crop regardless of whether production of that crop exceeds the guarantee or not. Without this type of coverage farmers can experience severe losses and not receive compensation. At present it is applicable to two associated perils, hail and fire, and it is fully available in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, and available in a limited form in Ontario and British Columbia. In Saskatchewan spot loss coverage for hail is included in the all risk contract, while in Manitoba and Alberta it is an option for which the farmer pays an additional premium. In the latter two provinces farmers in considerable numbers have accepted the innovation; for example, in Manitoba fifty percent of contracts carried the spot loss option in 1974 and it is expected that over sixty percent will do so in 1975.

The agencies from Alberta, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick believe that the farmers in their provinces would be willing to purchase, indeed are desirous of purchasing, spot loss coverage for other perils. The Alberta Hail and Crop Insurance Corporation recommended that damage due to excessively early frost, to the flooding of creeks, rivers and lakes where the area affected exceeds ten acres, to insects for which no control technology is commercially available at the time of the outbreak, and to wild life damage, be included in the approved list. The New Brunswick Crop Insurance Commission recommended that damage to the potato crop due to washouts and to flooding be included.

Other witnesses appearing before the committee expressed their concern that the crop insurance program should not be imperilled by the hasty extension of the spot loss options. After considering these suggestions for the extension of spot loss coverage on the one hand and the statements of caution on the other, your committee therefore recommends:

That the federal and provincial departments of agriculture and the crop insurance agencies undertake joint research projects on specific perils to decide how they might best be included under spot loss coverage.

Another problem area that the committee is concerned about is the variation between the programs within the regions of Canada. To date the committee has given particular attention to this problem in relation to the Prairie region but it recognizes that variations do exist in the Maritimes and it will be giving further attention to these Maritime problems as previously mentioned.

In the Prairie region the provincial programs differ in at least three important aspects: the calculation of individual coverage adjustments, the magnitude of premium discounts, and the setting of dollar options.

In Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta the individual's basic coverage is calculated on an area average and then adjusted to take into account the insured's experience with crop production. To make these adjustments in coverage the crop insurance agencies have developed formulae that use the accumulated loss to premium ratio and the number of no loss years. However, the formula of each province is different and the variations that result are significant. The maximum reduction in basic coverage due to bad experience ranges from sixty per cent in Alberta to thirty per cent in Saskatchewan to fifteen per cent in Manitoba and the maximum increase in coverage for good experience ranges from fifteen per cent in Saskatchewan to twenty-seven per cent in Manitoba to thirty per cent in Alberta.

The differences in premium discounts are not of the same magnitude but they are still significant. In Alberta where the insured receives a discount for good experience, for prompt payment and for a large insured acreage, the maximum discount on the premium is forty-five per cent. This can be obtained after seven no-loss years on an insured acreage of over nine hundred acres. In Saskatchewan after eleven no-loss years and upon prompt payment, the maximum premium discount is fifty-five per cent. In Manitoba the maximum premium discount is the gross premium less five per cent on units of three hundred acres or more, less forty per cent of the balance after nine no-loss years, or a total discount of forty-three per cent of the gross premium.

The final area of variation between these programs that we shall consider here is perhaps the most important—the variation in dollar value options. Crop insurance is a production guarantee and it is based on losses in bushels or pounds, not in value. However, because indemnities cannot be paid in kind and because premiums must be calculated on value and, further, because the agencies like to encourage maximum producer participation by having flexible programs, each year values are set for each crop for the purposes of calculating premiums and indemnities and to allow producers a choice of coverage. In recent years the dollar values or unit prices in the Prairie region have begun to differ considerably and this has resulted in an imbalance in the choices available to producers, as the following table illustrates.

Unit Prices on Selected Crops

| Crop | Manitoba | | Saskatchewan | | Alberta | |
|--------------|----------|--------|--------------|--------|---------|--------|
| | 1974 | 1975 | 1974 | 1975 | 1974 | 1975 |
| Spring Wheat | $1.50 | $1.85 | $1.50 | $1.50 | $1.50 | $1.50 |
| | $2.25 | $2.75 | $2.25 | $2.25 | $2.50 | $2.50 |
| | | | | | | $3.50 |
| Oats | $.60 | $.75 | $.50 | $.50 | $.60 | $.60 |
| | $1.00 | $1.25 | $1.00 | $1.00 | $.90 | $.90 |
| | | | | | | $1.20 |
| Barley | $.85 | $1.05 | $.90 | $.90 | $.80 | $.80 |
| | $1.40 | $1.75 | $1.40 | $1.40 | $1.40 | $1.40 |
| | | | | | | $2.00 |
| Fall Rye | $.94 | $1.20 | $.90 | $.90 | $1.00 | $1.00 |
| | $1.50 | $1.85 | $1.40 | $1.40 | | $1.75 |
| | | | | | | $2.25 |
| Rapeseed | $2.00 | $2.50 | $2.00 | $2.00 | $2.00 | $2.00 |
| | $3.00 | $3.75 | $3.00 | $3.00 | $3.00 | $3.00 |
| | | | | | | $5.00 |
| Flaxseed | $2.25 | $2.25 | $2.50 | $2.50 | $2.00 | $2.00 |
| | $3.00 | $5.00 | $3.50 | $3.50 | $3.00 | $3.00 |
| | | | | | | $5.00 |

We have discussed these variations in the crop insurance programs of the Prairie region only briefly. However, it is clear that the farmers of each Prairie province do not have access to a crop insurance program that is in these three important aspects the same as that available in the other two provinces even though the crops, the climate, the farming practices, the costs of production and the markets of the producers in all three provinces are quite similar.

These differences between programs affect farmers differently. For example, the recently instituted higher third dollar option in Alberta provides to new farmers with high fixed costs and to farmers using inputs intensively a protection that is not available to farmers in Saskatchewan or Manitoba. And the fifteen percent maximum on the reduction of coverage for producers with a continuing record of loss years and high loss to premium ratios provides a much higher level of coverage to producers in Manitoba than is available to producers with a similar record in either Saskatchewan or Alberta.

These comparisons are not intended as criticism but as examples of the committee's point that there are wide variations between the programs that the committee believes to be unjustified and unnecessary. Your committee therefore recommends:

That within regions of similar soils, climate, and production practices, it is desirable that the producers of a crop should have access to crop insurance which is essentially the same, especially in the important areas of minimum and maximum coverage levels, premium discounts and dollar value options;

That where there is not a uniformity in the crop insurance offered to producers within the same region that the Director of Crop Insurance for Canada undertake to encourage the crop insurance agencies of the provinces in that region to harmonize their programs and to provide equality of access to a uniformly high quality of crop insurance; and,

That regional meetings of the boards of directors crop insurance agencies be held from time to time to encourage the development of a uniformity of crop insurance coverage within a region.

Your committee has held and will continue to hold hearings on this topic. When it began its examination the committee invited the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture and the federal and provincial crop insurance agencies to appear before it to present their views on the present crop insurance program and to make any suggestions for improvements in it that they might care to make. In response to this invitation your committee has heard from the Director of Crop Insurance for Canada, Mr. G. M. Gorrell, and from the crop insurance agencies for the Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. In addition, the Minister of Agriculture of British Columbia, the Honourable David D. Stupick, has forwarded to the committee a brief. The ministers of agriculture and the crop insurance agencies of the Provinces of Newfoundland, Ontario and Quebec declined the committee's invitation to appear. The witnesses who have appeared and the briefs that have been received have provided the committee with much valuable information and with many interesting suggestions for improvements in the crop insurance program. Your committee wishes to thank the witnesses for their cooperation.

Respectfully submitted,

Hazen Argue,
Chairman.

APPENDIX "B"

(See p. 1219)

THE SPRUCE BUDWORM PROBLEM

POSITION STATEMENT PREPARED BY DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT

1. SCOPE OF PROBLEM

The spruce budworm is a native of the northern ever-green forests of North America. When fir-spruce forest mature over large areas and if spring weather is warm and dry, populations may explode to epidemic proportions within a few short years. Such an epidemic if left uncontrolled will result in extensive tree mortality after 3 to 4 years. We are now in the midst of such an outbreak that covers about 112 million acres of fir-spruce forest in Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes and Newfoundland.

This explosive increase in budworm abundance is not the first time that a budworm outbreak has swept through the region. Historical records show that outbreaks have occurred at irregular intervals over the past 2 centuries. These outbreaks are natural phenomena. The high budworm population, by killing the mature overstory of trees, contributes to its own collapse and provides ideal conditions for the development of a new stand of fir-spruce which again sets the stage for another outbreak in 40 to 50 years. Man in utilizing the forest pre-empting the role of the insect and interferes with the natural phenomena of growth and replacement. Most budworm-prone forests are valuable to man both for fibre and recreation but, in the budworm, he is faced with a very strong competitor. Surveys of tree mortality show that close to 500 million cords of fir-spruce have been killed by the budworm in this century. This is enough wood to sustain the current annual harvest for 30 years in eastern Canada. Some of this wood killed by the budworm would not have been utilized and, in the more accessible areas some could have been salvaged within two years. But clearly the budworm can cause serious setbacks to established industries that contribute, as in New Brunswick, up to 20% of the economic activity of the province. In eastern Canada approximately 16 million cords of pulpwood alone are harvested annually. This quantity of wood provides direct employment for about 90,000 workers who receive nearly $960 million in wages and salaries. This means that each cord of pulpwood generates approximately $60 in wages.

In addition to direct economic losses, most of the massive forest fires in eastern Canada can be attributed to the presence of budworm killed trees over large areas.

2. EFFECTIVENESS AND EFFICIENCY OF CHEMICAL CONTROL

Sustained large-scale forest spraying operations against the spruce budworm in Canada began in 1952 on 52,000 acres in New Brunswick. With almost no interruption multi-million acre spray operations have continued to the present in efforts to keep productive forest alive. More recently, widespread infestations have required control measures of gigantic proportion, 10,000,000 acres in Quebec and 6,000,000 acres in New Brunswick in 1975.

The provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick have been the prime proponents of control measures because of the prominent position of forestry in their economies. Ontario has been less active in this respect because of lesser importance of the susceptible fir-spruce forest to its forest industry. Decisions for control action by provincial authorities are complex and depend upon the relative importance of the infested forest as a source of fibre, aesthetic values and because of the greater risk of fire in budworm killed forests. Surveys of insect and forest conditions conducted in part by the Canadian Forestry Service are used to determine the areas requiring insect control action. The danger of widespread tree mortality is of prime concern in these decisions and control measures are intended to be a holding action to keep the forest alive through the period of infestation; a strategy which has succeeded in the long history of control programs in New Brunswick and shows promise in the relatively recent programs in Quebec.

The early control programs were achieved using small aircraft and DDT. The undesirable effects on fish and birds were responsible for the creation of a research program to develop improved techniques which would be compatible with environmental balance. Cooperation between federal fisheries, wildlife, health and forestry agencies together with provincial governments and industry has produced materials and techniques which do not present an unacceptable hazard to the ecosystem if properly applied. Highly effective short-lived chemicals have been selected from hundreds of toxicological test. Of these, member of the organo-phosphate and carbamate families of chemicals have been most successful.

In recent years, work by Canadian Forestry Service scientists in cooperation with the Province of Quebec has resulted in a number of innovations which have further improved the efficiency of large-scale insect control programs. Larger aircraft such as the DC-6 carrying 2500 gallons and equipped with apparatus designed for fine spray breakup deliver an even distribution of material while electronic guidance systems ensure proper positioning of the aircraft. These improvements result in good insect control with vastly reduced dosages which lessen the risk of harm to the environment. The current research by the Canadian Forestry Service and the Province of New Brunswick on spruce budworm moth migration using radar detection is expected to provide additional control opportunities. The development of techniques to combine minute amounts of chemicals with known pathogens promises to reduce chemical dosages even further.

In spite of an intensive search for alternatives, the application of chemical insecticides will continue to be a necessary strategy for the conservation and preservation of forested areas whether for purposes of fibre supply, aesthetics, recreation or the protection of watersheds. The consequences of inaction are much too destructive both economically and ecologically to be acceptable.

3. THE SCOPE AND EFFECTIVENESS OF ENVIRONMENTAL MONITORING

Before an insecticide is introduced as a forest management tool it is examined through a series of laboratory, field and operational trials for efficacy against the spruce budworm and also for its potential for creating environmental hazards. Basic data are also required on a wide variety of laboratory mammals, birds, fish and other organisms before the insecticide can be considered for operational use as a spruce budworm control agent. This work is in large measure the responsibility of the chemical manufacturers but the investigations are extended by Canada Forestry Service scientists as required.

It is then necessary to extend the toxicological data to fauna occurring naturally in the forest and to measure the effects of the material and its residues on the forest ecosystem. Scientists within the Department of the Environment are charged with these responsibilities. The data are then scrutinized by experts from various agencies of the Department including the Canadian Wildlife Service, Fisheries Service, Environmental Protection Service, Canadian Forestry Service, as well as experts from the Departments of Agriculture and Health and Welfare. About three years of intensive investigation on environmental hazards are required before a material is cleared for registration and use under the Pest Control Products Act which is administered by Agriculture Canada.

Continual monitoring of operational pesticide applications for possible deleterious effects on non-target forest organisms is carried out by Department of the Environment scientists in cooperation with Provincial agencies. The Canadian Forestry Service, in particular, maintains constant surveillance of materials on operational use with close attention to small forest songbirds, small mammals and fish as well as the presence of chemical residues. Although the monitoring facilities within the department are augmented by the provinces, the sum total of environmental monitoring falls far short of that required in view of the massive forest insect control operations currently underway in Canada.

4. POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVES TO THE WIDESPREAD USE OF CHEMICALS

The possible alternatives to the widespread application of chemical insecticides are the use of biological agents, such as the introduction of parasites or pathogens, the use of naturally occurring chemicals which interfere with normal growth and behaviour, the early detection and suppression of incipient outbreaks, and modified techniques of forest management.

Classical biological control, the introduction of foreign predators and parasites, has been successfully applied to control some introduced insect pests. But the budworm is native to North America and is well adapted to his habitat which includes some 90 species of parasites and numerous predators. Attempts to manipulate these and to introduce new enemies of the budworm have so far been unsuccessful.

ful. However, because of the potential of this technique, the search for new parasites and predators continues.

The spruce budworm is attacked by a number of natural disease organisms and Canadian Forestry Service scientists are exploring means of manipulating these as control agents. The bacterium, Bacillus thuringiensis (B.t.) is the most promising of the known budworm diseases. It has given adequate control in some trials, but its success has been erratic. Formulations of B.t. are now commercially available, but only in limited quantities. They are considerably more expensive than conventional insecticides and their use is therefore limited to areas where the additional cost is justified. Naturally occurring viral diseases are also under investigation, but none of the known viruses is as effective as chemical insecticides. Even if more virulent forms are found their operational use would depend upon the development of methods of commercial production. Insect growth regulators are chemicals which at appropriate concentrations disturb the insect's normal physiological processes. They are currently being evaluated under field conditions. A sex attractant, recently identified by Canadian Forestry Service scientists, has potential for disrupting normal mating behaviour and will undergo its first field trial in 1975. Chemosterilants which render the insect sterile are known, but are considered too dangerous to other forms of life to be considered as alternatives. A longer term approach is aimed at predicting when and where outbreaks will occur, so that they can be suppressed in the initial phase.

Control of the spruce budworm by forest management was first suggested some 50 years ago. The principle appears very simple but there are some serious problems in its application. For example, it would require at least one crop rotation, about 60 years, to achieve a noticeable change in the age distribution or species composition. The planned changes would have to be implemented over large areas regardless of ownership and this would be most difficult. Thus, intensive forest management today would not produce an immediate solution. But it is a long-term solution that will become increasingly effective as full utilization of budworm-prone forests is approached and stand structure can be manipulated through a well-planned cutting program.

While all of these techniques offer some promise, none is likely to be the solution to the budworm problem. Possibly, as they become available for operational use, their effectiveness can be increased by incorporating them, together with chemical insecticides, in some form of integrated control.

There is room for considerable refinement in the strategy of budworm control. For too long the emphasis has been on protecting the resource with no clear definition of what the resources are and which need protecting. A clear definition of requirements for fibre production, recreation and aesthetic values is needed. Control programs could then be implemented from a firmer benefit-cost base. To aid the forest manager in such decisions, a computer simulation model is under development and test by scientists of the Canadian Forestry Service and the University of British Columbia. Given adequate inventory and utilization data on all aspects of the resource, the model will be able to provide valuable predictions of the outcome of the various strategies available to the forest manager. In the short term, however, chemical insecticides will remain the manager's principal weapon for protecting trees from the spruce budworm.

THE SENATE

Monday, July 21, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Dinsdale had been substituted for that of Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

PRIVATE BILL

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (RICHARD FRITZ AND MARIANNE STRASS)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-1001, to provide an exception from the general law relating to marriage in the case of Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Azellus Denis, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be now read the second time.

He said:

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of another bill that was unanimously approved in the other place. I am especially pleased because Bill C-1001 will permit the marriage of two people who love each other and want to unite their lives.

Senator Bourget: Hopefully.

Senator Denis: But they are prevented from doing so because of the degree of consanguinity.

Richard Fritz, 32, and Marianne Strass, 25, both Roman Catholics, residing in the province of Quebec, are uncle and niece and therefore their marriage is prohibited by the Civil Code of the province of Quebec. However, the degree of consanguinity is mitigated because the parties involved are not truly uncle and niece, but half-uncle and half-niece only.

Indeed, Marianne Strass is the daughter of Robert Strass, and Richard Fritz is Robert's brother, but by his mother only, so they are half-uncle and half-niece.

Honourable senators, I will simply state that preliminary to the introduction of the bill, legal, religious and medical authorities were consulted.

During consideration of the bill in committee, legal authorities will determine that as far as marriage is concerned, the federal government has an exclusive jurisdictional right. You will also learn that the interested parties have obtained a dispensation from the religious authorities to allow the solemnization of marriage. Finally, you will see the advice of a medical expert in genetics establishing that the couple involved are in good health and that their consanguinity will not impair their ability to have healthy children more than in a marriage between cousins.

As far as the federal jurisdiction is concerned, honourable senators, allow me to refer you to the British North America Act, sections 91 and 129, of which I will quote the relevant parts.

Section 91 states the following and I quote:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next herein-after enumerated; that is to say,—

And in this enumeration, one may read the following item at subsection 26:

Marriage and divorce.

Section 129 says that except as otherwise provided in the act, all laws in force in Canada—at the Union—shall continue to be maintained in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as if the Union had not been made. But the Parliament of Canada, or the Legislature of the province concerned, could, according to the authority granted under this act, abrogate, repeal, abolish or alter such legislation, as the case may be.

But the Civil Code of the province of Quebec existed before Confederation. I therefore suggest that the Parliament of Canada has authority to adopt the bill now under study.

I submit that this bill be now adopted on second reading. Thus, you will be contributing to the happiness of two lovers who, thanks to you, will be able to marry legally and according to their faith. In your name as well as mine, I dare to wish them many children.

Senator Bourget: Very good.

● (2010)

[English]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Denis has certainly given an excellent explanation of this problem, and also what I might call a passionate plea for the two lovers involved. Let me say that I cannot think of a senator who could make a more appealing plea for two lovers than Senator Denis.

I see no problem in connection with this bill on the grounds of consanguinity, or on the question of the federal jurisdiction in this area. Senator Denis has made a very good case from both points of view. One problem, of course, remains. Why is an exception being made from the law as it stands—in this instance the Civil Law in Quebec—for a single case? This would indicate to me that a case might be made out before the committee to which Senator Denis has said this bill will be sent, for consideration of the law as it stands. I do not know whether any other province has a similar prohibition against marriage between an uncle and a niece, although in this case, of course, there are circumstances which make it not quite the normal uncle and niece relationship, as Senator Denis has explained. I would hope that this would be discussed in committee so that we might have some information why we have this law and why it should remain on the statute books of Quebec, and on the statute books of some other provinces, as I am told it may.

As one who has some connection with the Anglican religion, I can say that I have often wondered at the extraordinary prohibition against the marriage of a man to the sister of his deceased wife. On what grounds the Anglican Church prohibits that kind of marriage I have never been able to understand, but apparently there are reasons. This whole subject might be opened up and discussed in committee.

Honourable senators, having made those remarks I merely say that we have no objection to the bill's getting second reading and being referred to committee, as Senator Denis has suggested.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Denis speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Grosart for his kind words. If I did well, it is because I have a good case. Furthermore, as you can understand, the two lovers are in a hurry to get married. As far as this private bill is concerned, it may well be the starting point of a general law, since it is the wish of the Province of Quebec that a reference be made to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision on this type of problem. In any event, these two people, thanks to the Opposition as well as to the Government, will be very happy, and they will surely understand that even though some of us are old we know what it means for a husband and wife to spend a lifetime together, according to the law and the religious principles they believe in.

[Senator Denis.]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Denis moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move, seconded by Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière), that rule 95, whereby a private bill originating in the House of Commons shall not be considered by a committee until twenty-four hours from the date of referral, be suspended with respect to the Bill C-1001, intitled: "An act to provide an exception from the general law relating to marriage in the case of Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass."

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I do not think the question of leave arises since rule 95 applies only to private bills originating in the Senate. This bill originated in the other place.

Senator Grosart: I think Senator Denis made it quite clear he was dealing with the twenty-four hour prohibition. He was not referring to the prohibition in rule 95 whereby, if a private bill originates in the Senate, there has to be one week's delay before it can be considered by a committee. As I understand the situation, Senator Denis asks that the second part of rule 95—that a private bill originating in the House of Commons should not go before a committee until after the lapse of twenty-four hours—should be suspended.

On this side we have no objection to that, but we feel that we should once again make clear the importance of the delay which is required in the case of private bills, whether they originate in the Senate or in the House of Commons. In the case of a bill originating in the Senate, the requirement is for a one-week delay before the committee can consider it.

Naturally, I am not at this time going to comment on the Speaker's decision in a matter such as this which we dealt with last week. I simply want to say that my understanding is that in a case of that kind, where there is a petition for a bill, that petition is still before us, because the bill which has been asked for—not the introduction of the bill, but the passage of the bill through the Senate and the House of Commons—is the issue. My suggestion is that some other rules might apply in this particular case, although it is not my intention to go back and discuss the decision in the other case.

However, I think it is of tremendous importance that we in the Senate generally observe rule 95, because it makes quite clear what the distinction is.

Senator Langlois: It does not apply.

Senator Grosart: It does apply, because rule 95 says:

—in the case of any such bill originating in the House of Commons, until twenty-four hours thereafter.

There you have examples of the two cases. If it is a Senate bill, then there is a delay of a week; if it is a House of Commons bill, then there is a delay of twenty-four hours. The reason is obvious. If a bill has been before the House of Commons, then the necessary time for anybody who might object to it to make representations to the committee has elapsed. In this case the bill has come from the House of Commons, and therefore the only stay would be one of twenty-four hours.

As I have said, we on this side have no objection to the motion that the requirement of a twenty-four hour delay be suspended in this particular case, but, honourable senators, it is very important that we do not make this a precedent. We had one case last week, and now we have another. In the particular case that Senator Denis has presented the very fact that there has been a dispensation from the Church—which would be inclined to be more strict, perhaps, than either the Civil Code or the federal law—is, I think, a consideration that we should take into our judgment in this matter. I repeat, we are not objecting to this, but we feel that it should not be made a general precedent. It so happens that in the case of the last three or four private bills, because they have come before us with some degree of time urgency, we have tended to agree to suspend our rule for the time being. I hope it will not be a precedent, but in this particular case we do not object.

● (2020)

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I am happy to hear such good advice from Senator Grosart. You may be sure that I would never dare to ask for the suspension of these rules at the beginning of a session, and if it were not the case of two lovers—

Senator Grosart: For two lovers, yes.

Senator Denis: We should do the right thing at the right time.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to mention that, with the kind cooperation of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and his party, and hoping that this would happen, I have arranged for a meeting of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee for tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock in room 356-S.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-70, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, with leave of the senate, I move that the bill be given second reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I first thank the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for his cooperation in allowing second reading of this bill to be proceeded with now. You will recall that on May 29 of this year I presented the third report of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. In its report the joint committee recommended that because of the very heavy administrative load facing the Public Service Staff Relations Board, it was imperative that some changes in its set-up be made without delay. The government has responded to this request, which was unanimous on the part of the joint committee members, and has introduced Bill C-70, which we are now considering. This bill will bring into law the changes that were requested.

I now offer a brief history of the joint committee's study of the Finkelman Report on the Public Service Staff Relations Act. In April of 1973 the Government of Canada asked Mr. Finkelman, Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and a very able public servant, to review the operations of his board and of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, with a view to recommending necessary changes. This act was passed in 1967 and has operated reasonably well. However, as we are all aware, the tensions that have developed over the last few years in the relationship between employer and employee in the Public Service have required a very careful review. As such, Mr. Finkelman prepared a report after several months of sittings, and it was tabled in the spring of 1974. In November 1974 a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was appointed to review Mr. Finkelman's recommendations.

This committee, of which I have the honour to be a co-chairman, has been actively engaged in holding hearings. It has held almost 40 public meetings, and called a wide range of witnesses representing both employers and employees, as well as witnesses from the private sector such as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers Association.

The committee is not yet prepared to present its final report. Many subjects require careful study, which the committee is now in the process of reviewing. Some of the topics and themes being considered, on which the committee will make recommendations—the list is by no means complete—are: confidential and managerial exclusions; designation; illegal strikes; pay research; classification; technological changes; lay-offs; training; pensions; and many other subjects of vital concern to both employers and employees. Honourable senators will see from that short list that the subjects under review are complex, and the committee is trying assiduously to come up with answers that hopefully will meet the exigencies of the current situation.

The bill before us represents a response to the interim report and the backlog of work to which I have referred. Mr. Finkelman repeatedly pointed out in his presentation to the committee, and also in his report, the incapacity of his board as presently constituted to carry the burden entrusted to it. He said there were a wide variety of administrative problems.

I quote as follows from the committee's report, which was presented to the Senate on May 29:

In his report to the Government, and with even greater emphasis in his supplementary representations to your Committee, the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board has expressed concern at the incapacity of the Board, as it is now structured, to carry the burden entrusted to it. This concern is expressed in his recent representations in the following terms:

The experience of the last year, and particularly of the last few months, has demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that it is becoming increasingly difficult for the Board as presently constituted to meet the demands that are made on it. If the Board is to be able to perform its functions both properly and in a timely fashion, no barriers should be erected to the effective use of all resources of the Board in relation to its responsibilities. Every member of the Board must expect to be, and be capable of being, fully utilized in relation to his inherent capabilities.

Honourable senators, the major change in the Public Service Staff Relations Act affects the constitution of the board. Most of the amendments are consequential upon that change, and involve a variety of follow-up changes.

Instead of having, as we now have, a Public Service Staff Relations Board composed of a chairman, a vice-chairman and three deputy chairmen, and all other members being part-time members, the bill provides that there be a chairman, a vice-chairman, not less than three deputy chairmen, and such other full-time members, and such part-time members, as may be required. The key is "such other full-time members as may be required."

● (2030)

These would then also assume the functions and powers of the chief adjudicator, the present adjudicators and the arbitration tribunal. They will all be invested with the present powers and functions of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, all of which functions are to be carried out by the full-time board.

Honourable senators, that basically explains the bill. It goes on to outline how the appointments are to be made. Members are to be appointed by—

Senator Choquette: Don't mention that. We know. Is there any end to Liberal appointees? Is there any end? I am asking a question. Is there any end to political Liberal appointees to these commissions? That is my question.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators—

Senator Choquette: Would you answer my question? Take your time.

Senator Buckwold: I will take lots of time. I am in no great hurry. As far as appointments are concerned, I defy the honourable senator to place a shadow on any appointment that has been made to the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Buckwold: In all of the hearings of this committee, on which there are both Government and Opposition members from the two Houses of Parliament, there was not one indication of any dissatisfaction with any member of the board.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Choquette: More applause. Isn't that noble?

Senator Buckwold: You are the one who asked the question. You are the noble knight of the evening.

Senator Choquette: Yes, and I said, "Isn't that noble?"

Senator Buckwold: I think that when the honourable senator asks a question such as that he should at least have a basis of reasonable doubt. I think I have answered his question by indicating that appointments to the Public Service Staff Relations Board have been apolitical. It could be that the honourable senator has some point to make with respect to other commissions. I am not discussing that. It may be, although I doubt it.

The mix of the board—

Senator Choquette: Again, gentlemen, more applause. We are giving you the signal.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, it would seem to me that when an important bill such as this is before the Senate the honourable member of the Opposition should allow the discussion to proceed in a reasonable fashion. With your permission, I should like to continue.

The members of this board are appointed by the Governor in Council from a list prepared by the chairman. The present chairman is Mr. Finkelman, and he will be replaced in due course by, I am sure, a very worthy successor. Mr. Finkelman, by the way, was unanimously lauded as chairman by members of the committee from both sides of the other place. Mr. Forrestall, a representative of the Progressive Conservative Party, and Mr. Knowles, a representative of the New Democratic Party, in the debate on this bill in the other place, both went to great lengths to expound on the very able leadership that has been provided by Mr. Finkelman.

In any event, the Governor in Council, from a list prepared by the chairman after consultation with representatives of the bargaining units—that is, both the employer and the employees—then makes a choice. I should also point out that the chairman himself has the right to suggest such names as he feels would be in the public interest, and these names are presented to the Governor in Council.

Senator Choquette: Isn't that wonderful!

Senator Buckwold: The new board will handle all third party responsibilities in collective bargaining. It will take over the role of the present board, the arbitration tribunal and the adjudicators. It will involve using the members in a variety of functions as required.

It has been pointed out that the mix is important. I want to assure honourable senators that this point was raised by Mr. Forrestall. The minister, in responding to it before the special joint committee that was reviewing the bill, assured the members that the mix of the board would allow a proper representation of all parties, as suggested during the hearings, and that the government would be very careful in making sure that adequate representation of the employer and employees would follow that kind of mix which has led to the high reputation of the board as it is presently constituted.

A second point raised by Mr. Forrestall—and I think rightly so—was in relation to one change in this bill from the original presentation to the committee. That change gives the chairman of the board the right in a particular dispute to name an outside arbitrator. I am sure all members of the committee were well satisfied with the response that it is sometimes necessary to have an outside arbitrator named. Senator Choquette will be glad to hear that the outside arbitrator is not named by the government, but by the board, and only in a particular circumstance and for a specific purpose, especially when time is of the essence in industrial disputes. For that reason, it was the unanimous feeling of the committee that this is a good amendment.

Honourable senators, Bill C-70 is a consolidation and re-organization of the relevant sections of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. Most of the amendments, as I have said, are consequential upon the combining of the jurisdictions of adjudication, arbitration, and board functions in a reconstituted full-time board. There are other amendments relating to appointment procedures and facilitating of the conduct of hearings.

As I have indicated, this bill has already been referred to and considered by the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, and I commend it to honourable senators for their approval.

Senator Choquette: Hear, hear!

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I may ask the sponsor of the bill one question. What will be the relationship of the continuing work of the joint committee of the two houses in relation to this bill, if and when it is passed?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, the committee has brought down only an interim report. As I indicated, there are many other major theme subjects which will be reported on, and recommendations made. The committee will continue until such time as it presents its final report. The answer to the honourable senator's question is that the reconstitution of the board in this manner will in no way affect the future operations of the committee.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the National Farm Products Marketing Council, including a statement of expenses, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 16 of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, Chapter 65, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of the Canadian Grain Commission for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 14 of the Canada Grain Act, Chapter 7, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Copies of Initial and Supplementary Federal-Provincial Agreements in respect of the establishment of a Comprehensive Marketing Program for the purpose of regulating the marketing of eggs in Canada.

Copies of National Energy Board Report, dated April 1975, entitled "Canadian Natural Gas, Supply and Requirements", together with a statement thereon by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Copies of documents relating to the Foreign Investment Review Act, issued by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as follows:

- (1) Foreign Investment Review (New Business) Regulations
- (2) Guidelines concerning Related Business
- (3) New Principles of International Business Conduct.

Copies of Report of the Task Force on Energy Research and Development to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, dated April, 1975, entitled "Science and Technology for Canada's Energy Needs".

Copies of correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Manitoba, dated February 24 and March 21, 1975, relating to publicity arrangements in respect of shared-cost programming in Manitoba.

● (2040)

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Senator Deschatelets, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the National Capital Region, presented the first report of the committee.

Thursday, July 17, 1975.

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the National Capital Region presents its first report as follows:

Your committee recommends that its quorum be fixed at eleven (11) members, provided that both houses are represented, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings to receive and authorize the printing of evidence, when a quorum is not present, so long as five (5) members are present, provided that both houses are represented.

Respectfully submitted.

Jean-Paul Deschatelets,
Joint Chairman.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be considered?

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(e), I move, seconded by Senator Hicks, that this report be adopted now.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, we have had an organization meeting and, upon our return this fall, we intend to hear all those who have views to express on the new national capital area. Intense publicity will be made during the summer with a view to allowing all organizations as well as provincial governments to be ready when we come back, so that we can get down to work.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[English]

UNITED NATIONS

CONFERENCE ON CRIME PREVENTION—STATUS OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AS PARTICIPANTS—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask the Leader of the Government on the matter of allowing the representatives of the Palestinian Liberation Organization to attend the forthcoming United Nations Conference on Crime Prevention, to be held in Toronto. As a matter of very great concern to many Canadians—

Senator Choquette: What Canadians?

Senator Buckwold:—my question is: Has the Canadian government made any decision in this regard?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can advise this chamber that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has advised the Secretary-General of the United Nations that Canada does not wish to proceed with the Fifth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders this year. He has sought the Secretary-General's cooperation in obtaining a postponement of the congress and he has undertaken to study the situation in order to clarify his position. In the government's view, this congress cannot be held successfully anywhere this year.

Honourable members are aware of the fact that at the fourth congress held in Kyoto, Japan, in 1970, the Government of Canada, in consultation with the Province of Ontario, proposed that the venue of the next congress be Toronto, in September of 1975. This proposal was accepted by delegations and subsequently confirmed by the General Assembly. Since that time, however, there has been a steady deterioration of the atmosphere in which international conferences are held. It need hardly be mentioned that this discord marred the sixth special session and the last regular session of the General Assembly, the recent conferences of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) and of the International Labour Organization (ILO) as well as the International Women's Year Conference in Mexico just a few weeks ago.

Whereas a minimum of cooperation is essential to any progress in the international field, it is the view of the Canadian government that we have witnessed lately excessive confrontation on issues that were not related to the subject matter of conferences. The ingredients are well-known: racialism in Southern Africa, the Middle East conflict, producer-consumer relations, and the full range of economic development problems subsumed under calls for a "New World Economic Order." Canada believes that these are very real and difficult problems which must be dealt with urgently, in the appropriate international institutions, before they poison the body politic of the United Nations family; and let there be no doubt that the government considers it necessary and desirable that political factors take their proper place even in the most technical of conferences. But, in the view of the government, they must meet some test of relevance and in recent United Nations conferences this has clearly not been the case.

[The Hon. the Speaker:]

In conclusion, may I say that honourable members are aware that in respect of the Toronto Congress on Crime Prevention, which was to take place next September, one of these issues had already become paramount. It arose from the resolution adopted in November 1974 by the General Assembly, with Canada dissenting, inviting the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) to attend its sessions as a permanent observer and, in a similar capacity, conferences convened under the auspices of the General Assembly or other organs of the United Nations. Accordingly, the Government of Canada was informed by the United Nations Secretariat some time ago that observers from the PLO had been invited to attend the Fifth Congress on Crime Prevention and that the Canadian authorities were expected to allow entry, sojourn and exit to these participants.

It is with reluctance that the government has decided to seek postponement of the congress, but we concluded that it would not be possible, in present circumstances, to hold a successful congress on crime prevention in Canada or anywhere else.

Honourable senators, I would propose, at tomorrow's sitting, that the complete statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, on this particular subject, be tabled.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government suggests that that statement be tabled tomorrow. Is there any reason why it should not be tabled this evening?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have the document here. It was my proposal to make individual copies available, between now and tomorrow, to all members of the Senate. I would be quite prepared to table it this evening, if the senator so desires.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it seems to be a matter on which there may be some discussion in the Senate. The mere tabling does not provide an opportunity for discussion of such a paper. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would consider moving the resolution by which this might be put on the Order Paper for discussion tomorrow. There is a resolution by which that can be achieved.

Senator Perrault: I will certainly take the proposal under consideration.

ENERGY

LIGHTING OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with your permission I would like to reply to the question by Senator Forsy regarding the conservation of energy in federal government buildings by cutting down lighting. This question was asked on March 10 of this year, as reported at page 606 of Hansard. I must apologize for the long time it has taken to evolve a reply, but I would like now to provide the following enlightenment.

In the fall of 1973, instructions were issued to all Regional Directors, outlining the measures to be taken to conserve energy in all crown-owned and crown-occupied buildings throughout the country. The Department of Public Works, in cooperation with its client departments, has been applying the guidelines suggested and has met with increasing success despite various problems that have arisen to interfere with their efficient application. Lights are turned off in all buildings housing government offices, where occupants have left for the night, with the following exceptions:

- a) buildings in which cleaning services and/or security sweeps are required to be carried out after occupants vacate, in which case lights are turned off by security staff when all operations have concluded or after operations have concluded in separate areas of the building, when switching arrangements permit.
- b) buildings having greenhouse operations, when lights are kept on in most of the buildings at night during the fall, winter and spring, when heat and light are required for experimental purposes.

This appears to be eminent good sense, to have lights on in a greenhouse.

- c) buildings in which occupants require at least partial lighting during unoccupied hours, for security reasons.
- d) buildings in which the Crown occupies leased space and building owners have elected to leave lights on after the occupants have left and cleaning operations have been concluded.

● (2050)

Much effort has been expended in trying to work out suitable arrangements to permit lights to be turned off in the Lester B. Pearson Building during the evening and early morning hours. However, one problem which has arisen in attempting to implement lighting conservation measures in this building has been the relatively large number of External Affairs Department employees who work in the evening and require adequate illumination. In other words, employees of the Department of External Affairs cannot be allowed to work in the dark.

In this connection, the switching arrangements do not permit the extinguishing of lights in other areas where illumination is not required. However, consultants were retained to investigate and submit a report on the feasibility of providing more flexibility and better control over switching arrangements. They have recommended the installation of a central control panel for lighting, and some additional modifications to the switching arrangements in the building. This report is currently under review and these measures may be implemented, if it can be determined that energy savings will be greater than the cost of the system.

Another problem encountered has been the difficulty of introducing "gang cleaning" where all the cleaning staff make a concerted effort in one area such as one floor, then extinguish the lights and move on to another area. From a management point of view, this method makes it difficult, if not impossible, to pinpoint areas of responsibility for unsatisfactory performance. From a cleaning staff point of view, "gang cleaning" denies the individual cleaner his own specific area to look after. In this connection, strong objections were raised by Public Service Alliance of Canada officials when the method was to be introduced in another building. It was therefore decided not to implement such measures in the Lester B. Pearson Building.

I conclude this long reply with a final paragraph.

It is the view of the Department of Public Works that it is more economical, irrespective of the type of lighting involved, if lights can be turned off when the building is not occupied. It must be recognized, nevertheless, that from a purely economical standpoint it may be less costly to provide illumination in some buildings on a 24-hour a day basis. This would be so in situations where security requirements of the occupying department, switching arrangements in the building for cleaning schedules, et cetera, might all have to be altered, incurring additional capital and/or operational costs which might more than offset any potential energy cost saving. It has been the Department of Public Works' experience that each building must be given individual consideration in the light of operational requirements of the occupying department.

BROADCASTING

APPEARANCE OF GERDA MUNSINGER ON CBC TELEVISION PROGRAM—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Senator Forsey inquired of the government pursuant to notice:

1. How much did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pay Mrs. Gerda Munsinger for her appearance on the Barbara Frum program on CBC TV at 9 o'clock Saturday evening, June 7, 1975,

(a) by way of expenses?

(b) by way of fees?

2. Has Mrs. Munsinger a record of criminal convictions in Canada?

3. How long is she to be allowed to remain in Canada?

4. Is it the intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to present other persons of similar qualifications on this program at public expense?

5. If so, what is the budget for such appearances?

6. What criteria does the corporation use in selecting the people who are to appear on this program?

7. Does the government consider that the presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on this program is a proper use of public money?

8. Does the government consider that the presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on this program conforms with the CBC's mandate as laid down in the Broadcasting Act?

Senator Perrault: Answered.

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Secretary of State, Ministry of the Solicitor General and the Department of Manpower and Immigration as follows:

1. It has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration.

2. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are unable to answer this question, as requests for criminal records must be supported by fingerprints, otherwise no identification can be made.

3. She entered as a visitor under Section 7(1)(c) of the Immigration Act on May 30, 1975 with permission to remain in Canada until June 14, 1975.

4. It is the intention of the CBC to interview, from time to time, persons who have been part of the Canadian scene.

5. It has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration.

6. It is the intention of the CBC to interview, from time to time, persons who have been part of the Canadian scene.

7. The presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on the Barbara Frum program was a programming decision made by the CBC. It is not the policy of the government to interfere in programming decisions made by the corporation.

8. Yes.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 22, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BROADCASTING

CTV NEWS REPORT—THE LATE VIATEUR ÉTHIER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. On the CTV news last night there was announced the sad death of Viateur Éthier, who was for a long time a member of Parliament in the other place. He represented with great honour and distinction the constituency of Glengarry-Prescott.

In the news announcement he was stated to have been a member of the Conservative Party. I think that that is a very distinct breach of the privileges of a member of Parliament. I do not speak in the sense of denigrating that great party. I think it would have been equally a breach of privilege if erroneously the press had announced at the time of the departure of the late Gordon Graydon, who was such a distinguished member of his party for many years, that he was a Liberal or a member of the NDP or anything else but a Conservative.

Surely the press has a responsibility for reporting the truth and the facts. Surely it is a breach of the privileges of Parliament when there is a misrepresentation which is fundamental to the nature of political association, and which I think would be taken particularly seriously by his friends and colleagues and supporters over many years.

I would urge that this house move a vote of censure against the CTV network and any other instruments of the media which so misrepresent the political status of the late Viateur Éthier whose long and distinguished service certainly entitled him, in his sad demise, to have the truth reported about him.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can well understand the degree of concern felt by our honourable colleague about this unfortunate mistake by one of the news services in this country. However, I cannot support the view that the situation calls for a vote of censure against the CTV network. It may simply have been an inadvertence, and they probably feel as badly about it today as any senators might this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Government, and I would tell my good friend Senator Greene that never have I seen anyone particularly insulted by the fact that, being a Liberal, he was considered a conservative with a small "c", or, being a Conservative with a big "C", was called a liberal. I have been called that quite often and I have never taken it too badly.

PROVINCE OF NOVA SCOTIA

SPRINGHILL FIRE DISASTER

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, before we begin the normal proceedings I wonder if I might have permission to speak briefly about the circumstances surrounding the recent events in the town of Springhill, Nova Scotia.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, because of the tragic circumstances surrounding the disastrous fire in the ill-fated town of Springhill last Sunday—events which you have all heard about, read about or have seen on television—I visited that community yesterday at the request of Nova Scotia's representative in the federal cabinet, the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen. In the brief moments at my disposal, I should like to report on my findings and tell you about my meeting with the mayor of Springhill, His Worship William Mont, as well as with the representative in the legislature, Guy Brown, and other civic officials. At the same time I should like to urge upon the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and through him to impress upon his colleagues in the cabinet, the necessity of responding swiftly and sympathetically to any requests for assistance which may come from either the town of Springhill or the province of Nova Scotia or both. I have already discussed this matter briefly with Premier Regan, and today his cabinet is meeting in special session to examine what course of action it will take in the light of these unfortunate circumstances.

● (1410)

Let me summarize briefly what happened in this latest disaster to hit Springhill, a community of some 5,500 people. About 80 per cent of the main street business section was wiped out; 20 buildings, housing some 34 businesses, were completely destroyed; nine other buildings were damaged; approximately 15 families were left homeless, and 80 to 100 jobs were lost directly. The actual loss at this moment runs anywhere from $3 to $4 million, but the replacement value, as estimated by Mayor Mont, is in excess of $10 million. Unfortunately, the general commercial insurance carried on these properties is unofficially estimated at between 20 and 25 per cent of the actual value. It was miraculous that there was no loss of life, and that no injuries were suffered. In this regard I must pay tribute to the firemen from Springhill and the surrounding communities, who eventually contained the blaze.

Honourable senators, the people of Springhill must be a very special breed. Back in 1891 a mine explosion killed a total of 125 men and badly injured another 17. More recently, in 1956, a mine explosion killed 39 men. A fire in 1957 destroyed much of the community's business section, and a year later a "bump", as it is known in the mining industry, resulted in the loss of another 75 lives.

Yesterday, as I reported earlier, I met for some time with His Worship the Mayor, with other officials and with many townspeople. I must report that they are very philosophical, and demonstrate tremendous courage. The clean-up is well under way, and the people themselves are determined to rebuild. They most certainly will need help, however. I think, for example, of help in the way of worthwhile make-work projects to provide immediate jobs. I am aware that officials from the Job Creation Branch of the Department of Manpower and Immigration have been, and are, on the scene, and I am wondering if a special case could not be made for bringing the Local Initiatives Program forward now, instead of waiting for the winter months, to create jobs in Springhill. I have already begun exploratory talks in this regard with officials of the department.

I think also of help in the way of new industry, to provide long-term jobs and much needed stability for the community. I express the hope that efforts will continue at a stepped-up pace on the part of both the provincial and the federal governments, particularly between the provincial Department of Development and the federal Department of Regional and Economic Expansion, to find a suitable replacement for Buckingham Mills, which closed in that community last year, resulting in the loss of some 75 jobs.

It has already been suggested in many places that with the growing importance of coal in the field of energy, exploration activity will be accelerated to determine the feasibility of opening a new mine in that area. I am aware that private interests are drilling holes at the present time. I believe some 26 holes were drilled last year. I am sure that the federal government will want to cooperate with the province in this field as well.

I think in terms of the need of housing for the approximately 15 families who have been left homeless, and I would hope that Central Mortgage and Housing will cooperate with the Nova Scotia housing commission in finding an early solution to this problem in that particular area.

If expansion of the minimum security prison at Springhill is feasible, then an early start should be made on this expansion, since I understand this institution is well accepted in that community.

I trust that the Leader of the Government will impress upon his colleagues, as I trust that all senators will endeavour to impress upon members of the government, the importance of such measures so that we in the rest of Canada can complement the very real determination of the people of Springhill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that I speak on behalf of all senators in all parts of this chamber when I thank Senator Graham for his informative and even moving statement this afternoon. The people of Springhill in Nova Scotia have demonstrated a rare degree of courage and tenacity in the face of great vicissitudes down through the years. I want to assure the house that the government will greet most sympathetically and compassionately any request for assistance which may be forthcoming from the Government of Nova Scotia. As honourable senators are aware, in eventualities of this kind, the provincial government must apply formally to the federal government for some type of assistance. To this point, no formal request for assistance has been received. But when and if it is received, the request will be treated most sympathetically by the Government of Canada.

[Senator Graham.]

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all pleased that Senator Graham brought this matter to the attention of the Senate. Certainly the town of Springhill has been unfortunate over the years with its history of mine disasters and fires. At times it has come close to being wiped out. It is certain that anything that the Government of Canada can do to assist these people will be very commendable. It struck me when Senator Graham spoke about the mining disasters at Springhill that the history of coal mining in Nova Scotia has been one of great loss of life through mining accidents. It is a dangerous occupation, and perhaps to a certain extent we have become accustomed to this over the years. No matter what safety devices have been used in the mining industry—and there have been many—there has always been some loss of life. It would certainly be a tremendous step forward if a safer method of mining could be devised for the mine at Springhill. I am informed that the coal is there, but it is difficult to mine. There have been two bad accidents in the area, and I understand it would be unsafe to continue mining operations under the present method.

Honourable senators, I hope that the request for aid from the Government of Nova Scotia will soon be made and that the Government of Canada will respond immediately and go all out to assist the people of that community.

● (1420)

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton) has been substituted for that of Mr. Fraser on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

UNITED NATIONS

FIFTH UNITED NATIONS CONGRESS ON CRIME PREVENTION—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, as I indicated yesterday, I have the honour today to table a statement concerning The Fifth United Nations Congress on Crime Prevention and the Treatment of Offenders made to the House of Commons on July 21, 1975, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In this connection I point out that the complete statement made in the other place by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is to be found in House of Commons Debates of yesterday, at page 7757. Honourable senators will recall that I undertook to provide them with copies of this statement. In view of the fact that it is now available at each desk in the House of Commons Debates, I felt it would not be necessary to re-circulate the statement.

Arising out of this tabling of the statement, and in order to permit those honourable senators who wish to comment on this important foreign policy initiative of the Government of Canada to do so, I would move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the statement concerning the Fifth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders made to the House of Commons on July 21, 1975, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of statement see appendix pp. 1248-1249.)

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I would like to make a brief comment regarding this decision by the government. Various views have been expressed as to whether it was the right course of action for Canada to take at the time, particularly by those who have suggested that it did not go far enough. The decision, of course, has been to request the postponement of the Fifth United Nations Congress on Crime Prevention. While the government was not as explicit as some might wish it to have been, among whom I include myself, it has at least come out and made a decision which, in my opinion, is very much to the credit of Canada.

I am not attempting any judgment at this time as to possible solutions or compromises that may in the long run be necessary to resolve the outstanding differences between Israel and the Arab world. That is another matter. However, in my view, the government is completely justified in refusing to proceed with a conference that attempts to solve some of the problems of international violence and crime when some would be eligible to attend by virtue of a resolution which Canada opposed, and in spite of the fact that they belong to an organization which openly advocates unjustifiable, irresponsible violence to serve their ends. The official statement of the government is carefully worded—cautiously worded, I think; perhaps too cautiously—but it is a way out of a problem, and a way to avoid a situation which would have been highly embarrassing to a great many Canadians.

The matter, of course, concerns not merely the question of this conference, because the problem that has arisen could not have been foreseen when Canada extended the invitation for the conference to be held here. It goes beyond that, because it recalls the decision of one of the major United Nations agencies, UNESCO—United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization—to exclude Israel from the European zone. That, in effect, excluded it from any zone, because there was no incongruity in Israel's belonging in that zone in view of the fact that Canada is in it. There was also the decision to ban UNESCO grants to Israel, based on a ground that no responsible person would find viable, namely, the ground that the Israelis had carried on some archaeological work in the city of Jerusalem. It was obviously a political blackmail decision, but not one of any great consequence to Israel because it involved not more than $25,000, which is much less than the Israeli contribution to UNESCO.

Senator Hicks: Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Senator Grosart: Twenty-five thousand dollars was the UNESCO contribution. In fact, Canada's contribution to UNESCO itself is about $2 million. It is a substantial contribution of course, because Canada, as a matter of fact, contributed more to the work of UNESCO than all the Arab countries put together.

I have said that had this conference gone forward under existing conditions it would have been embarrassing to a great many Canadians. Those who have objected to the UNESCO decision, and to any decision to carry on with this conference under those circumstances, include some of the most respected Canadian citizens I can think of. They include, for example, Doris Anderson, the Editor of Chatelaine; Mario Bernardi, the conductor of the National Arts Centre Orchestra; our respected former colleague, the Honourable Thérèse Casgrain; Maureen Forrester; Northrop Frye, one of our most distinguished professors at the University of Toronto; Gerhard Herzberg, our only Nobel Peace Prize winner; Judy LaMarsh—

Senator Hicks: Herzberg won the Nobel Prize for physics.

Senator Grosart: —the publisher of La Presse; the president of the University of Manitoba; and last, but not least, Senator Henry Hicks, president of Dalhousie University and former chairman of the Canadian National Commission for UNESCO.

Honourable senators may have wondered why Senator Hicks was so available with some facts on which I was slipping. When I said he is a former chairman of that commission, I should have added that he is one of those distinguished Canadians who associated themselves with the statement:

The undersigned henceforth refuse to collaborate in this body so long as it does not prove, as regards Israel, its faithfulness to its own goals.

I shall not attempt at this time to assess the problems and differences which exist between the nations involved. I commend the government for going as far as it has gone in this matter. I wish it had gone further, but one step in the right direction is perhaps better than the track record of current government policy decisions.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the remarks of the honourable Deputy Leader of the Opposition are most appreciated and have certainly contributed to the dialogue on this particular subject. I do not intend to make a long statement in reply.

There is a feeling, which goes beyond party, that the United Nations could well be at the crossroads. In recent months we have seen an assault on the idea of the universality of membership in the organization, against the wishes, certainly, and the votes of Canadian representatives at the United Nations.

● (1430)

Against the position, and certainly the votes, of Canadian delegates at the United Nations, South Africa was excluded from the organization. There are reports that there may be a similar effort this fall to exclude Israel from membership in the United Nations. Canada will oppose any such effort. In this disruptive and bitter climate, replete with threats of violence, Canada does not feel that this is an appropriate time to provide the site for a conference on the prevention of crime and violence.

I can assure honourable senators, however, that this will be a prelude to renewed Canadian initiatives at the United Nations this fall in an attempt to develop friendly and cooperative relations among all states, not only in the Middle East, and a better feeling among the member states of the United Nations. Our decision to seek a postponement is consistent with our policy of attempting to advance good initiatives in the world body in order to bring about rational discussion of the problems which afflict mankind.

We have tried to maintain a balanced and objective approach to the Middle East conflict. We have demonstrated as a nation our willingness to act as peacekeepers in that situation. Indeed, a number of Canadians have lost their lives in the process. We support and defend the right of Israel to exist in peace with its neighbours, behind secure and recognized borders. We have stated our conviction that no peaceful and stable solution to this conflict can be found without the participation of the Palestinians, and the just settlement of their claims. We have always condemned the use of violence, whatever its source, as a political instrument, or as a means of retribution. To host a conference when there have been threats of violence from various quarters is not consistent with the Canadian position with respect to violence and the use of force and so on as a means of retribution and the resolution of differences.

We have participated, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the other day, in all United Nations peacekeeping and ceasefire supervision missions, not only in the Middle East but elsewhere. Canada today—this is a fact not known to many Canadians—is the fourth largest contributor to the United Nations program for the relief of Palestinian refugees out of a total United Nations membership of something like 130. We have advocated and continue to advocate the full implementation of Security Council resolution 242. This all continues to be government policy.

As I have said, we hope that this fall at the United Nations there can be renewed Canadian initiatives to bring to the attention of all members of the United Nations the basic responsibility of that body to discuss rationally, and to resolve through peaceful means, the problems which affect mankind, to help develop a better climate for international conferences of all kinds, so that at some future time we can be host to the Fifth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, and other UN conferences.

If the United Nations subsequently decides that this congress must go ahead despite Canadian wishes, then, of course, it will not be held in this country. But let us fervently hope that the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in consultation with his officials at New York, will agree to a postponement, and that we will see better climate for this and other conferences in the months and years to come.

[Senator Perrault.]

PETRO-CANADA BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-8, to establish a national petroleum company, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Cook moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE POLICY—SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy for the proposed expenditures of the said committee respecting the holding of a special meeting to determine the feasibility of establishing a Commission on the Future as authorized by the Senate on November 21, 1974.

PRIVATE BILL

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (RICHARD FRITZ AND MARIANNE STRASS)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Laird, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-1001, to provide an exception from the general law relating to marriage in the case of Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Denis moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act".—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, yesterday when I moved the adjournment of this debate on behalf of Senator Phillips, he anticipated he would be able to be here. It now turns out that he will not be able to be present today and probably not during this week. Therefore, I should like permission to speak in his place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, the bill before us follows the recommendations of the interim report of the Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. We were fortunate in that the sponsor was not only a member of that committee but he was co-chairman and, indeed, chaired the meetings when this bill was considered by the committee.

The bill is somewhat long and technical, but it is not complicated. It reconstitutes the Public Service Staff Relations Board by enlarging it and providing for full-time as well as for part-time membership. It cannot be denied that there is need for this legislation, because as presently constituted the board cannot deal expeditiously with all matters before it. There is a heavy backlog of business. As honourable senators will understand, when matters of this kind are referred to the board, the sooner the board can deal with them the better, otherwise they drag on and people become irritated and the situation becomes worse.

This bill is also an interim measure. The committee is now considering its final report, which will cover many items. The committee has already had 40 public hearings. The original act contains 115 sections, which makes it obvious that the final report will not be adopted at one sitting. However, by passing this urgent legislation while the final report is being considered, the reconstituted board will be able to work on its backlog of cases and try to keep up to date with the new cases which come before it.

As the sponsor said, there was unanimous agreement in the other place that this bill should be passed. The same was true in committee. I go along with this idea, but I have two mild criticisms to make.

● (1440)

I do not wholly agree with the proposed new section 62 under which the chairman is given the power to appoint an outside arbitrator. In other words, he can appoint an arbitrator outside the board. In my opinion the board should be able to look after these matters. If the chairman is given the power to appoint an outside arbitrator, that, in effect, is showing a lack of confidence in the makeup of the board. Now, if it is suggested that it is desirable to appoint an outside arbitrator, certainly the chairman should not have the authority to appoint that arbitrator. Such an appointment should be made only by the Governor in Council, and that could be done on the recommendation of the chairman. Indeed, if I am not mistaken, according to one of the other sections of the act the Governor in Council appoints the members of the board on the recommendation of the chairman. I think the same procedure should be followed in this case.

The only other criticism I have is with respect to the term of appointment, which for the chairman and other officers is not to exceed ten years, and, for the members, seven years. I realize that is the same as it is in the present act and that many other acts follow that wording, but in my opinion that leaves two points open to question. In the first place, why should it say, "not exceeding ten years"? I say give them ten years or less but make it definite. In the second place, I do not see why there should be any difference between the chairman, vice-chairman and the like and the ordinary members.

Apart from those two mild criticisms, I consider the legislation necessary and I am glad to support it. I do not think it would be helpful to send the bill to committee because it has been considered by the joint committee and, so far as we on this side are concerned, at this stage of the session we might just as well have third reading today.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Buckwold speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I am sure the remarks made by Senator Macdonald are much appreciated. The points he has raised have been discussed by the committee, as he has probably read in the proceedings. His points were certainly well taken. I believe I have given as clear an explanation of the bill as possible, and I would therefore move second reading of the bill.

Senator Flynn: Before the question is put, since the bill will not be referred to committee, may I ask Senator Buckwold a question? Clause 2 of this bill repeals subsections 11(1) to (4) and replaces them with the text in the bill which says that the board shall consist of:

—a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman, not less than three Deputy Chairmen and such other full-time members and such part-time members as the Governor in Council considers necessary to discharge the responsibilities of the Board.

Paragraph (2) says:

The members of the Board shall be appointed by the Governor in Council to hold office during good behaviour for such period.

(a) not exceeding ten years, in the case of the Chairman, the Vice-Chairman and the Deputy Chairmen, and

(b) not exceeding seven years, in the case of any member other than a member referred to in paragraph (a)—

Paragraph (2)(b), coming as it does after paragraph (1), would also refer to part-time members. I cannot see how a part-time member could be appointed for a period not exceeding ten years—or seven years as the case may be. I am aware that the part-time members work only a few days here and there. They are assigned some cases and, when they have dealt with them, their employment is discontinued until they receive another assignment. Obviously, they cannot be appointed on the same basis as full-time members.

Senator Buckwold: I must agree with the Leader of the Opposition. The part-time members are chosen from nominees submitted by the employer—the government—and the employees—namely, the various unions. They are called on a part-time basis, as indicated by the Leader of the Opposition.

I must admit that I cannot make any fine distinctions here, except to say that this act has been operating in the same manner since its inception in 1967. In fact, the members have been part-time except for the chairman, the vice-chairman and the three deputy chairmen. I would presume, therefore, that it is merely an extension of the particular procedure. I would point out, as I did in some personal conversation with the Leader of the Opposition, that the bill before us shows only amendments and that we do not have the full act to look at, the remaining clauses of which are still operative and will carry on as originally intended.

Senator Flynn: I would just point out that the drafting may not be as clear as it should be—but that is nothing new.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, although Senator Macdonald indicated he was prepared to have third reading today, if it is your wish I am prepared to move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Senator Flynn: Unless there is some urgency for giving leave to have third reading now, we might as well wait until tomorrow.

Senator Buckwold: I move, therefore, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

SCIENCE POLICY

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, July 17, the debate on the motion of Senator Lamontagne for the adoption of the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am happy to see that the government leader is present, because my problem with this report is one which concerns the Senate and the management of the Senate principally. I believe the views of the government leader will be helpful to me, and to the Senate in general.

The purpose of the report of the Science Policy Committee is twofold: first, it asks us to terminate the present mandate of the committee, which is to hold a conference on the future; and, second it asks us to give the committee a new mandate, which would be to consider and report upon Canadian government and other expenditures on scientific activity and matters related thereto.

I should like to point out that it is not easy to pass judgment on these two requests at the same time. It is quite obvious, in the light of the reasons given by Senator Lamontagne, and in the light of the comments made by

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Grosart and Senator Carter, that the Senate should accept the committee's request to terminate its mandate to prepare the Commission on the Future. But is it necessary that we deal at the same time with a request for a new mandate "to consider and report on Canadian government and other expenditures on scientific activities and matters related thereto"?

• (1450)

I cannot see why we should have to discuss these two questions at the same time. From a procedural point of view I would have much preferred that the report of the committee be rescinded. Then we might deal with its request to terminate its mandate, and make a decision as to whether we should give it a new mandate.

As I said with regard to the termination of its present mandate, with this I am in agreement, and I share all the views that have been expressed concerning the very beneficial efforts made by the committee in this respect. I am quite satisfied that these efforts will be useful even if, in the end, the credit for preparing this conference is attributed to some other institution, rather than those who will have done the spade work.

That is certainly a problem. But what I am particularly worried about is that this committee was set up in 1967, eight years ago, and that it is now asking us to give it a mandate which, prima facie, will require two or three years of additional work. This indicates to me that this committee is trying to become permanent, whether it realizes it or not. After all, a special committee which has lived for eight years and now seeks a new mandate that may allow it to carry on for another three years is becoming, to all intents and purposes, a permanent committee.

Senator Lamontagne: We never mentioned three years.

Senator Flynn: You did not have to. All one has to do is read the report to see that if you do all that you propose in the report, it will take at least that length of time.

On this subject, honourable senators, I refer you to the concluding paragraphs of the report. This is to be found at page 1173 of Hansard of July 10, 1975. I would like to quote the passage in question so as to be quite clear on the matter. It reads as follows:

First, we should make a survey of futures research programs being carried out within government departments and agencies and see how the Institute will develop its new area of activities. We have succeeded in making futures research a Canadian Government priority. We are under the impression, however, that government departments and agencies are developing their research effort in isolation in this area as in so many others.

I shall now go to the second of these paragraphs, but I believe honourable senators can already see that with this alone the committee would have a substantial program ahead of it.

Secondly, the committee should make a systematic review of the implementation of the recommendations contained in its report on science policy.

That is a tall order too, because, after all, this may be a continuing task, since it is quite obvious that the government will not proceed very quickly on all the recommendations in the report. It may take ten years before we are able to assess what the government will have done concerning the 1973 recommendations made by the committee.

Thirdly, the committee should hold hearings on the Canadian science budget.

These three recommendations open the door to vast areas of activity for the committee. The specific recommendation, needless to say, appears to be very simple, since it says—and I quote from the end of the report—as follows:

The committee, therefore, recommends that it be authorized to consider and report on Canadian government and other expenditures on scientific activities and matters related thereto;

Senator Lamontagne: May I ask a question at this stage?

Senator Flynn: Most certainly.

Senator Lamontagne: Is the honourable Leader of the Opposition aware that any special committee has to come before this chamber at the beginning of each session to be reconfirmed in its mandate?

Senator Flynn: I agree with that, but once we have given the green light to a committee it is very difficult to say, "We are going to stop you." You know very well that that has been the problem with your committee in regard to the Commission on the Future. You started, and were interrupted by an election. Then you came to us and said, "Well, we have begun, and we wish to continue." You did this in 1973, and in 1974. Now you come to us in 1975 and say, "We cannot complete our work. We want to have something else to do." It would be very difficult, if we gave you this authorization, to stop you once you began. It is this very problem to which I am drawing the attention of the Senate.

Senator Lamontagne: Well, are you against it, or are you for it?

Senator Flynn: I am in favour of not having too many committees. If I were to read the motion as you would put it, I would say that this is not necessary, because we have a National Finance Committee already which has the responsibility of investigating, and is authorized to consider, the expenditures of the government. This committee could very well next year look into the expenditures of the government in connection with scientific activity and research. Now we are asked to add another committee. We are, in effect, being asked to make this a permanent committee. You know very well that it is not easy for the Senate to deal with the number of committees it already has at this time, and it is certainly not easy for the Opposition to participate in all the activities that arise out of these committees.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that we should have a second look at this matter. I do not know why it should be necessary to decide now that we are going to give this new mandate to the committee headed by Senator Lamontagne. I think we could very well take a breather during the summer recess, and consider this when we come back in the fall.

The problem of finding staff is a legitimate one. But I do not think it is a valid argument for trying to convince the Senate that the staff should be kept on. I do not see, in fact, why we need the same staff for the proposed new mandate that has served the committee in respect of the mandates it has had up to now.

Senator Lamontagne could very well be a member of the National Finance Committee and collaborate in having that committee given the mandate that the Special Committee on Science Policy is seeking at this time.

We have too many committees already. I do not like the idea of a special committee seeking to become permanent by having one mandate in 1967, another in 1968, another in 1972, then again in 1973 and 1974.

Senator Greene: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Greene: I take it, from his learned discourse on the subject, that the honourable senator is telling the Senate that he does not believe in the doctrine of reincarnation. Is that a correct interpretation of his words?

Senator Flynn: I would say that it is the committee that does not believe in this doctrine, since it does not want to die. It could very well be reincarnated next fall.

I would like the government leader to tell us whether he accepts the idea that this committee, which has been going on for eight years, should be permitted to carry on for another three. We have many committees that are working well at the present time, and I think we should try to reduce their number rather than maintain, in addition to those prescribed by our rules, what are in fact permanent committees operating in the guise of special committees.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1243.)

FIFTH UNITED NATIONS CONGRESS ON CRIME PREVENTION

STATEMENT MADE IN HOUSE OF COMMONS ON JULY 21, 1975, BY THE HON. ALLAN J. MACEACHEN, SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

I have advised the Secretary-General of the United Nations that Canada does not wish to proceed with the Fifth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders this year. I have sought the Secretary-General's cooperation in obtaining a postponement of the Congress and he has undertaken to study the situation in order to clarify his position. In the Government's view, this Congress cannot be held successfully anywhere this year.

Honourable members will recall that at the Fourth Congress held in Kyoto, in 1970, the Government of Canada, in consultation with the Province of Ontario, proposed that the venue of the next congress be Toronto, in September of 1975. This proposal was accepted by delegations and subsequently confirmed by the General Assembly. Since that time, however, there has been a steady deterioration of the atmosphere in which international conferences are held. I need hardly mention the discord which marred the Sixth Special Session and the last regular Session of the General Assembly, the recent conferences of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) and of the International Labour Organization (ILO) as well as the International Women's Year Conference in Mexico, a few weeks ago.

Whereas a minimum of cooperation is essential to any progress in the international field, we have witnessed lately excessive confrontation on issues that were not related to the subject matter of conferences. The ingredients are well-known: racialism in Southern Africa, the Middle East conflict, producer-consumer relations and the full range of economic development problems subsumed under calls for a "New World Economic Order". Canada believes that these are very real and difficult problems which must be dealt with urgently, in the appropriate international institutions, before they poison the body politic of the United Nations family; and let there be no doubt that we consider it necessary and desirable that political factors take their proper place even in the most technical of conferences. But they must meet some test of relevance, and in recent U.N. conferences this has clearly not been the case.

Honourable members are well aware that in respect of the Toronto Congress on Crime Prevention, which was to take place next September, one of these issues had already become paramount. It arose from the resolution adopted in November 1974 by the General Assembly, with Canada dissenting, inviting the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) to attend its sessions as a permanent observer and, in a similar capacity, conferences convened under the auspices of the General Assembly or other organs of the U.N. Accordingly, the Government of Canada was informed by the United Nations Secretariat some time ago that observers from the PLO had been invited to attend the Fifth Congress on Crime Prevention and that the Canadian authorities were expected to allow entry, sojourn and exit to these participants.

Needless to say, it is with reluctance that the Government has decided to seek postponement of the Congress, but we concluded that it would not be possible, in present circumstances, to hold a successful congress on crime prevention in Canada or anywhere else.

We are all aware of the public outcry for or against the admission to Canada, for this congress, of observers from the Palestinian Liberation Organization. We have all been worried by its divisive effect upon Canadian public opinion. We could not ignore the risk of public disorders. These factors would have led any government to reconsider a decision to host an international conference. But in the final analysis, two factors dominated in our discussions. The first was the inevitable intrusion of unrelated political considerations into the proceedings of the Congress. The second was the re-escalation of violence in the Middle East and the consequent spread of its bitterness into Canada and subsequently into the Congress itself.

It is obvious that such intrusion of the Middle East conflict, by adding to the already hopeless confusion between civil crimes and acts of war, would distort and subvert the purposes of what has essentially been up to now, and should remain, a technical meeting of experts from all countries, striving to develop international co-operation in a field of vital importance to the rule of law and to public order everywhere. As host country, we felt that Canada had assumed a major responsibility for the success of this Congress; and in such an unfavourable political climate, we did not see how we would possibly carry out our responsibility. I should add that we were also concerned about the coincidence of the Congress with the Seventh Special Session of the General Assembly on Development and International Economic Cooperation, since the contentious atmosphere of one would in all likelihood seep into the other.

However, after an extensive review of the Government's domestic and international obligations, we decided to inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations that we did not want to be relieved of the responsibility for holding this Congress, but rather wished to postpone it. We did not want to withdraw our invitation to the United Nations; and we tried to avoid any steps which might have called into question our long-standing commitment to the principles of the United Nations. I emphasize that Canada's willingness to participate in and contribute to the operations of United Nations agencies remains undiminished.

The respite obtained by postponement must be effectively used by all to bring about sufficient improvement in attendant political conditions so that we may have reasonable assurances that technical conferences such as the Fifth U.N. Congress on Crime Prevention will be useful and productive. We hope that current negotiations for the reduction of tensions between some of the parties to the Middle East conflict will prove successful in coming months; and we will actively support the continuing efforts of the parties directly involved and of the United States Government toward that goal.

Furthermore, the next General Assembly of the United Nations will provide an opportunity to affirm the principle of universality, as a fulfilment of what ought to be a basic aim of the United Nations. More specifically, we will resist any attempt to exclude Israel or any other country from the proceedings of the General Assembly. Acceptance of this principle would guarantee the status of Israel within the community of nations, and thus remove one cause of instability in the area.

So that in requesting the postponement of the Congress, Canada is not shirking its responsibilities but actually taking on new ones. Through new initiatives, both bilateral and multilateral, the Government will try to improve the political situation in the Middle East and in the U.N., notably through our participation in the next session of the General Assembly, which may be crucial for the future of the organization, given the fundamental character of the issues on which debates are expected to focus. Canada will consult with other interested countries on the ground rules governing technical discussions in U.N. arenas. Either independently or in cooperation with others, we will attempt to formulate and seek support for an effective resolution in the General Assembly on this question.

I also intend to accept during the autumn outstanding invitations to visit a number of countries in the Middle East. These visits, which the Government already considered most useful for strengthening our relations with this region of the world, have taken a new urgency following the difficulties we encountered in holding the U.N. Congress on Crime Prevention. The House can be assured that I will take this opportunity to solicit the views of my hosts on these difficulties and seek their support for the United Nations as a universal forum and an effective international instrument.

Honourable members should note that our decision to seek the postponement of the Congress, for the reasons stated, is consistent with the policy of the Government on the Middle East. We will continue to cultivate, as we have done in the past, friendly and cooperative relations with all states in the region and to attach great importance to the development of these relations. Likewise, Canada has tried in the past to maintain a balanced and objective approach to the Middle East conflict and will continue to do so. We have always supported and defended the right of the State of Israel to exist in peace with its neighbours, behind secure and recognized borders. We have stated our conviction that no peaceful and stable solution to this regional conflict can be found without the participation of the Palestinians and the just settlement of their claims. We have condemned the use of violence as a political instrument or as a means of retribution. We have participated in all U.N. peacekeeping and ceasefire supervision missions in the Middle East and contributed to the United Nations' relief operations for Palestinian refugees. We have advocated and continue to advocate the full implementation of Security Council Resolution 242. All of this therefore continues to be Government policy.

We are confident that the initiatives to be taken by Canada and other countries on the future of the United Nations and the Middle East will lead to a different atmosphere, in which the postponed Fifth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders can be held in Canada, at a time to be decided upon, with sufficient assurances of success. It was agreed with the Secretary-General of the United Nations that we should consult further on this question and I expect to be in touch with him later this week.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 23, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards, relating to a petition addressed to the Governor in Council regarding the Official Language Act of Quebec, dated February 14 and July 17, 1975.

Report on Actuarial Examination of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (Dependants) Pension Fund as at March 31, 1974, together with Treasury Board Order, dated July 10, 1975, pursuant to sections 56(3) and 57(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, Charter R-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a Report to the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, dated July 4, 1975, entitled: "Provincial Models of the Farm-Gate Cost of Egg Production for Medium Size Producers".

THE HONOURABLE M. GRATTAN O'LEARY

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to the attention of the government leader and other senators the presence in our chamber of the beloved senator from our side, Senator O'Leary.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to acknowledge, together with the Leader of the Opposition, the presence in the chamber of our great and good friend and colleague Senator O'Leary. It is marvelous to see him in our midst again.

Senator O'Leary: Honourable senators, I want to thank you all for your kindly welcome back here, and to say with a full heart how glad I am to be with you all again.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the heavy program we have before us today, I should like to ask the government leader when it is expected that Parliament will adjourn for the summer recess. The mood prevailing today is rather suggestive of an adjournment. I wonder if he can let us know what the prospects are for Parliament, and for the Senate in particular.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I express the personal hope that the Leader of the Opposition is in active consultation with his counterparts in the other chamber, and that he is providing them with his wisdom and advice on the subject of adjourning the activities of both chambers for the summer recess.

We should be in a better position tomorrow to gauge precisely when the magic moment shall arrive. As far as the government is concerned, I want to assure honourable senators that I have been advised by my friends and colleagues in the other place that they are fully prepared to remain in session as long as the public business requires them to do so. They are making plans, accordingly, to sit for an extended period of time should that be necessary.

Senator Asselin: I know the rest.

Senator Perrault: As I say, tomorrow we should be in a better position to assess exactly how this chamber should react in view of the events on the other side, and we will endeavour to provide an accurate report.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

INVITATION TO PARLIAMENT OF CANADA TO SEND DELEGATION TO RUSSIA—QUESTIONS

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I wish to direct several questions on the same topic to the Leader of the Government. I have been informed that the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has invited the Parliament of Canada to send a parliamentary delegation to that country and that the dates have been set for September 5 to 14. I understand that the invitation was conveyed to the Speaker of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

(1) Could we have a copy of both invitations tabled, to be appended to the Debates of the Senate?

(2) What is the number of persons to be selected for the delegation, including the number of senators?

(3) Who makes the selection of the delegates and what is the criteria that is applied?

(4) If the selection has been made, could we have a list of the delegates?

● (1410)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can provide at least a partial answer to Senator Yuzyk's questions. It is my understanding that a personal invitation was extended by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Honourable James Jerome. I further understand that the makeup of the delegation is within his complete discretion, and that he has proposed that one Progressive Conservative senator from this chamber should be a member of that delegation.

It may be more appropriate to direct any inquiries of this kind to the Honourable James Jerome, but in any case

I shall undertake to obtain answers to the questions just posed by Senator Yuzyk.

Senator Yuzyk: I would appreciate it very much.

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Buckwold moved the third reading of Bill C-70, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PETRO-CANADA BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Cook moved the third reading of Bill C-8, to establish a national petroleum company.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (RICHARD FRITZ AND MARIANNE STRASS)—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Denis moved the third reading of Bill C-1001, to provide an exception from the general law relating to marriage in the case of Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, before proceeding with third reading, I would like to make a few comments, and I think the sponsor of the bill could enlighten me on the government's intentions.

Of course, this is an exception bill. We know the federal government has jurisdiction over marriage and divorce. However, I am one of those who oppose those exception bills when the federal government does not intend to introduce uniform legislation throughout Canada.

Of course, I did not have the opportunity of attending the sitting of the committee after second reading of the bill, but I would have had questions to ask concerning the intentions of the government; that is to say, whether it will often introduce bills providing this type of exception.

I believe the provincial and federal governments should get together on this so that in such cases as are put to us where a niece and her uncle want to marry, the federal government should not always be the one to bring in a bill to provide an exception. The government should decide to look into the matter in depth, so that our exception is not made only for one couple. We know that the exception is made only in this case, where the couple could not get married unless the federal government authorized them to do so through a bill of this kind, but does the federal government intend to review the legislation on marriage sometime in the future, to ensure uniformity across Canada?

Perhaps the mover of the bill could answer that question.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Asselin for having brought up that interesting point. May I add that, as he so aptly pointed out, this bill provides an exception. It is a private bill which concerns only the couple in question. If, at a later date, the government should decide to study in depth the possibility of making it applicable to all provinces, and even the province of Quebec—that is to all couples in the province of Quebec—it would be entirely free to do so.

For the time being, however, this is a private bill which applies only to Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass. I think that I must thank you on their behalf for the way you have received their application. I suppose that, speaking in your name and mine, I may wish them a very long and happy life and many children.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am sure that those wishes will become more significant when the bill receives royal assent. However, some questions were asked of me by my colleagues as to what took place in committee. Since I was present at that meeting I feel I should put on the record some facts which will be useful to the Senate and may possibly answer, in part, the questions posed by Senator Asselin.

As was outlined by the sponsor of the bill, article 126 of the Civil Code prohibits marriage between uncle and niece. Article 127 provides that the other impediments which prevailed at the time of Confederation, as provided by the various churches, will continue. It is also provided in the same article, however, that the dispensations which were granted by the various churches at that time continue to be granted. But this power of dispensation accorded to the churches would not apply in the case of prohibition of marriage between uncle and niece. Thus there was no way of dealing with the matter other than by legislation. However, the British North America Act, as Senator Asselin mentioned, provides that exclusive jurisdiction in this field of marriage and divorce rests with the federal Parliament and that the laws in existence at the time of Confederation would continue until amended or repealed by the federal Parliament. As Parliament has not proceeded in this regard, the only method by which to achieve the purpose of this bill was to present the legislation now before us, which is a bill of exception, as was said by Senator Asselin.

In committee Senator Neiman and I questioned the principle of introducing a law of exception in this particular field. However, in this case it was shown in committee that a special dispensation had been accorded by Rome. Secondly, we had a letter from a well-known doctor indicating that there was no problem with regard to consanguinity.

● (1420)

As far as this particular case is concerned, I think there is validity to the bill; but Senator Neiman, myself and others have expressed the view that something should be done by Parliament to provide for the settlement of such cases. We should not be called upon to pass a special law in every special case.

I agree that the question posed by Senator Asselin is a valid one, but I doubt that it should have been addressed to Senator Denis, who is merely the sponsor of a private bill. I would ask the government leader to discuss with his colleagues in the government whether there should not be an amendment, not to the Civil Code of Quebec but to all laws applicable across Canada with respect to this problem, so that it can be dealt with in a more general way in the future.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I give an undertaking that the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition's will be brought to the attention of the appropriate government people.

Senator Asselin: When do you expect an answer?

Senator Perrault: As the honourable senator is aware, this government attempts to work with dispatch on all matters affecting the public interest.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government says that with tongue in cheek.

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, just a word in answer to my friend Senator Flynn about that. I must point out that the province is entitled to pass legislation amending the Civil Code.

Senator Flynn: I am afraid not.

Senator Denis: It is entitled, "To amend the Civil Code."

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Denis: However, the British North America Act, section 129, allows the federal and provincial governments to amend and alter; it is there in so many words.

Senator Asselin: No, no.

Senator Denis: In so many words, but I do not have here—you have the—Senator Flynn: Yes, it is on the table.

Senator Denis: —the British North America Act? I will read you section 129 which is explicit and should be even for my friend Senator Asselin.

Senator Flynn: Otherwise, he would have applied to Quebec City.

Senator Denis: When it comes to dispensations which ministers or parish priests may grant, the Code is unequivocal. As to other impediments, there are one or two more particularly, for example the family, brother and sister and, among others, the uncle and niece. But as for the other impediments, dispensation from an authorized priest is sufficient for the solemnization of the marriage.

[English]

In English, I should like to read from section 129 of the British North America Act:

Except as otherwise provided by this Act, all Laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick at the Union, and all Courts of Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction, and all legal Commissions, Powers, and Authorities, and all Officers, Judicial, Administrative, and Ministerial, existing therein at the Union, shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick respectively, as if the Union had not been made; subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,) to be repealed, abolished, or altered by the Parliament of Canada, or by the Legislature of the respective Province, according to the Authority of the Parliament or of that Legislature under this Act.

Senator Flynn: I am very sorry, but that is not the case. The honourable senator has read a section of the British North America Act which deals with all the other laws. But there is a specific provision in the British North America Act.

Senator Denis: It says "all laws" existing at the time of Confederation; and the Civil Code was in existence at the time of Confederation. There you have the answer.

Senator Flynn: I will move the adjournment of the debate in order to put on record the proper section, because I would not want the Senate to be misled by the profound knowledge of Senator Denis.

Senator Denis: May I add that I have not as much experience in the practice of law as the Leader of the Opposition, but at the same time I lost fewer cases than he did.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: You are certainly not speaking of your law practice; you are probably speaking of your political experience. You have a record that is unparalleled, and it is one that has never ceased to amaze and puzzle me.

Senator Denis: But, I would quote une fable de La Fontaine:

On a souvent besoin d'un plus petit que soi.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CRIME AND VIOLENCE

PROPOSED SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator McGrand, seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes:

That the Senate considers it desirable that a special committee of the Senate be established at an early date to inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I understand Senator Norrie is prepared to continue this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Norrie speak in place of Senator Petten?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, I wish to support Senator McGrand in his desire to establish a special committee of the Senate to inquire into and report upon the possible causes of, and deterrents to, the rising rate of crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society. I think it is safe to say that the majority of people in Canada, and in the Western world, are alarmed at the shocking rise in petty and major crimes. The controversial issue of capital punishment is brought up in almost every conversation by all types of people. It seems that the majority of people want the government to re-institute capital punishment hoping, of course, that it will be a deterrent to murder.

I want to be an abolitionist, a total abolitionist, because in my heart I abhor the thought of voting for the taking of a human life. At the same time, I want to be equally sure that I am protecting the public from dangerous criminals. I have been searching for answers to both problems. I am willing to confess that I had not found any convincing solution until quite recently. I know that the answer lies within the realm of training our children to live more unselfish and fruitful lives, instilling in them the desire to be their brother's keeper, and to make them realize that money and material things are not the chief aims in life. It is another thing altogether to find a country where this idealistic training is the way of life. Also, this type of program must be pursued in conjunction with the information I am about to present.

Two weeks ago I heard a radio broadcast on crime reform in the Netherlands. These sentences caught my attention:

There are no maximum security prisons in Holland. Few people who have committed a crime are imprisoned for longer than two years.

This week while in Ottawa I called the Netherlands Embassy for information on the Dutch penal system and the ambassador, His Excellency W. Thorn Leeson, immediately sent me several documents of great interest. Let us hope that within these documents lie some of the answers. For this service I am indeed very grateful, and I thank the ambassador for his prompt cooperation.

Before going on with the information about the penal system in the Netherlands, I would like to point out that interest in the prevention of crime dates back to 1748. Henry Fielding of Bow Street, London, was really the founder of crime prevention, but he was a century ahead of his time. Nevertheless, he set himself two gigantic tasks: first, to stamp out existing crime, and secondly, to prevent outbreaks of crime in future. He stated that to do this three things were necessary: first, a strong police force; secondly, the active cooperation of the public—what he called a body of citizen householders—and thirdly, the removal of the causes of crime and conditions in which it flourishes. These remain to this day the basic principles for the prevention of crime.

● (1430)

Mr. Fred Hudson, Director of the Crime Prevention Centre in Stafford, England, visited several countries in Europe to examine police crime prevention policies. One of the most impressive features of his tour was the striking difference which he found in the continental police approach to young people. Besides a policy of the protection of property, the continental aim has been to prevent people from becoming criminals and not merely to prevent people from committing crimes.

Crime today is a by-product, not of poverty but of increasing wealth. However, there is hope for the future. Crime prevention departments and the police must be sensitive to changes in patterns in crime, and must strive at all times to be ahead of the criminals. This prevention, along with the wisdom shown by the Dutch penal reform system now in practice, gives us hope of keeping crime under control.

An analysis of the Dutch penal system and its workings is presented by L. H. C. Hulsman, who was born in 1923, and who is a professor of criminal law and criminology at Rotterdam's Erasmus University. He has written widely on the described changes, and proposed measures for further reform. Please note the words "further reform." They do not at any time think they have completed what they started out to do.

In 1973, Newsweek published an article headlining the Netherlands as a "Land without Prisons." This, of course, is too good to be true, though in that country there are substantially fewer prisons and prisoners than in any other for which statistics are available.

In the past years the Netherlands prison system has achieved one of the dearest aims of European prison administrators—it has reduced its prison population. Although the Dutch have shared in the general increase in crime which has affected all of Western Europe, the number held in prison decreased by almost a quarter between 1964 and 1970. The number in prison now is only 2,700 which, compared with the Dutch population of almost 13 million, gives a rate of 21 prisoners per 100,000. The rate for England and Wales is over 80 prisoners per 100,000 of population, while Austria has more than 100 prisoners per 100,000. Even a country like Sweden, which rightly prides itself on advanced penal policies, averages over 60 prisoners per 100,000.

The remarkable news of the Dutch experience has induced prison officials from other countries to visit the Netherlands and study the secret of this success. The main reason for the decrease of the prison population is surprisingly simple. It lies in the fact that Dutch courts are now giving shorter sentences than they were only a few years ago. This has meant that the number actually in prison at any one time has fallen off. Today, sentences of over ten years are rare, and over two-thirds of the prisoners are serving sentences of less than 12 months. But although the cause may be clear enough, the authorities are in some difficulty in trying to explain why the courts' sentencing should have changed so substantially.

Amid a welter of theories, the most likely is that many judges believe long sentences are ineffective, and feel that there is nothing to be lost by trying shorter ones. There seems to be a general mistrust of long sentences, especially in academic circles. In the Netherlands the views of criminologists seem to have some influence with the judges. Prisoners in general do not become more social after a long stay in prison! The Netherlands prison system can therefore offer the offender the space and opportunity to obtain better treatment in small groups. In some of the open prisons young men are now frequently treated in groups of only ten.

Perhaps the most useful achievement has been the refutation of the old theory that short prison sentences are by definition useless. It is certainly right to argue that many men in prison who happen to be serving short sentences should not be there. But it does not follow from this that short sentences should, therefore, be abolished.

While police and prison staff organizations in many western countries call for tougher deterrents and more modern buildings, there are now only 50 men in the Netherlands serving more than 4-year sentences. Hardly any women are imprisoned—there are only about 26 at the moment—while some prisons are being closed.

The principle of rehabilitation rather than punishment was embodied in the Prison Act passed by the Dutch Parliament in 1951, but the drastic reduction of sentences only started about 10 years thereafter. Individual approach to and treatment of detainees is stressed by the Prison Act, which provides:

While maintaining the nature of the punishment or measure, the implementation thereof shall be such as to also prepare prisoners for their return to normal life in the community.

This provision was the first assault on the traditional system in nearly all the prisons in the Netherlands.

An endeavour was made by the prison authorities to put this provision into practice by individualizing the execution of the punishment as far as possible—that is to say, by regarding the imprisonment as being imposed on a particular person with a particular background, and executing the punishment at the place that offers the best facilities to prepare him for his return to society and normal life.

This sound approach to the treatment of prisoners manifests itself, first of all, in the way in which the group leader and the officer in charge of discipline treat the prisoner in their daily contacts with him. Therefore, modern developments are directed at improving the general atmosphere of the institutions, strengthening the specialist staff, grouping the inmates into small units led by group leaders, and extending the social work carried on in the institutions. Putting into practice the new ideas about more humane and purposeful execution of punishments has also made it necessary to direct research at the way in which prisoners are treated and how they react. Policy is aimed at giving prisoners the best possible guidance during their stay.

With regard to remand in custody, it will be focused on reducing the ill-effects on prisoners of confinement and isolation from society and, further, on assuring prisoners of the best possible re-adaptation to life outside. To this end, an endeavour is made to break through the closed character of the institutions, so as to prevent prisoners from becoming alienated from the outside world.

Wherever possible, prisoners are brought into contact with normal society, and an attempt is made to make life in the institutions approximately or more closely linked with life outside. In particular, means are sought for giving prisoners a measure of responsibility, both individual and collective. To promote this, it is important that there should be good communication between prisoners and personnel, and opportunities for the prisoners to express their opinions freely. Encouragement is given to the formation of prisoners' committees for consultation with the management, on behalf of the inmates, on life in the prison, or certain aspects of it, and to other forms of free expression of opinion—for example, the production of their own news sheet.

[Senator Norrie.]

● (1440)

Besides these non-material developments, which proceed only very gradually, an attempt is being made in the material field to achieve closer approximation to normal social conditions. For instance, in remand houses the inmates are allowed to wear their ordinary clothes and, in many institutions, to keep their personal belongings, such as watches and rings.

The head of the Dutch prison department has stated on several occasions that he considers a further reduction in the number of detainees and correctional institutions to be desirable, and that he would not wish the detention system to be regarded as a resocialization agency.

There is one factor to which the comparative mildness of the Dutch criminal law procedure cannot, in any case, be attributed. Foreigners tend to account for the lack of severity with the argument that the Netherlands, unlike their own countries, is a quiet, homogeneous society. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Netherlands, perhaps more so than other nation in Western Europe, is closely involved in precisely those processes of change that in the past have led to increased penal action wherever they occurred. The population growth is high, and the age group comprising those from 15 to 24 years old, which always yields the greater number of known delinquents, is rather heavily represented—between 17 and 18 per cent of the Dutch population. Numerous refugee youngsters, helped by Dutch drug addiction institutions, are foreigners who have no faith in applying for help at home for the very reason that aid centres there are so closely connected with the penal system. That ties right in with our own drug legislation.

Honourable senators, in the issue of The Christian Science Monitor of July 21, 1975, there is the first part of an interesting article, which will continue in four parts altogether. Let me read you the headline, and a few paragraphs from it. The headline is: "U.S. Police: A New Image?" The article says:

Many U.S. police departments, too often isolated from the communities they serve, from each other, and from changes around them, are trying new methods. They seek to upgrade training, recruit women and minority-group officers, make better use of civilian specialists, and learn from each other. Yet improvement is still too often slowed by parochialism within departments, and by lack of community support.

In referring to neighbourhood police units, the article goes to state what their aim is:

—to take a new step in police work, by shifting police both white and black away from stereotyped images, getting them out of the isolation of their squad cars and into closer touch with the people they serve.

It states that innovations are being tried:

Albany's neighborhood police unit experiment, also being tried in other cities, is just one of many innovations tried by police departments across the United States in the past few years. It is an example of the rethinking going on among many police officials who believe that police work in the U.S. needs change as crime rates continue to spiral upward.

There is also reference to the city-wide program as it "seeks better criminal investigations through closer involvement of detectives in the neighborhoods and better teamwork between detectives and police," which is an innovation down there too. This article goes on at length, and I commend it to you for your consideration.

Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Lamontagne's proposed study by the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy of health care, education, social security, pollution, urban living, leisure, crime prevention and criminal rehabilitation, is highly desirable, but the fact remains that we have no indication of when the study of crime prevention and related problems will take place. Personally, I prefer Senator McGrand's proposal, and suggest that we fall in behind him and establish a special committee to study crime prevention and criminal readjustment.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest to Senator McGrand's speech of May 14 last on crime and violence. He at that time presented a motion to establish a special committee to inquire into and report on crime and violence as it affects our society today. I would like to say that I support his motion, and hope that such a committee will be constituted and set to work as soon as possible when Parliament meets later this year.

Over the last 15 years, and especially from 1962 to the present time, there has been a very significant increase in the amount of violent crimes reported. One has only to read the daily newspapers to realize that crime is increasing daily. The number of murders, rapings, kidnappings, bombings, robberies and lesser crimes is appalling. Child abuse with all its horrors is increasing, and we know that these abuses affect those children as they grow to adulthood.

If and when the United Nations Congress on Crime Prevention is held, we hope it will produce some worthwhile ideas with respect to controlling the crime and violence which is all around us today. Perhaps we should take a look at other countries with older cultures than ours to see how they are faring in controlling crime. The list is long, but let us take a look at a few. I am thinking of Sweden and the United Kingdom.

To bring this into immediate focus I would mention that in last week's press there was a report of an exchange program between the police of Ottawa and the constabulary of Scotland. We know that the Scottish police do not carry firearms, and do not want to be required to do so. The laws of the land on the possession and use of firearms are so stringent that the police themselves believe that they should not be armed to enforce the law, except in extreme circumstances. If others can, and do, effectively ban the possession and use of firearms, why can't we? If the sale and use of firearms were restricted except in special cases, I feel sure there would be fewer crimes caused by these weapons.

Honourable senators, another aspect which we must consider in any examination of the causes of crime is the permeation of violence throughout our culture. It is found in professional sport. It is found in movie theatres and on television, where the most popular shows are pure violence from beginning to end. Our newspapers and newscasts daily report incidents of crime, tragedy and war. It is evident that crime is becoming one of the major problems facing our society, and if no immediate action is taken it will surely grow worse.

It would seem that, with all the many resources available in this country, we should be able to eliminate many of the underlying causes of the crime and violence with which we are plagued. I congratulate Senator McGrand for bringing the subject to the attention of this house.

On motion of Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, July 24, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

BROADCASTING

APPEARANCE OF GERDA MUNSINGER ON CBC TELEVISION PROGRAM—ANSWER TO INQUIRY—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege, which I hope is in order. If it is not, I am sure our numerous experts on the rules will call me to order, and I shall "cease upon the midnight with no pain."

My question of privilege relates to the reply which was presented in this chamber on July 21 to the inquiry I made on June 10 with respect to the CBC program in which the celebrated Mrs. Munsinger took part, in which, indeed, she was the star turn. I regret to say that I find this reply, or this so-called reply, not only thoroughly unsatisfactory, but in certain respects not a reply at all. Furthermore, in certain respects I think it is contemptuous of the Senate.

First of all, in answer to the first of the questions which I raised, the answer, or what purports to be the answer, is:

It has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration.

Well, I do not know whether it has been customary or whether it has not been customary but I do not think that that affects the right of this house to get information from a crown corporation. If it has been customary, I think it is a bad custom, and I think it is time this house asserted its rights to get information on a subject of this sort.

This applies also to one of the other so-called replies, namely, number 5. It is the same thing again, with slight variations.

It has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration.

It is the same thing exactly.

Now, in respect to the second question which I asked, which was:

Has Mrs. Munsinger a record of criminal convictions in Canada?

The answer, or the so-called answer is:

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are unable to answer this question, as requests for criminal records must be supported by fingerprints, otherwise no identification can be made.

This is a preposterous non-answer. I didn't ask for a criminal record; I asked if this lady, if I may dignify her by that title, had a criminal record. Surely if the question is asked, "Has so-and-so a criminal record?", it is no answer at all to reply, "We can't give you the criminal record because you don't give us the fingerprints." I have never heard anything so preposterous in my life. It is a monumental irrelevance.

The answer to the third question is perfectly satisfactory. It is a real answer.

The answer to the fourth question—

Is it the intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to present other persons of similar qualifications on this program at public expense?

—is perfectly sublime. It is an exercise, a masterly exercise, in the art of saying nothing in elaborate words. The answer, so-called, is this:

It is the intention of the CBC to interview, from time to time, persons who have been part of the Canadian scene.

That, like something very much better, really passes all understanding. Again, of all the monumental irrelevancies! Of all the mild detonations, in this case, in a dense fog, that is about the worst.

Then we come to question number 6:

What criteria does the corporation use in selecting the people who are to appear on this program?

The answer given is:

It is the intention—

Says the so-called answer.

—of the CBC to interview, from time to time, persons who have been part of the Canadian scene.

By what stretch of the imagination can that be called a criterion, a standard by which people are selected to take part in this program or any other program? I defy anybody to find any dictionary which would justify the description of that as a criterion.

Then, of course, you have question number 7 which I have already referred to. Then you have question number 8 and you get for once a perfectly straightforward and simple answer. The question was:

Does the government consider that the presentation of Mrs. Munsinger on this program conforms with the CBC's mandate as laid down in the Broadcasting Act?

And the answer is, "Yes". I disapprove of the answer, but it is a perfectly good, straightforward and relevant answer. If the rest had been as good as that, I should have said, "Well, I may disapprove, but at least I know where I am." But the rest seem to me highly unsatisfactory, either irrelevant or in contempt of the Senate.

At this stage of the session I don't propose to go into the matter further, but later on, if it is possible to do so, or possibly in a new session, if the rules prevent it during this session, I think I shall raise the whole question of the responsibility, the answerability of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the two Houses of Parliament. I have never been one of those who went out gunning for the CBC; I have always been a strong supporter of the CBC. But it seems to me that the CBC cannot put itself in this arrogant fashion above Parliament. I think Parliament has the right to certain information and I reserve the right, myself, to raise this question once again, having examined, first of all, the various precedents with relation to the furnishing by crown corporations of information to either house of Parliament.

● (1410)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I detect that Senator Forsey feels that the CBC has been somewhat less than forthcoming with respect to the information they have provided. I tend to agree with his position. May I suggest to him that he should exercise his opportunity, when the CBC next appears before one of the committees of the Senate, to cross-examine them carefully with respect to their policy in matters of this kind? I for one would be very interested to hear the honourable senator give a Viewpoint commentary after the National News some evening, setting forth for the Canadian people his view on the subject. I must agree that some of the answers are unsatisfactory.

I wish to inform honourable senators that I intend to write to the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation expressing some of my own views on this subject.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I can only assure the house that the suggestion offered me by the honourable Leader of the Government with regard to cross-examining these gentry or ladies, as the case may be, when they come before a committee of this house is an invitation which he did not even need to suggest. I shall be most happy to accept the suggestion, however, even if it merely anticipates what I was considering myself.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

INVITATION TO PARLIAMENT OF CANADA TO SEND DELEGATION TO RUSSIA—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday I gave a partial answer to several questions asked by Senator Yuzyk regarding an invitation from the U.S.S.R. to send a delegation to the Soviet Union. I have made inquiries and wish to provide the following supplementary information and clarification:

The Government of the U.S.S.R. sent an invitation to the Speaker of the House of Commons in 1973 and, of course, the Honourable Speaker of the Senate was jointly informed of this invitation and apprised of it. The Speaker of the House of Commons was requested to select a joint Senate-House of Commons delegation. Due to intervening matters, a definite date was not arrived at until recently, when the dates of September 5 to September 16 inclusive were chosen. With regard to Senator Yuzyk's request that a copy of the invitation from the U.S.S.R. be tabled, I am informed that this is a matter which is completely within the jurisdiction of the Speaker of the House of Commons. In other words, I understand that the actual invitation as such was directed to him and any request should be directed toward His Honour.

The Honourable James Jerome, in selecting persons for the delegation, was to choose 12 persons—three members of the Senate and nine members of the House of Commons. The selection of delegates, as I indicated yesterday, was fundamentally within Mr. Speaker Jerome's complete jurisdiction.

The final selection has been completed, and the delegation will be as follows: From the Senate—Senator Petten and Senator Belisle. From the House of Commons—Honourable James Jerome, Mr. Florian Côté, Dr. Gaston Isabelle, Mr. Walter Smith, Mr. Robert Kaplan, Mr. G. W. Baldwin, Mr. S. Paproski, Mr. Walter D. Baker, Mr. Stanley Knowles and Mr. André Fortin. I have personally been invited to accompany the delegation as Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, part of one question has not been answered, namely, whether the Speaker of the Senate also received an invitation in any form.

Senator Perrault: I understand it was a joint invitation, but that one of the Speakers was assigned the ultimate responsibility of forming the delegation. It was almost like a co-chairmen situation.

Presumably there has been consultation on the matter, but the basic responsibility lies with Mr. Speaker Jerome of the House of Commons. I understand that the communication went to both Speakers.

Senator Yuzyk: I hope the Speaker of the Senate was also consulted in the selection of the delegation.

PRIVATE BILL

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (RICHARD FRITZ AND MARIANNE STRASS)—THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Denis for third reading of Bill C-1001, to provide an exception from the general law relating to marriage in the case of Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass.

● (1420)

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, rest assured, the pile of books I brought is not an indication of the length of the speech I want to make. When I lifted this weight to come down to the Senate earlier I remembered a story that happened at the Hall of Justice in Quebec City some 30 years ago or more. The hall was being renovated and someone was pushing down the corridor a cart filled with law books from the library—somebody moving, probably. A lawyer asked what was happening. He was told it was a lawyer known for his great knowledge of procedure who was going down to plead a simple routine case in practice division.

Once again, rest assured, it may not be a simple matter of procedure I want to raise but at a given point yesterday Senator Denis stirred up or gave rise to the problem when he said on page 1252 of Hansard:

—just a word in answer to my friend Senator Flynn about that. I must point out that the province is entitled to pass legislation amending the Civil Code.

If that statement by Senator Denis had to be taken to the letter I would agree. But in the context it had to be construed as the right to legislate in the area of marriage and divorce, and I fully disagree with that proposal.

Senator Denis: I agree with you.

Senator Flynn: Especially as when he introduced the bill on July 21—last Monday—Senator Denis stated quite clearly that he thought Parliament had exclusive jurisdiction in that area. So, in my opinion at least, he seemed to contradict himself yesterday.

Senator Denis: I rise on a point of order. I believe there is a misunderstanding. I was misunderstood when I said—and I think the honourable senator understands me—that the Quebec Legislative Assembly could amend its Code; generally that is true. Unfortunately, the Leader of the Opposition did not mention that he was referring to marriage. Of course, in that context, I should have known he was speaking only of that. We therefore agree. I apologize if he understood that the Quebec government could modify any and all federal laws.

Senator Flynn: That having been said, I suppose I could resume my seat, except that Senator Denis said that I misunderstood him. I doubt that I did, because until then we had spoken of nothing other than the provisions of the Civil Code dealing with marriage. And so, what led me to adjourn the debate, what worried me, was that I did not want Hansard to indicate that we were doing things here that fall within the jurisdiction of the Quebec National Assembly. Had that been the case, I should by far have preferred that the National Assembly deal with it. In any event, I do not accept that there should exist parallel or overlapping jurisdictions in the matter. If the National Assembly could do it, Mr. Fritz and Miss Strass would not have had to come to us.

That is the point I wanted to make very briefly by underlining the chain of events. As has been said, already section 91, subsection 26, of the British North America Act gives exclusive jurisdiction to Parliament over marriages and divorces. Section 129, which was well quoted by Senator Denis yesterday, but which he did not seem to interpret correctly, in my opinion, stipulates that acts in effect at the time of confederation, whether they were passed in Lower or Upper Canada, continued to be in force, but that if in the future these acts came under federal jurisdiction, only Parliament could amend or modify them. Therefore, the National Assembly no longer had jurisdiction as concerns the provisions of the Civil Code governing marriage. At the time, divorce was not even mentioned in the Civil Code.

For this reason, as Senator Denis said, even though he seemed to deny it yesterday, it was therefore necessary for the petitioners to come to us instead of the National Assembly of Quebec.

This is why I am going over this issue. I would like to say that the federal Parliament—I said that it had never dealt with this provision, but I was wrong—the federal Parliament, as I said, legislated in matters of marriage. The first time was in 1882 when it solved the problem of interdiction of marriage between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law and vice versa by saying that a man or a woman could marry his sister-in-law or her brother-in-law if the brother or sister were dead. That was the first amendment.

[Senator Flynn.]

● (1430)

The second amendment was made in 1932 in Chapter 10 of the Statutes for that year. The prohibition of marriage between uncle and niece and between aunt and nephew was changed by removing the impediment in cases where the person creating the relationship had died. I might add that such is not the case for the beneficiaries of the bill. Therefore, they are still subject to the prohibition in the 1867 Civil Code which remained unchanged until recently. Originally, Section 126 of the Code read as follows:

Marriage is also prohibited between uncle and niece, aunt and nephew.

With this act of 1932, now Chapter M-5 of the Revised Statutes of 1970, and previously Chapter 176 of the 1952 Statutes, Parliament changed that rule. I believe that for the sake of clarity, I should refer to it, and I quote:

A marriage is not invalid merely because the man is a brother of a deceased husband of the woman, or a son of a brother or sister of a deceased husband of the woman.

As I said, this amendment did not cover the petitioners' problem, the parties interested in this special and exceptional bill.

Parliament also legislated in the field of marriage when it passed, in 1967/68, the Divorce Act. Certain minor amendments were brought to the Marriage Act which I just referred to.

The provisions of the Civil Code dealing with marriage were not amended by the National Assembly, except in 1969. I therefore wonder how the National Assembly could amend such provisions in the Civil Code. Because by enacting chapter 74 of the 1969 Statutes, the National Assembly amended section 125 and section 126 which are involved here. However, after reading carefully both amendments and the text of those sections as they stand in the present act, I came to the conclusion that the National Assembly had not really legislated in those matters, that it had only drafted that section so as to make it consistent with the provisions of the federal legislation of 1932. I therefore think it is clear that the problem of those who are concerned by this bill could only be solved by way of federal legislation.

However, an important point, which I and Senator Neiman raised in committee, is that the best way to solve problems of that kind in such particular instances would be by means of an amendment made to the legislation relating to marriage by the federal Parliament. I hope that will be done eventually, and we will no longer have to be confronted by such complex problems in the future.

I said yesterday that, when I went to the committee, I had forgotten almost everything I had learned in university, since, unlike Senator Dennis, I did not have the opportunity to practise in that highly specialized area. However, see he has also forgotten some bits and pieces.

So, to make the official report of the Senate debates and the decision of the Senate clear, to have them rely on unequivocal bases, I wanted to make the matter quite clear.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I have little to add to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. We agree on every point, and on top of that, thanks to the adjournment of the debate, we have cleared up the matter of the jurisdiction of the Province of Quebec with respect to amending its Civil Code.

Senator Asselin: Agreed.

Senator Denis: You were under the impression that the question merely related to marriage, and I was under the impression that it related to the Civil Code in general. So we are perfectly agreed.

I agree that the federal Parliament should carry out a deeper study in order to know whether there is any possibility of amendments. In any event, you received the Leader of the Government's assurance, as reported on page 1252 of the Debates of the Senate:

... I give an undertaking that the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition will be brought to the attention of the appropriate government people.

Never have we been more in agreement, except if Senator Asselin asks me whether it is the government's intention to keep on presenting such bills, I shall simply say that it is not the government which presents private bills, and this is just a private bill.

Senator Asselin: It is the government which amends laws.

Senator Denis: The government amends laws, but through votes taken both in the House of Commons and the Senate.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SCIENCE POLICY

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, July 22, the debate on the motion of Senator Lamontagne for the adoption of the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the other day the Honourable Leader of the Opposition asked me whether I accepted the idea that the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy should have its mandate renewed so that it could investigate three specific areas outlined in that committee's report presented in this chamber by the Honourable Senator Maurice Lamontagne on July 10 of this year.

I believe that the question to be answered is not whether honourable senators want more committees nor whether more money must be spent in order to allow a committee to carry out its terms of reference. With respect, I believe the issue to which we must turn our minds is whether we want this particular Special Committee on Science Policy to continue.

In its initial stage, certain goals were discussed and then accepted by the Senate. Our distinguished colleagues, Senator Grosart, Senator Carter and Senator Lamontagne, have spoken of the real accomplishments of this committee and, I believe, the attainment of goals that the committee had set out for itself.

Senator Flynn is rightly concerned about a proliferation of committees that might be a drain on the finite amount of time and energy that senators can devote to committee work, specially in view of the accelerated schedule of activities for the Senate in recent weeks and months. As in all areas, we must assign, as a deliberative body, a set of priorities. The extremely worthwhile work done by this committee, and the further specific areas it wishes to explore are, I submit, very worthy of consideration by all of us.

Senator Flynn was concerned that, should we approve the request of the committee, we would be confirming its mandate for a period of perhaps another three years. May I suggest that honourable senators consider setting a time limit—for example, 18 or 24 months, or some period of that kind—within which the special committee would be instructed to report on its three specific areas of investigation.

As its distinguished chairman has rightly pointed out, a special committee has to come before this chamber at the beginning of each session to have its mandate reconfirmed. At that time the house would be quite in order to ask for an interim progress report, giving the expected date of final reporting, keeping in mind the target date originally set by the Senate.

One may say that a special committee might ask for several extensions in order to meet its goals, but with a time being established for an interim and a final report—a procedure which is followed in other areas of inquiry—the Senate would be kept up to date on the work of the special committee.

To those senators who feel that certain restrictions would be put on their activities should this suggestion be adopted by the Senate, as to interim and final reporting times, I think it is well for all of us to follow the example set by the Government of Canada in its budgetary responsibilities outlined in the budget speech and in measures announced by the Minister of Finance on June 23. As Mr. Turner said at that time, it is the intention of the government—and it should be the intention of the Senate of Canada as a legislative body—to bring expenditures under more effective control and to slow their rate of growth this year and in the future.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, I feel that I reflect the view generally held in this chamber when I commend to you the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy. I would ask you to consider carefully both its request to study three specific areas, and the suggestion which I have advanced as to the time within which those areas can be investigated and reported on to the Senate and the people of Canada.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Lamontagne speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, there appear to be no other participants in this debate, and I wish to add just a few closing remarks.

First, I should like to say to those who are worried about the future of this chamber and its survival that, in spite of its important legislative role, the Senate will not receive the public support it needs unless it maintains its present dynamic and active committees, charged with the responsibility of investigating and monitoring important areas of public policy. That has been a vital role of the Senate, and I hope we continue to carry it out as efficiently as we have in the past.

The second point I should like to make is that over the years since coming to the Senate I have been most impressed by the work done by all of our committees. I do not hesitate to say that that work has been done with more devotion, more efficiency and at far less cost than is the case with respect to similar activities undertaken by other investigatory bodies, including royal commissions and committees of the other place. In my opinion that general observation applies to all committees, including the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy.

However, some honourable senators have expressed concern about the budget of our committee over recent years. I should like to assure them at once that there is nothing secret about our expenditures. As is the case with all other committees, we have faithfully followed the rules of this house. Our successive budgets have been submitted and approved by the Internal Economy Committee, and our annual expenditures have been tabled at the beginning of each session, as the rules of the Senate require.

Perhaps there are those who wonder whether the expenditures of the committee have been exaggerated. In answer to any such suggestion, let me say that since November 1967 the committee's outlays have amounted to approximately $950,000. By way of comparison, let me give you the expenditures of the Science Council of Canada, which carries out more or less similar activities as an advisory body to the government, but which had, in my view, less impact on government policy than we have had over the years. The Science Council's annual budget for the fiscal year 1976 is more than $2.1 million.

Senator Hicks: Did you say $2.1 million?

Senator Lamontagne: Yes, $2.1 million. In other words, it will be spending in one year, the current fiscal year, more than twice as much as the Science Policy Committee has spent over a period of seven years.

● (1450)

Out of our total expenditures, about $350,000 was devoted to the printing of our proceedings and reports. We have, of course, no control over these amounts, but the 12,000 pages of evidence that we have published represent the most detailed information that exists in Canada on the subject. Moreover, according to rough estimates, the sale of our publications by Information Canada has brought in almost $100,000, which unfortunately does not appear in our accounts. Apart from these printing costs we have spent, therefore, on the average, about $72,000 a year.

These figures show, in my view at least, that while the committee has done most useful work, it has sought to keep its expenditures to a minimum, and has succeeded.

I hope that this information will satisfy those honourable senators who may have been concerned about our operations. If the present report is adopted I would expect that our public hearings on our new terms of reference will begin early in November, but before this new operation starts a good deal of follow-up and preparatory work will have to be done.

First, we will have to finalize our document, entitled "Managing the Future," as I mentioned the other day, and prepare the French version of it, before it can be printed, published and distributed.

Secondly, we will have to communicate with the people on the list we had started to develop in preparation for the conference, informing them of our decision not to hold this meeting, and telling them to communicate with the Institute for Research on Public Policy which will continue our activities in the area of futures studies and information.

Thirdly, we will have to communicate with government departments and agencies as soon as possible, asking them to appear before us later in the fall, and informing them of the subjects we will expect them to cover in their presentations.

This means that in the next three months we shall be fairly busy with these three specific tasks, in addition to gathering as much information as we can on the recommendations contained in our report, A Science Policy for Canada, which have not been accepted, and also on those which have been accepted and implemented. We have a good deal of useful work ahead of us for a year or so, but not a longer period than that if I can help it.

When this work is completed, and especially in view of the experience we will have accumulated in this new watch-dog role, the Senate will then be in a position to decide whether it should continue its interest in this field. If it decides in the affirmative, it will have to determine whether this responsibility should be assigned to an existing standing committee or to a new one—but this is not for us to decide today.

I again urge the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

Senator Perrault: I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator Flynn: You do not expect any news before 2 o'clock tomorrow?

Senator Perrault: We have received an encouraging report from the other place.

Senator Flynn: The honourable Leader of the Government is easily encouraged.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, July 25, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVATE BILL

ALLIANCE SECURITY & INVESTIGATION, LTD.—COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-26, respecting Alliance Security & Investigation, Ltd., and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with the following amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

Clause 3: Renumber the present subclause (2) as subclause (3).

Add immediately after line 5, on page 2, the following new subclause:

"(2) The Company shall not carry on any business until after it has applied for and has been granted a certificate by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the effect that its name is not confusingly similar to that of another company incorporated or carrying on business in Canada."

Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Senator Flynn: Now, or at the next sitting, as the Senate wishes.

Senator Langlois: Why not now?

Senator Flynn: With leave, I move that the amendment be taken into consideration now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not know if I need add a word of explanation. This amendment was moved in the committee of the other place on the suggestion of the Department of Justice. It is agreeable to the petitioners and counsel for the company. I am not too sure that it means much. It is certainly not controversial. It simply provides that the company will revive when the department is sure that the name is not confusing and does not resemble any other name. However, the fact is that the company was incorporated under that name and I suppose it is desired that the second company, which was incorporated to succeed the first, should abandon its charter before the company is revived. It is a technical point and I am not convinced that it was necessary to introduce this amendment. At any rate, since it will satisfy the Department of Justice, we have no objection.

Motion agreed to and amendment concurred in.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of agreements made under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 7 of the said Act, Chapter A-6, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of March, 1975, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE POLICY—BUDGET TABLED

Senator Langlois, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy with respect to its consideration of Canadian government and other expenditures on scientific activities and matters related thereto, as authorized by the Senate on July 24, 1975.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Robichaud be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator McElman on the list of senators serving on the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, July 30, 1975, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before the question is put, may I make a statement on the current situation? It was expected that by 2 o'clock this afternoon, or no later than 3 o'clock, we would have had notice from the other place that approval had been given to Bill C-66.

However, I am sure you are well aware of the fact that a serious matter of personal privilege has been raised in the other place with respect to one of its members. There is now a motion under debate to refer this matter of privilege, which has been the subject of much discussion, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have been informed that this development will effectively prevent the other place from dealing with Bill C-66 this afternoon. The fact is that we have been waiting for this measure for some days, and the time of its ultimate disposition will determine when we are able to adjourn for the summer recess.

The motion before us would have the Senate reassemble on Wednesday next at 11 o'clock in the morning, but it does not rule out the possibility of telegrams being sent to honourable senators should it be found necessary to meet before that time, or if the business in the other place is completed before then. Eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning appears to be a realistic time, certainly in view of the information we have at this time.

Senator Flynn: Did the government leader say 11 o'clock in the morning?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am quite sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate will not be surprised to hear me say that what we are doing here now could and should have been done yesterday.

Senator Perrault: The motion had not been presented yesterday.

Senator Flynn: I know.

Senator Perrault: The aggrieved party in the other place, on his own initiative, has moved the referral motion in the other place. This is an action that was beyond any prior knowledge of the government.

Senator Flynn: I know the motion was not put yesterday, but it was suggested by me that we should come back next week.

I am aware that the other place is having problems as a result of a matter of privilege raised by a parliamentary secretary. That may well have disrupted their timetable, but I am not too sure that the same situation would not have arisen without it. I would say that if we were adjourning until later today, and the bill were to arrive at 4 o'clock, the Senate would be under pressure to debate it in an hour.

Senator Perrault: Not at all.

Senator Flynn: Certainly. The Senate cannot properly discharge its duties when it is faced with a deadline, or with the threat of sitting on a Saturday, when the other place has already adjourned and is waiting on us for royal assent. The Senate cannot properly discharge its responsibilities in such circumstances. The atmosphere is not conducive to doing so.

I seize this opportunity to tell the government leader, and the Senate generally—more practically the majority, but not only the majority in this house—that unless we adopt an attitude of autonomy with regard to the discharge of the business of the Senate, we will never cease to be confronted with situations of this sort.

[Senator Perrault.]

We are sitting today for no good and valid reason. We should not be here. We have sat here five days this week, yet what we have done could have been done in one day had we wanted. I consider this subservient attitude that we are given to adopting in our relationship with the other place totally demeaning. When it is only a matter of adjournment and not of prorogation, the Senate should go about its business in the ordinary way, uninfluenced by the whim and fancy of the other place.

● (1410)

I would not know what to do with regard to Bill C-66 were it to come to us at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Dealing with it today, or dealing with it tomorrow, would have amounted to the same thing. We might just as well take an hour today, or even go so far as to go through it without any debate, rather than stretch it into tomorrow merely to appear to have done something about it.

I hope that the Leader of the Government will remember this episode, and that in future we will not revert to that obsequious attitude to which the former leader was so prone, an attitude which required us to sit here at the beck and call of the other place. The Senate is an independent body. It is not up to the government leader in the other place to tell us when we should sit. I do not mind agreeing to extraordinary sittings occasionally so that those senators who are here all the time can get home. But, for God's sake, if being here serves no purpose at all, I, for one, would rather go home and come back when there is something useful to do.

The dignity of the Senate requires that we should deal with the matters presented to us in due course, in the regular established way. If the Leader of the Government had accepted my suggestion yesterday, we would have adjourned until Tuesday or Wednesday next. We would not be sitting here now with nothing to do. We have nothing to do today; we had practically nothing to do yesterday. We are made to appear as though we are sitting around waiting to rubber-stamp any legislation that comes over from the other place just so that we can go home for the summer. And that's a crying shame. Again, I say that we are demeaning the Senate by adopting this servile attitude.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not about to accept the lecture which has just been given us by the Leader of the Opposition. It seems to me that the public good and the people of Canada are the paramount concerns of this chamber, and should be the paramount concerns of the other place.

Senator Flynn: Be realistic.

Senator Perrault: To suggest that it is not necessary for the two Houses of Parliament to cooperate in advancing the public good is to state something quite beyond any parliamentary tradition of which I have knowledge. I can understand the chagrin of the Leader of the Opposition who may have made personal plans for this weekend—

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Perrault: —but I want to assure him that when an important measure is before Parliament, one of the responsibilities of this chamber is to make sure that the measure is dealt with expeditiously, fairly and efficiently, and with due consideration. There has never been any suggestion from this side of the chamber that Bill C-66 should be dealt with in one hour. That may have been the practice of the Leader of the Opposition when he occupied a post of responsibility as a member of another government. I assure him, however, that it would have been the intention of the government to have given fair and full consideration to Bill C-66 had it come to this chamber this afternoon, and to meet this evening, if necessary, and tomorrow, if necessary, so that royal assent could be given on Monday. To suggest that somehow there is an inclination on this side of the chamber for the Senate to be a rubber stamp, that we are prepared to give blind approval to any measure which comes to us from the other place, is totally at variance with the facts and traditions of this government.

I want to remind the honourable the Leader of the Opposition that, when he occupied a post of responsibility as a member of another government, there was the same kind of cooperation between this chamber and the other place which today he has brought under attack. I resent the suggestion that this body is nothing more than the rubber stamp of those occupying positions in the other place. I also remind him that those who have caused this delay in the public business are his own associates and colleagues in the other place who have made grave inferences and innuendoes about a parliamentary secretary, who is now in the process of initiating action to defend his honour, and doing it very well.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I knew that by attacking the government I would elicit from the Leader of the Government yet another display of exaggeration and partisanship. But this time he has really outdone himself. When he refers to me as having taken a subservient attitude when I was in the other place, he does not know what he is talking about.

Senator Prowse: It puts him on all fours with you, then.

Senator Flynn: The government leader has a reputation for verbal blunders, and he has lived up to that reputation here today. He has accused me of seeking an adjournment yesterday to next week because that would have better suited my personal schedule. That is entirely untrue. But since he has referred to the matter, I will repeat what I said to the leader privately, and that is that the business of the Senate must be dealt with in an objective manner. I stated very clearly that we should never take into account personal problems. I have not had to change any personal plans, and I am willing to come back at any time. But what I am trying to get through to the Leader of the Government is that it is undignified for the Senate to be here waiting, and placing itself in a position in which, like it or not, it would have to rubber-stamp legislation. The Senate should never place itself in that position. And that is what the leader would have been doing if he had kept the Senate here until four o'clock, and the bill had come to us. We would have had the choice of either dealing with it quickly or not at all. That would have been the situation.

Honourable senators, we could and should have adjourned until next Tuesday or Wednesday. That is what I told the Leader of the Government yesterday. We could deal with the bill next Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, if necessary, but not under pressure of royal assent and the adjournment of the other place. There have been prior occasions, before the present Leader of the Government came to us, when we have been forced to work under a deadline. It was unfair then for the Senate to have to work under those conditions, and it remains so today.

I am not attacking the present government especially, nor am I saying there should not be cooperation between the two houses. I am merely saying that the Senate should not be forced to work under a deadline. It should be allowed to work in a manner compatible with its obligations and its responsibilities.

Does anybody seriously believe we can work properly on a Saturday in July when everybody is away, and when we cannot have royal assent because the other house is adjourned? Do you think we can work as we could in normal circumstances? Is that the view of the Leader of the Government? I doubt it. I do not think it is the view of the Senate generally. All I am saying is, let us show objectivity and self-respect. The Senate is independent of the House of Commons and should accomplish its work as it deems proper; not at the direction of any other body or under the threat of an adjournment of the other place, or under any other sort of duress.

Senator Perrault: I do not intend to prolong this discussion. Ever since Confederation there has been the closest cooperation—

Senator Flynn: There still is.

Senator Perrault: —between the other place and this chamber when it comes to adjournments and prorogations. The honourable senator is aware of that fact. That happens to be an historical fact under our parliamentary system, and it is a feature of other similar parliamentary systems.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: That happens to be a fact. If we cannot have that cooperation—

Senator Flynn: You will have it. You have always had it.

Senator Perrault: If we are unwilling to cooperate, we are not an effective and viable entity in our parliamentary system of government. The idea that somehow there is an inclination by anyone here to be a "rubber stamp" for the other chamber, to "rush through legislation," is totally false, and we should not give any kind of credence to that suggestion. We on this side have done a great deal of prior study of Bill C-66. We are totally prepared to deal with it and give it adequate consideration in the eventuality of a debate, whether or not this debate takes place this evening or next week. I only hope that members of the Opposition as well have done some prior preparation so that they can give full and careful consideration to this measure when it does come here.

• (1420)

Senator Grosart: We have been ready for a week.

Senator Perrault: I can understand that. But the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that somehow there is an effort or inclination by the government to rush this legislation blindly through this house is a suggestion which could create a totally false impression of this chamber for the people of Canada.

Senator Flynn: Would the Leader of the Government say we would have time to send this bill to a committee?

Senator Perrault: If honourable senators had decided that the matter should have gone to a committee, there would have been time for it to have gone to a committee. There would have been time to have done a great deal of public business before this weekend.

Senator Flynn: There would have been no inclination.

Senator Perrault: Why not?

Motion agreed to.

OIL EXPORT TAX

QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I direct the following questions to the Leader of the Government:

(1) Was there a reduction in the export tax on oil to the United States or elsewhere, made on or about June 3, 1975?

(2) If so, what was the average reduction per barrel?

(3) What would be the loss to federal revenues on an annual basis, and what would be the effect of such loss, if there were such loss, on the subsidy payments by the federal government for the purpose of the equalization of the consumer price of oil?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, because of the detailed nature of the inquiry, I would like to take it as notice. I shall certainly endeavour to have the reply for the next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, July 30, at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 30, 1975

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-66, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be now read the second time.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, before leave is granted I suggest that the bill be placed as the first item on the Orders of the Day so that I and other senators who may wish to do so may ask questions of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: I have no objection.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, including its financial statements and Auditors' Report, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 33 of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, Chapter C-13, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Harbours Board, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 32 of the National Harbours Board Act, Chapter N-8, and sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Fourth Report of the Advisory Group of Executive Compensation in the Public Service, dated April, 1975.

Copies of Agreement between the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Government of the Republic of Argentina for the Application of Safeguards to the Embalse Power Reactor Facility. (English text).

Statement showing Classification of Deposit Liabilities Payable in Canadian Currency of the Chartered Banks of Canada as at April 30, 1975, pursuant to section 119(1) of the Bank Act, Chapter B-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 16 of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act, Chapter C-11, and sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if Bill C-66 is the last piece of legislation likely to come to us before the summer—or late summer—adjournment?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, unless there are startling unforeseen developments in the other chamber today, this will be the final piece of legislation to come before us before the summer adjournment.

Senator Flynn: Would the leader tell us if it is the intention of the other place to adjourn today?

Senator Perrault: It is my understanding that an adjournment motion will be made in the other place around 2 or 3 o'clock this afternoon, and it is hoped to have royal assent late this afternoon if the Government and Opposition members of the Senate can find an area of agreement on the measure we are about to debate.

Senator Flynn: The members of the House of Commons are willing to remain for royal assent sometime today? They have agreed to that?

Senator Perrault: It is my understanding that there will be a sufficient number of their members to permit royal assent at approximately 5.45 this afternoon.

OIL EXPORT TAX

QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a reply to the question asked by Senator Grosart on Friday last, July 25. Senator Grosart's question was as follows:

(1) Was there a reduction in the export tax on oil to the United States or elsewhere, made on or about June 3, 1975?

(2) If so, what was the average reduction per barrel?

(3) What would be the loss to federal revenues on an annual basis, and what would be the effect of such loss, if there were such loss, on the subsidy payments by the federal government for the purpose of the equalization of the consumer price of oil?

In response to Senator Grosart's question, I should like to offer the following reply: The export charge on crude oil was reduced in June 1975 by 80 cents per barrel for light crudes, by 50 cents per barrel for condensates, and by 20 cents per barrel for heavy crude oils. The export charge for light and heavy crude oils had been increased by 30 cents per barrel in March 1975.

This high level of export charge resulted in reduced export volumes and decreased export charge revenues. Export volumes in May were only 59 per cent of the January levels. It is estimated that the reduction in the export charge in June resulted in restoring to a reasonable degree the export volumes and, hence, the export charge revenue that prevailed earlier.

Although the National Energy Board sets maximum export levels, presently at 750,000 barrels per day for the second half of 1975, it cannot be assured that exporters will take the full amount. Hence, it is not possible to calculate the anticipated revenue from export charge for the full calendar year.

Honourable senators, there are two tables with this answer, listing the unit export tax or charge on petroleum from October 1973 to August 1975, and the export charge revenue on crude oil from April 1974 to June 1975. May I suggest that these tables be printed in the Debates of the Senate so as to complete my answer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The tables follow)

Export Charge Revenue on Crude Oil

| Year | Exporting Month | Barrels ('000) | Revenue ($'000) | $ Average/Barrel |
|------|-----------------|----------------|------------------|-------------------|
| 1974 | April | 30,668 | 122,673 | 4.00 |
| | May | 31,633 | 126,532 | 4.00 |
| | June | 23,723 | 123,283 | 5.20 |
| | July | 25,238 | 131,236 | 5.20 |
| | August | 26,386 | 137,206 | 5.20 |
| | September | 26,525 | 137,931 | 5.20 |
| | October | 26,618 | 138,414 | 5.20 |
| | November | 25,666 | 133,308 | 5.20 |
| | December | 28,085 | 142,963 | 5.09 |
| 1975 | January | 25,179 | 128,217 | 5.09 |
| | February | 20,816 | 106,617 | 5.12 |
| | March | 20,162 | 108,118 | 5.36 |
| | April | 17,170 | 92,020 | 5.36 |
| | May | 14,943 | 80,232 | 5.37 |
| | June (estimate) | 22,200 | 102,120 | 4.60 |

Source: National Energy Board

Export Tax or Charge on Petroleum

| $/Barrels | Crude Oil & Equivalent | | | | Products | | |
|--------------|------------------------|------------|--------------------------|------------------------------|----------|------|------|
| | Light | Condensate | Heavy Crude Lloydminster | Heavy Crude Other Designated | H.F.O. | M.D. | M.G. |
| October 1973 | 0.40 | 0.40 | 0.40 | 0.40 | | | |
| November | 0.40 | 0.40 | 0.40 | 0.40 | | | |
| December | 1.90 | 1.90 | 1.90 | 1.90 | | | |
| January 1974 | 2.20 | 2.20 | 2.20 | 2.20 | | | |
| February | 6.40 | 6.40 | 6.40 | 6.40 | | | |
| March | 6.40 | 6.40 | 6.40 | 6.40 | | | |
| April | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 | | | |
| May | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 |
| June | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 |
| July | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 |
| August | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 4.00 | 4.00 | 4.00 |
| September | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 2.00 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| October | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 2.00 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| November | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 2.00 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| December | 5.20 | 5.20 | 4.10 | 4.70 | 2.00 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| January 1975 | 5.20 | 5.20 | 4.10 | 4.70 | 2.00 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| February | 5.20 | 5.20 | 4.10 | 4.70 | 2.75 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| March | 5.50 | 5.20 | 4.40 | 5.00 | 2.75 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| April | 5.50 | 5.20 | 4.40 | 5.00 | 2.75 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| May | 5.50 | 5.20 | 4.40 | 5.00 | 2.75 | 2.00 | 1.50 |
| June | 4.70 | 4.70 | 4.20 | 4.20 | 3.00 | 3.50 | 3.50 |
| July | 4.70* | 4.70* | 4.20* | 4.20* | 3.00 | 4.00 | 4.25 |
| August | 3.20 | 3.20 | 2.70 | | | | |
| September | | | | | | | |
| October | | | | | | | |
| November | | | | | | | |
| December | | | | | | | |

*Subject to adjustment after review by NEB

[Senator Perrault.]

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-66, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it will come as no surprise when I say that there has been considerable discussion on this bill in the other place and in the press. Many explanations have been given. Two amendments were made to the bill in the other place, and I will try to explain them in detail later on. In preparing my remarks I have endeavoured to deal not so much with the technicalities of the bill but with the reasoning behind its introduction at this time.

As honourable senators realize, tax bills have a tendency to be complicated, and Bill C-66 is certainly no exception. I thought the most useful approach to take would be to summarize the principal features of the bill and provide the background information concerning the dimensions of the bill.

● (1110)

To give a quick resumé, the principal feature of the bill concerns the special excise tax on gasoline. Provision is also made to increase the air transportation tax. In addition, the bill provides for important reductions in the special excise tax on gasoline and the removal of federal sales tax from insulation building materials. The new amendments, which I will refer to later on, also in general help the physically handicapped. The proposed changes contained in the bill, especially those dealing with the special excise tax on gasoline of ten cents per gallon, implement major government policies in the areas of oil and gas pricing and energy conservation.

The most significant provision of the bill concerns the introduction of the special excise tax of ten cents a gallon on gasoline for personal use. This tax will be imposed on manufacturers and importers of gasoline, but will be refunded on gasoline for virtually all uses other than personal use. For example, the tax imposed on gasoline used for farming, fishing, construction, transportation and other commercial or business purposes will be refunded, as will the tax on gasoline used by governments, hospitals and most welfare organizations.

It should be emphasized that the special excise tax on gasoline is necessary. It is necessary for two major reasons: first, to help offset the cost of financing the oil import compensation program, in light of decreasing revenues from the oil export charge resulting from a decline in our oil exports; and, secondly, to encourage energy conservation.

I am sure honourable senators will appreciate that the proposed special excise tax on gasoline, in conjunction with the recent increase in the price of crude oil, will result in a significant increase in the price of a gallon of gasoline. However, public reaction to these changes since the budget indicate that the Canadian people are prepared to accept the fact that the government has little alternative but to take action now in order to minimize future disruptions in the Canadian economy.

It must be emphasized that, even with the significant increase in the price of gasoline which will result from the proposed special excise tax, the retail price of a gallon of gas in Canada will continue to remain far below prices prevailing in overseas countries. In addition, it should be noted that the government is continuing to hold the price of energy in Canada for other purposes well below international levels.

Since the introduction of the special excise tax of ten cents a gallon on gasoline several questions have been raised concerning administrative problems that may arise in providing refunds to specified users of gasoline. I assure the Senate that the Minister of National Revenue has taken the necessary steps to make certain that the refund procedures will be administered in an efficient manner. It is expected that between 750,000 and one million persons will be entitled to claim refund of the gasoline tax because of the use of their vehicles for business or other exempt purposes.

Principally, the new excise tax on gasoline used for commercial purposes in trucks, buses, taxis, construction equipment, manufacturing equipment, and mining and forestry equipment, and that used by farmers, commercial fishermen, hunters and trappers in the course of farming, commercial fishing, hunting and trapping activities, will be refunded on stocks. The tax will also be refunded to registered charitable organizations, hospitals, municipalities and school boards, and federal and provincial government departments and agencies when the gasoline is used in their vehicles and equipment. Clergymen, medical doctors, lawyers, commercial travellers, businessmen, taxicab owners, truckers, self-employed professional persons, farmers and fishermen will be allowed to take advantage of the refunding provisions, and obtain a tax refund on gasoline purchased and used for commercial or business purposes.

In addition, the amendment which I call amendment number one, gives authority to the government to include other individuals who would qualify for refund of the 10-cent special excise tax, such as physically handicapped persons. Perhaps this is the time to refer to that amendment.

Bill C-66 incorporates two new amendments unanimously passed in the other place after, I admit, considerable debate. The first amendment, which I am discussing now, relates to line 36 on page 2, and it brings the bill into conformity with the ways and means motion tabled at the time of the June 23 budget. Honourable senators may recall that the Speaker of the House of Commons ruled that the bill was not in conformity with the ways and means motion, and ordered that the offending lines be deleted and the bill reprinted.

I assume that the honourable Leader of the Opposition has a copy of that amendment. As far as I know, it was sent to him this morning.

Senator Flynn: I did not get it.

Senator Macnaughton: Then I am glad to give it to him now, and I regret the omission.

In a situation where an eligible person, as set out in the bill, drove an automobile 20,000 miles per year of which only 12,000 miles, or 60 per cent, were for commercial or business purposes, that person, if he had purchased 1,250 gallons of gasoline, would have paid a total of $125 in gasoline tax and would be entitled to a refund of $75—that is, 60 per cent of $125.

Generally, then, those persons exempt from income tax under the provisions of Part I of the Income Tax Act will be allowed to claim refunds, as well as other persons who use their vehicles in the conduct of their business as detailed in the proposed section 47(1) of the Excise Tax Act. Since no refund of the gasoline excise tax is permitted in respect of personal use, Revenue Canada will not refund the tax for mileage which an employee may travel from his home to his place of work, and for which his employer pays. This is comparable to the expenses of personal travel from home to place of employment. Furthermore, a lawyer, doctor or business person using a car to travel from his home to his place of business would similarly be unable to claim a refund of the gasoline tax for that travel.

As the general sales tax and other excise taxes do not apply to exported goods, the new excise tax does not apply to gasoline exported or used by manufacturers or producers directly in manufacturing or production processes. To ensure that people, such as taxi owners, who purchase large quantities of gasoline are not required to wait an extended period of time to obtain a tax refund, Revenue Canada will accept claims of amounts of $200 or more once a month. Claims of less than $200 will be accepted twice yearly, covering the periods January 1 to June 30, and July 1 to December 31. This arrangement has a two-fold effect. It ensures that larger claims are processed and paid promptly, and, secondly, does not require an undue addition to costs and resources which might be necessary if small claims were processed more frequently. The first claims for amounts of $200 or more may be submitted as soon as claim forms are available, and claims for less than $200 may be submitted on or after December 31.

Since the majority of people will file claims twice per year, and others with larger claims more frequently, the government expects to receive somewhere in the vicinity of three million claims each year and expects to refund more than $170 million annually. To handle this volume, appropriate measures and resources must be put into place, so that the claims may be handled as quickly as possible. A special computer program is now being developed to handle the processing of claims and payment of refunds expeditiously.

It has also been recognized that the more simple the refund form, the better. Revenue Canada has therefore designed a refund form to make it as easy as possible for people to obtain their refunds quickly, and still provide minimum information for compliance purposes.

● (1120)

Revenue Canada will not normally ask a person to send in his gasoline invoices but will accept a declaration that the information given is accurate, although the person will be required to keep on hand documentary evidence of purchase and use. Refund forms will be available in all excise offices, customs offices and post offices across the country shortly after Labour Day.

[Senator Macnaughton.]

It is important that anyone who uses gasoline for commercial purposes maintains a careful record of his gasoline purchases, particularly gasoline used for business, to enable him to file his claims as soon as possible. Inquiries concerning the refunding procedures can now be directed to any of the local excise offices across Canada.

I am sure we are confident that our present excise organization and the existing data centre in Ottawa—which, as you know, has the reputation of being one of the most efficient in the world—will be able to handle the processing of gasoline tax refunding claims without undue difficulty and in a prompt and efficient fashion. This will be done at an estimated cost of about 1 per cent of the revenue generated by the new gasoline tax.

Comments have also been made that the proposed special excise tax on gasoline will be regressive. It is true the lower-income automobile owners spend a higher proportion of their income on gasoline than do upper-income automobile owners. In this limited sense the tax may be characterized as regressive. However, because a lower proportion of lower income people own automobiles, the tax is also, therefore, a lower burden on lower income classes taken as a whole, as opposed to higher income classes. I suppose one could thus argue that the excise tax on gasoline may be mildly progressive.

Several questions have been raised concerning the impact of the special excise tax on those who must drive their automobiles to their places of business, either because they have no other transportation available or, possibly, because they are handicapped. As honourable senators are aware, the special excise tax on gasoline is designed to discourage gasoline consumption when an automobile is used for personal rather than business uses. Under the terms of the tax, personal use includes using an automobile to travel to work. In this respect the special excise tax parallels the provisions of the Income Tax Act, which does not allow the deduction of expenses incurred in order to travel from one's home to one's place of business. While it is recognized that in some cases it may cause hardship, a policy of non-deductibility appears to be the most appropriate policy from both an administrative and an equity point of view.

The bill also proposes increases in the air transportation tax. These increases are necessary to offset heavy deficits in airport construction and operation, and they reflect the general policy that those who benefit most directly from facilities provided by the government should help to pay for them.

In addition, the bill provides for the removal of the remaining 5 per cent sales tax on building insulating materials. This measure will affect all purchases of insulating materials as well as storm windows and doors.

The bill also provides for important reductions in the special excise tax on wines. This measure was felt necessary to assist the domestic wine and grape growing industry, which has experienced a significant decline in recent months.

Perhaps I might also take a moment or two to comment on the discussion paper on federal sales and excise taxation, tabled with the June 23 budget. The tabling of the discussion paper formally invites or initiates the commodity tax review program. The paper comments on major problems with the present federal sales tax and it evaluates a number of alternatives for improving the sales tax. Although the discussion paper points out that shifting the federal sales tax from the manufacturing to the wholesale level would provide improvement, it should be emphasized that the government is not committed to this course of action but welcomes comments from the public on all aspects of commodity taxation.

In a first short summary, may I say that the budget emphasizes that inflation, recession and energy are the three issues facing Canadians and are such that no single approach can solve all of them.

The special excise tax on gasoline proposed in Bill C-66 is a necessary step to ensure that Canada will continue to be sheltered from a harsh, one-step adjustment to the forces of the world market for energy supplies. I should also like to emphasize that refund claims in respect of the special excise tax on gasoline cannot be paid by the government until such time as the necessary legislation is passed and becomes law.

I have also prepared some general comments in trying to anticipate questions which senators might have in mind, and also to avoid too long a discussion, if that is possible.

In my opening remarks in respect of Bill C-66, I observed that the proposed levy on gasoline for personal consumption had become a matter of pressing financial necessity. In recent months the gap between the cost of the subsidies resulting from the single oil price policy and the revenues from the export charge has widened considerably. In large measure this reflects the fact that our oil exports are now running some 20 per cent less than the rate in the last fiscal year. Although, as I have indicated, it is difficult to be precise about numbers, the deficit on the conservation program could amount to between $400 million and $600 million. It could, of course, be very much larger, were world oil prices raised further in the future. A special excise tax on gasoline was conceived as an appropriate means of offsetting a substantial part of this deficit.

Some people have taken exception to the use of the special excise tax on gasoline as a vehicle to finance the deficit resulting from the single oil price policy. Well, given the necessity, as explained in the budget speech, of avoiding any further increase in the overall level of cash requirements, the obvious alternatives to this particular measure would be a further reduction in federal expenditures or increases in other taxes. As the budget speech has already called for a reduction in public expenditures of $1 billion, I am sure that all senators will appreciate the difficulty of finding further reductions of approximately one-half billion dollars which would not be intolerably disruptive to surviving programs. For example, the proposal to discontinue Information Canada would provide approximately one-fiftieth of the necessary amount. With respect to alternative tax increases, it would of course be possible to increase income tax or the general sales tax. None of these possible increases, however, would have contributed in any significant way to the very important objective of energy conservation. The government has chosen, therefore, a measure which is focussed upon that energy usage—the personal consumption of gasoline—where the potential for conservation is greatest. I appreciate that this measure has been criticized as being regressive, and I discussed this a moment ago. As I said, it is true that lower-income automobile owners spend a higher proportion of their income on gasoline than do upper-income automobile owners, and in this limited sense the tax may be called regressive. However, a lower proportion of low-income people own automobiles. The tax therefore results in a lower burden on lower income classes taken as a whole, as opposed to high income classes. It may thus, in fact, be mildly progressive. This becomes all the more evident when it is recalled that all of the revenue from this tax will be passed on to consumers in the form of reduced prices for petroleum products including some heating oil.

● (1130)

Questions have been raised concerning the impact of the special excise tax on those who must drive in their automobiles to their place of business because no other transportation is available. As honourable members opposite are aware, the special excise tax on gasoline is designed to discourage gasoline consumption when an automobile is used for personal rather than business use. Under the terms of the tax, personal use includes using an automobile to get to work.

In this respect the special excise tax parallels the provisions of the Income Tax Act which do not allow the deduction of expenses incurred in getting from one's home to one's place of business. This rule of non-deductibility in the Income Tax Act has been a fundamental principle of that act for decades. It must be recognized that every person who works must get from his place of residence to his place of business. To allow a deduction of the expense of getting to work would give a tax subsidy to those who choose to drive rather than use public transportation, to those who choose to live far from their place of work, and to those who choose to drive a large automobile rather than a small one. Given that every worker has the expense of getting to work, it has always been recognized that the disallowance of these expenses is the most equitable way of dealing with the considerable disparities in the expenses incurred.

This is undoubtedly more equitable than permitting a deduction which would vary appreciably as between taxpayers, and offsetting the substantial revenue loss by a general tax increase. It is hoped that taxpayers will, to some degree, change their habits with regard to getting to work. Because of this tax, car pools and public transportation should now be much more attractive alternatives to driving alone.

It goes without saying that there will be cases in which there may be some hardship. Unfortunately, there is no equitable way of coping with these situations which would be administratively feasible. If the government were to allow a rebate of the special excise tax, it would be difficult for Revenue Canada to ensure that the claimant actually utilized his car for getting to work. Somebody or, more likely, a large group of people would have to be employed doing nothing else but determining whether public transportation is available from a particular residence to a particular place of work. To give a blanket exemption to anyone making a claim would be to defeat the whole energy-conservation purpose of this special excise tax.

Honourable senators, I should like to make a few observations on the administration of the special excise tax. With respect to refunds, some may say that the provision to refund the 10-cent special excise tax on gasoline will create severe administrative problems and high compliance costs. Undoubtedly, there will be an increase in both staff and administrative cost in the issuance of refunds of the tax to specified users of gasoline. However, the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue has responded quickly and positively in the past to the great many changes in the income tax law, some of which resulted in refunds of personal income tax to taxpayers. Similarly, the excise branch has considerable expertise in receiving, reviewing and processing a significant quantity of claims for refunds of federal sales taxes and customs duties. We should have every confidence that Revenue Canada will perform equally well in its handling of the administrative load generated by the refunding requirements of this bill. If the collection of revenue under the Income Tax Act is any example, I do not believe we have much to fear.

As to costs, the best estimate at this time is that the cost of administration, including the receiving of claims, reviewing them, issuing cheques to the claimants and the implementation of a post-audit procedure, will be in the range of 1 per cent of the revenue involved. This is comparable to the cost of administering the personal income tax, which is approximately 1.2 per cent of revenues generated by that levy.

Questions may also be asked as to why a refunding procedure was established rather than providing for a direct exemption for users from the special excise tax. Any attempt to provide an exemption from the special excise tax as opposed to a refund would result in serious problems of administration and control. This is because the special excise tax is paid when the manufacturer or producer of gasoline sells the gasoline. At the time the tax is payable, refiners, in most instances, do not know when the gasoline will be re-sold or whether the user will be a person entitled to the exemption.

Honourable senators, the second amendment, if I may call it that, is to be found on page 2, beginning at line 45. It gives authority to the government to provide for exemption from the 10-cent a gallon special excise tax as well as refunds. By way of explanation of the second amendment which was carried unanimously by the other house, the Minister of Finance said:

Last week in the course of the debate on this bill representations were received from these four members in particular—

He was speaking of certain members of the Opposition.

—and other members, that the bill be amended to provide an exemption for bulk purchasers of gasoline and also for users of marked gasoline, which is what is referred to in the amendment. At that time, I pointed out that there were some fundamental problems in tying the federal taxing statute to provincial legislation since this could be tantamount to a delegation of the taxing authority of Parliament to provincial legislatures... I did undertake, however, that I was prepared to look for ways to streamline the operation of the bill.

In this context, the government is prepared to amend Bill C-66 in such a way as to provide legislative authority to exempt certain purchasers of gasoline where this is administratively feasible. I must emphasize, however, that it is not certain that it will, indeed, prove to be feasible to provide an exemption in all of those instances suggested by the honourable member. However, I would like to assure the House that the government will do everything in its power to simplify the administration of the gas tax rebate system.

The introduction of a direct exemption for users would shift the administrative burden from users to some 80,000 retailers. Also, the potential for direct control, by way of audit of refund claims to assure that the gasoline was used in a manner which qualified for exemption, would be lost. However, the government reviewed its position after debate and moved what I refer to as the second amendment, in connection with which I was just speaking.

Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to remove the uncertainty concerning the income tax status of the refunds on the special excise tax on gasoline. In particular, I want to correct the mistaken impression that these rebates are taxable. As far as income tax is concerned, there are two possible procedures, depending on the status of the taxpayer. First, the gasoline expenditures may be claimed on a net basis—that is, after subtracting the amount of rebates from the total deductible expenditures on gasoline. If that is done, it is the end of the matter. If, on the other hand, the gasoline expenditures are claimed on a gross basis—that is, before deducting the rebates—the rebates would have to be taken into income for income tax purposes. This is necessary to avoid, in effect, giving the rebate twice—once as a direct rebate payment, and, secondly, as a deduction for income tax purposes.

Perhaps an example will make this clear. A person may have spent $1,000 on gasoline for business purposes. It may be that $120 of that is attributable to the excise tax, which amount would be refunded directly. The net expense on gasoline would thus be $880, which amount may be claimed for income tax purposes. If the taxpayer actually claimed a deduction of $1,000, then the deduction would be $120 more than his total expense. To offset this, he would have to include as taxable income that refund of $120. The final result is the same in both cases.

● (1140)

Honourable senators, it has been asserted that passage of Bill C-66 is not necessary for payment of the refunds to commence; that rebates could be mailed out now, under a section of the Financial Administration Act. I would point out that the Financial Administration Act cannot be used in this instance. The relevant section of the act is section 17. A remission under this section may be made only in the case of a tax as defined by subsection 17(10). By that subsection, taxes are limited to those payable to Her Majesty and imposed or authorized to be imposed by act of Parliament. Until such time as Bill C-66 is enacted into law, there is no special excise tax on gasoline imposed or authorized to be so imposed. While, in accordance with well-established tradition, the amount is collectible from the time of the tabling of the ways and means motion, there is in law no tax imposed until the law is enacted.

Why, honourable senators may ask, is there a need to increase the air transportation tax? As mentioned in the budget speech, this increase is essential to help lessen the heavy deficit in airport construction and operation. For example, the total air transportation program had an operating deficit—operating costs less revenue—of just over $200 million in 1974-75. This deficit is for airports, air traffic services and en-route navigation aids. It does not reflect, however, any portion of capital costs. For airports only, the loss on operations for the year 1973-74 was $105 million. This loss does reflect full costs, including depreciation, and the loss for 1974-75 is likely to be significantly higher. Furthermore, the public accounts for 1973-74, at page 26.16, show a net income for the airports revolving fund of $6.4 million. With the opening of Mirabel airport this year, this net income will disappear.

For the current fiscal year, the revenue from the air transportation tax, prior to the increase announced for August 1, 1975, was estimated at $37 million. The additional revenue resulting from the tax increases effective August 1, 1975 is expected to be $16 million. This revenue is necessary to offset costs for both "revolving fund" airports and all other airports.

Some may argue that the excise tax on gasoline is fiscally restrictive. No single tax or expenditure change should be viewed in isolation from the overall effects of the budget. It seems to me that the role of the excise tax is most usefully seen as that of one element in a broadly neutral overall budgetary package, the element that provides an energy conservation effect and that deals with the immediate financial problem associated with the maintenance of a single national oil price.

There are, no doubt, other questions that honourable senators would like to raise. I shall do my best, with my limited knowledge of the matter, to answer them. In the light of this rather long and attenuated explanation, I would urge all honourable senators to give consideration to the speedy passage of Bill C-66.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the sponsor of the bill has just asked us to give speedy passage to this legislation. Perhaps we will, but I am sure all of us would agree that we greet it here at long last with a sigh of relief, not merely because it appears to be the harbinger of a long delayed recess—which, of course, will be welcomed—but more importantly, perhaps, because it will give this chamber, Parliament, and the public of Canada some temporary relief from this long series of crisis to crisis pieces of legislation, ad hoc legislation, gap-filling legislation, the result of a budget which itself is an attempt only to fill a gap, and probably the most contorted set of policy decisions this country has had in many years.

I said "crisis to crisis." The Leader of the Government, in answering the question I asked the other day, made it very clear why we are faced with this legislation, why the government has decided, in the words of the minister, that this financial crisis has to be borne by—let me quote the minister's words exactly. He said:

—the users of petroleum for their own personal use, across Canada should be called on to bear the financial burden of implementing the national policy of a single Canadian oil price.

The crisis started, as the answer to my question indicated, a long time ago. Why do we need the money? The Minister of Finance said he suddenly finds he needs three-quarters of a billion dollars. One of the reasons, and the main reason, is that the policy that was announced at the time of the budget—I refer to the policy in the previous budget—has fallen flat on its face.

The Leader of the Government gave us the increase. There was an increase in the excise tax, the purpose of which was, of course, to equalize consumer gas prices across Canada. This was a stupid decision, obviously, because instead of yielding more money, the revenue from that export of oil to the United States fell off; and now we are faced with a situation in which individual consumers, for personal use, are forced to pay for this outrageous error in policy on the part of the government. That is all it can be called, because subsequently, as the Leader of the Government told me in his answer, the government found it necessary to cut the price at the time it had a policy of restricting the export of gas to the United States, and, as the Leader of the Government has admitted, it could not sell as much of its own quota. This is the kind of policy mess that the users of gasoline for personal purposes are now going to be asked to clear up.

The sponsor of the bill said he anticipates some questions. I wish he had given us some answers instead of the old threadbare excuses. Had he given the answers, I would not have to talk for very long this morning.

Senator Greene: That would be a blessing.

Senator Grosart: Senator Greene said, "That would be a blessing." It would be a blessing to us, and particularly a blessing to the government of whose party he is a distinguished member. Of course it would be a blessing, because the sponsor of the bill said it was hoped that discussion would be avoided. I do not blame him. Were I a member of the party opposite, or a member of the government, I would want to avoid discussion on this bill more than anything else. I will indicate why as I go along.

Senator Prowse: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Grosart: Yes.

Senator Prowse: I was little confused a moment ago—not an unusual thing. The honourable senator used the words "gas" and "gasoline." I take it he used the two terms interchangeably, and was not referring to natural gas when he used the word "gas"—or was he?

Senator Grosart: I am using the word in the vernacular that is normally taken to cover this whole field. I am referring to crude oil, gas, natural gas and gasoline. I am sure no honourable senator is in any way confused when I use the word "gas," particularly Senator Prowse, who is an expert in this field and will be able quite easily to sort out the detailed meanings and applications in his mind. I am sure he is not confused. He suggested that I might be. That is always possible. He said that this sometimes happens to me. I admit it. He would not suggest that he has never been confused. If he finds me confused, I hope he will not hesitate to correct me as I go along.

The minister's statement about this pressing financial necessity was rather interesting. This proposed levy on gasoline for personal consumption, he said—and I repeat, “for personal consumption”—“has become a matter of pressing financial necessity if we are to preserve the national policy approved by all provincial governments, all parties in the House,” and so on. Well, I need hardly say that this particular bill was not approved by any provincial government, nor by a majority of the parties in the other place. As a matter of fact, it was opposed—bitterly opposed—by Members of Parliament representing a majority of Canadians.

● (1150)

As for the approval of the provincial governments, I wonder if we could imagine a more absurd option to be chosen by this government for that purpose than the field of gasoline taxation. This field has traditionally been a main source of revenue for the provinces to meet one of their major responsibilities which, of course, is the building of roads. The federal government has chosen to enter this field—not the whole field, but the particular field of the user of gasoline for personal purposes.

We have heard from the sponsor of the bill the usual excuses as to why this tax is imposed on gasoline for personal use. He said—and I was amused by his statement—that this is a taxation measure that is regressive “in a limited way,” and the other phrase he used was “mildly progressive.”

Senator Flynn: It is a mild admission.

Senator Grosart: It is amazing that anybody in these days could talk about a tax being regressive in a limited way. It is either regressive or it is not; it either goes back or it does not go back. Of course, this is a classic example of the worst kind of regressive legislation. Why? Because it bears most heavily on those least able to pay. There can be no question about that.

As the sponsor of the bill admitted, the largest users of automobiles for personal purposes are those in low income sector of the economy. These are the people who are now being picked on by the government to get it out of a mess of its own making. The automobile is a necessity for the majority of Canadians today. It is not a luxury.

The estimated cost of this bill, along with other government policies arising from the June budget—that is, the five-cent tax and this tax, as well as the additional cost of home-heating fuels—amounts to about $200 per year per worker. This is from a government that has been boasting for some years about the number of low income people it has been able to take off the income tax roll! Well, by this measure it has put a few million back on the tax roll for something like $200 a year. Why? Again, to get it out of its own mess.

It is incredible that the Minister of Finance would say that there is no other option. Of course there are other options. The sponsor of the bill—jokingly, I think—referred to the possible abolition of Information Canada, but in a much lower voice he said, “or, of course, there could be further cuts in government spending.” Of course there could be further cuts in government expenditures. He spoke of the $1 billion cutback. That is a joke. Many of the items which are components of that $1 billion cutback are not in the main estimates. They were expenditures that some minister thought he might make, and was told not to. Anyone who wants to look them up in Mr. Chrétien's complete list will see what a joke that $1 billion cutback is. It is a $1 billion step back, then a $2 billion step forward. It reminds me of a definition of a politician's dance I saw in a magazine the other day—two steps forward, one back, and then a side step. That is exactly what we have in this bill.

This bill amounts to rationing by price. We are told that one of the purposes is the conservation of gasoline. For that reason, we have rationing by price, which has long been known as the worst way to enter into government rationing. Rationing by price is inequitable; it is unfair. It falls on those who cannot afford the price; those who cannot afford the extra $200 a year. And the sponsor of the bill says that this is regressive in a limited way! If he can show me in what way it is even mildly progressive, I should be delighted.

He spoke of the exemptions. Of course, there are exemptions. There are exemptions for the people who can afford to pay the extra ten cents a gallon. Through this measure, the personal user of gasoline is asked to subsidize commercial and industrial users. He is asked to subsidize the professional man who is going to charge it up anyway. It is going to be an income tax exemption, as somebody has pointed out. If you are sick and your doctor says, “Well, come on down to my office,” you say, “No way, you come and see me, because if I go to your office I have to pay for the gasoline, whereas if you come to see me the cost is deductible, and you are exempt from the tax.” That is an example of how absurd this thing is.

Senator Bélisle: It is the second phase of the just society.

Senator Grosart: I am told that one of the federal ministers was down to the Maritimes where he made a speech attempting to defend or justify this bill. He told those good people in the Maritimes that the purpose of this bill is to maintain a uniform price; that it is the federal subsidy for the use of gasoline so that they would only have to pay the same price as everybody across Canada. Somebody at the back of the hall said, “That's fine, but if it is a subsidy to me, why am I paying it?” And that is exactly it. Of course, he is paying the ten cents a gallon to subsidize himself—and he is supposed to thank the federal government for this kind of subsidy, this kind of relief.

One of the traditional roles of the Senate has been that of concern for provincial rights, concern for minorities. In fact, we are organized, as we all know, on a regional and a provincial basis. This bill provides a glorious opportunity for this chamber, for once, to fulfill that important role. It provides us with an opportunity to ask, “Why penalize regions? Why penalize the provinces?”

This tax will bear more heavily on gasoline users in already depressed areas of Canada. There is no question about that. There are several reasons for that, one being that it is the people in those regions who drive farthest to work every day. The sponsor of the bill said, “If people choose to live a long way from their work, it would be inequitable to give them any relief." Well, who chooses today to live a long way from work? Why do people live as far from work as they do? The answer, of course, is in the complete breakdown of the housing policy of this government. More and more people are being driven out 25 or 30 miles from their work, and the sponsor, echoing, I am sure, the views of the government and the Minister of Finance, says that it would be inequitable to provide any relief for them. As a matter of fact, those who have swimming pools can heat them with oil which is exempt from the tax.

The sponsor of the bill has told us that the bill was amended in the other place to give the Governor in Council the right, if he wishes, to include other parties. He did not tell us why. The reason it was included was that in this badly drafted, badly conceived bill nobody even thought of the handicapped, the people who drive their own automobiles, specially built cars; nobody thought of them. They thought of the doctors, the lawyers and the salesmen, but nobody thought of the handicapped. That is the real reason why this amendment was forced on the government in the other place.

● (1200)

Among the other characteristics of this bill is, of course, the fact that it is highly inflationary. Does anybody doubt for one moment that workers who are now faced with this additional cost of living—it is estimated that this measure will add two points to the consumer price index—are not going to ask for higher wages to meet it? Of course they will. This is the government headed by a prime minister who said not very long ago, "We are going to wrestle inflation to the ground." They have wrestled it up to the skies with other measures, and they are still wrestling it up with this one.

The government made a great deal of the principle of the one-price gasoline system. This was the purpose, the great thought, behind the use of the export subsidy tax, to equalize the price of gasoline, other than some transportation costs, across the country. We now have the government coming to us with a two-price system. We have a two-price gasoline system based, not on a one-price system throughout all regions, but a two-price system based on class, based on how you use your automobile and how much money you have. Out the window goes the great one-price system.

I will deal finally, if I may, with the conservation argument. I cannot think of anything that makes the reasoning behind this bill sillier than for anybody in the government to say that this increase of ten cents per gallon will conserve energy in Canada. The fact of the matter is that over the years, between 1971 and 1975, the basic price, the wellhead price, of gasoline went up from $2.50 a barrel to $6.50 a barrel, a very substantial rise; a much greater rise, of course, than this ten cents. Did that conserve the use of gasoline? No. In that period the use of gasoline went up by 12 per cent. The increase from $2.50 to $6.50 a barrel increased the use, yet we are here told piously that one of the purposes of this measure is to conserve the use of gasoline.

Honourable senators, I have dealt with only a few of the absurdities in this bill. The sponsor spent some time saying that the rebate system would work. Well, he is optimistic. So is the minister. Mr. Basford spent an hour trying to prove, in a long speech, that it would work, and all he proved to me was that it would not work. It is said that it will cost one per cent. That one per cent assumes the existing establishment, the existing cost. We all know that it will cost far more than one per cent. It will add, of course, to the federal bureaucracy, which is a policy of this government that we are getting quite used to.

The sponsor has dealt with the question of the rebate being taxable or non-taxable as income. What he did not deal with, of course, was the obvious fact that the price of gasoline is not going up ten cents; it is going up 12 cents, 13 cents. In fact, taking all the budget bills into consideration, it is said that it is going up 18 cents. The rebate will not be on 18 cents; the rebate, where there is one, will be on five cents. It is just nonsense to say that this extra tax will not itself be a tax on tax.

Honourable senators, I say this bill was ill-conceived. It was so badly drafted that the Speaker in the other place had to send it back to be reprinted. This is the kind of efficiency we are faced with from a government that insists that those who are least able to pay should get the government out of its own mess; they are the people who are being asked to pay.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I waited before rising because I was convinced that some member of the Liberal Party in this place would want to follow Senator Grosart, if not to criticize the bill at least to defend it. I could not bring myself to believe that the wish expressed by Senator Macnaughton that we limit discussion and give the bill speedy passage was meant as an order to senators supporting the government not to take part in this debate.

I do not think the Senate should take long to pass this legislation—certainly not as long as it took the House of Commons. However, to have only one member of the government side speak on the bill—and Senator Macnaughton really didn't support it; he didn't appear very convinced, and certainly he wasn't convincing—is going a bit too far. It is my hope that the Leader of the Government, since I am attacking the government now, will take the bait, as he usually does, and come to the rescue of the government with his big voice and strong arguments. Apparently I am tempting him without any success.

Senator Grosart: He will rise.

Senator Flynn: So you think he will rise to the occasion?

Senator Grosart: To the bait.

Senator Flynn: He usually rises to the bait. Last week I successfully attacked him and he got a little wicked.

In any event, it is obvious that this legislation is typical, as was mentioned by my colleague Senator Grosart, of the confusion that exists in the mind of the government. The government does not know where it is going. It is pursuing contrary objectives, trying to head off in all directions at the same time. Of course, the Minister of Finance was caught with a promise he made last May to bring down a budget. He did it at a time when it appeared that it might be useful to have a budget. But when the time came for him to fulfill his promise the situation had changed so much that he did not know what to do. So, he brought in a budget which has only added to the confusion.

It is interesting to see what is in this budget. It removes the sales tax on insulation materials. I do not know if that is intended to save energy or to help the building industry. The government has long been urged to remove the sales tax on building materials if it wants to really encourage the construction of houses in Canada. But all we have here is a timid half-hearted attempt at helping, the effect of which is not entirely clear.

In addition, we now return to the previous level of the tax on wines. Why? Because the minister realized he had made a mistake in the previous budget when he increased the tax on wines. As was mentioned by Senator Grosart, one step ahead, two steps backward.

● (1210)

Senator Grosart: Stay home and drink wine.

Senator Flynn: Now I come to this infamous tax on gasoline. What is it meant to achieve? Is it really, as has been said, intended to maintain a single national price for gasoline in Canada? As has been demonstrated by Senator Grosart, it will certainly not do that. Even if the government gets the additional revenue it wants to continue the subsidy to Eastern Canada, it will not really achieve this, because there are so many exemptions that only a few Canadians will be paying this tax. And those will not necessarily be—in many cases they most certainly will not be—those who can best afford it and who should be called upon to pay the tax if the logic and principle behind it had any value whatever.

This really is not a conservation measure. The government cannot say that it is imposing a 10-cent excise tax on gasoline to achieve two purposes which are entirely opposite, conservation and subsidization. The government should be frank and take one side or the other. It should not try to take both sides at the same time. If the government really does not want additional revenue, if all it wants is to conserve energy by diminishing the consumption of gasoline, then it is going about it the wrong way. It is quite obvious from previous experience that what it is doing will not achieve the purpose intended.

Does the government really want additional income to maintain its one-price policy? If it does, I suggest that the way it plans to go about it is not equitable, because the exemptions here have been estimated to exempt one million persons. I think that is the figure mentioned by the minister, probably of National Revenue, the Honourable Mr. Basford. I would like to know how many people are expected to pay the tax, to see what one million persons represent percentagewise. That would be interesting.

I am not dealing here with the points made by Senator Grosart which show that really those who can least afford the tax are those who are going to pay it for the others. It seems to me that this is a badly conceived scheme that will not be equitable at all.

The government has asked for a blank cheque, to exempt by order in council any class of persons it deems it advisable to exempt. This is a strange thing, because in fact the government is asking by this measure for leave to withdraw the tax entirely, to abolish it, without coming back to Parliament. Of course it can do that, it can always do it, but it has to come back to Parliament usually to have legislation abrogated. In this case, with the blank cheque the government got in the other place, because the minister was not able to convince that house that the list of exemptions was adequate, the government could abrogate this legislation altogether without coming back to Parliament. It can do that by the addition to clause 5 of the bill, which deals with exemptions, of subparagraph (g) which would exempt "a person of such other class of persons as the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe"—and if that is not the power to abrogate the law I do not know what it is.

Someone in the other place suggested that this at least should be subject to a negative resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate. That is to say, if the government were to adopt an order in council under the authority provided by this Parliament, it should have to come to Parliament and subject itself to criticism or to annulment of this resolution by Parliament, if it were not the wish of Parliament to maintain the additional exemption provided by the order in council.

Anyway, by this provision it is quite obvious that the government could progressively, by several orders in council, abrogate the law entirely. This exemption, and the others provided in clause 5, prove the government was not convinced that this tax was fair. It was not fair from the start, and this inequity has surfaced very clearly in the debate. Senator Grosart in his incisive comments has pointed out clearly that this is not a fair tax. I have never seen anything so unjust and unreasonable.

There appears to be no one on the government side who is willing to come to the rescue of the poor consumer. There is no one on the government side who will rise in the Senate and criticize the government for its insensitivity. Up to now no one has dared to support the legislation, not even the sponsor of the bill.

I really do not know what could be said, in any event, in favour of this bill. It does not achieve what it really wants to achieve in many respects. It is inflationary, as Senator Grosart mentioned. It is quite obvious that, as a result of this bill, the wage and salary earners especially will have to pay more to go to work, and that will add to the pressure for an increase in wages and salaries. Undoubtedly that will be part of the effect of this measure, that it will add to the demands for higher wages.

Honourable senators, I would hope that someone on the government side will follow me even though the sponsor of the bill is anxious to close the debate, and has said so in no uncertain terms. I hope to hear someone tell me something good about this legislation, especially about the 10-cent tax on gasoline. The only argument I have heard in favour of it—and I may as well put it right now, to avoid the necessity of anyone's putting a question—is that we are paying less than people are paying everywhere else. Possibly so. I have not checked that out, but it does not follow that because we are paying less we should have to give more to the government, thus absolving the government of responsibility for this unfair and inequitable tax.

In any event, it is on division that this bill will pass this place. I suggest that the bill be referred to committee, as there are many questions I would like to put in committee.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: I have succeeded.

Senator Grosart: The fishing is good.

Senator Perrault: —it had not been my intention to participate in this debate—

Senator Flynn: Obviously.

Senator Perrault: —but after listening to the high octane remarks by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate I thought perhaps I should attempt to clarify one or two points which seem to have been lost on him.

Senator Flynn: I am glad I have succeeded in provoking you into this debate.

Senator Perrault: It is not a matter of provocation but I want to attempt to clarify the intention of this particular measure.

Senator Flynn: It needs clarification.

Senator Perrault: I hope the Opposition will be more sympathetic to it after I have spoken for three or four minutes.

Senator Flynn: Wishful thinking.

Senator Perrault: The reason Bill C-66 was introduced into Parliament was not to bring joy to the hearts of Canadians or even joy to the hearts of the Opposition; it was due to a pressing financial necessity, which exists in this country today.

To hear the Leader of the Opposition speak this afternoon, there is almost a suggestion that somehow the Minister of Finance is responsible for the international energy crisis. Of course, even he would not go to that extreme.

● (1220)

There is no country in the world which has escaped the impact of the oil crisis brought about by the actions of certain oil-producing countries to drastically increase the price of energy. I want to suggest to the Leader of the Opposition and the members of this chamber that Canada probably has coped with this emergency better than any other country in the entire world—better than any other country in the world!

When we look at other examples of energy costs and prices and their escalation in other areas, in Europe and in other countries in the Commonwealth, we are quickly able to determine that the policies of this government have provided energy to the ordinary consumer at prices far lower than in any other country, or at least as low as in any country.

Then we hear the remarks by the Leader of the Opposition that somehow this government has turned its back on the consumer and is guilty of some form of callous neglect. That is simply a ludicrous statement for the leader to make.

Senator Flynn: I will repeat it any time.

Senator Perrault: And it is not really worthy of Senator Flynn to make that kind of statement.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: This government has demonstrated its continuing concern for the consumers. Is it not—

Senator Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question?

Senator Perrault: If I may just complete my remarks, I shall be glad to answer any questions you feel I may be able to answer.

Senator Grosart: Would you not be willing to answer one as you go along?

Senator Perrault: But the Deputy Leader of the Opposition stated earlier that in Nova Scotia the other day somebody asked, "Well, if it is a subsidy, why am I paying ten cents a gallon more?" Of course, the senator did not make reference to the fact that as a result of this program the cost of heating a home in Nova Scotia will be much lower than in most other parts of the civilized world this coming winter—and that is just one of the benefits which flows directly from this tax.

Senator Grosart: Would the leader just permit this one question? Is not the reason we have these low prices the fact that Canada is the only industrial country in the world which is now net sufficient in oil? Why should we not have these low oil prices when we are not necessarily affected in any way by the world situation?

Senator Perrault: I want to remind the deputy leader what he has apparently forgotten. A large percentage of our oil must be exported offshore from Venezuela—

Senator Grosart: You mean imported.

Senator Perrault: Yes—and other countries where price escalation has been a feature of export policy over recent months, and that we have commitments to our customer to the south for the export of Canadian oil.

Senator Grosart: We are self-sufficient.

Senator Perrault: It is a vast over-simplification to say that we are self-sufficient and that is why energy prices can be kept low. That is true only in a technical sense. In a marketing sense we are very much dependent on international sources of supply.

Senator Grosart: We would not be if the government had gone ahead with the pipeline.

Senator Flynn: Speaking of over-simplifications!

Senator Perrault: This is one of the great joys of being in the role of opposition.

Senator Greene: Irresponsibility!

Senator Perrault: Yes, irresponsibility, as my friend and colleague from the other part of the chamber states. We have heard this morning, for example, from both of these outstanding, distinguished senators from the Opposition—

Senator Greene: The dynamite twins.

Senator Perrault: —that there must be another way, that another way can be found to keep oil prices and gasoline prices down in Canada. But, you know, they are hard put to suggest any specific manner in which this can be accomplished. There has really been a paucity of any kind of useful suggestions on what we should do. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to suggest a way in which we can find another $600 million this year, perhaps by reducing old age pensions or family allowances, or by reducing the standard of health care in this country, then let him stand up with courage and specifically tell us how that money can be found.

Senator Flynn: You don't need all of that. That is not true.

Senator Perrault: The Opposition—

Senator Flynn: That is not true.

Senator Perrault: The Opposition in Parliament has talked about discontinuing Information Canada. I think it has been stated before that that would provide about one-fiftieth of the amount required to make up for the ever widening gap between the cost of subsidies resulting from this single oil price policy and the revenues from the export charge. It is widening all the time.

Now we are faced as Canadians—not as Liberals or as Conservatives or as members of the NDP or as Creditistes, but as Canadians—with a deficit on that compensation program of, as has been stated earlier, between $400 million and $600 million a year. This has to be met. It requires tough decisions by the government. There is not a government in the world which likes to impose additional taxes. It is done because of a sense of public responsibility, and the honourable senator—

Senator Flynn: Or lack of competence.

Senator Perrault: And the honourable senator is aware of that fact because he had experience in increasing taxes when he occupied a post of responsibility with one of the preceding governments. And he did not find that tax increases were ever popular.

Senator Flynn: I never imposed a tax when I was in government; certainly not a tax like this one.

Senator Perrault: But the special excise tax on gasoline was conceived as an appropriate means of offsetting at least part of this widening and increasing deficit.

Honourable senators, I do not want to talk at length, because an outstanding speech was made by Senator Macnaughton and we have heard the Opposition's point of view. We are told that low-income people are the special victims, but I think it has to be borne in mind, surely, that low-income Canadians own fewer automobiles. That is also a factor.

Senator Grosart: They own more. They own most of them.

Senator Perrault: The tax therefore results in a lower burden on low-income classes taken as a whole as opposed to high-income groups.

We have to take into account, and it bears repeating again, that much of this revenue will be employed to reduce prices for petroleum products, including home heating oil needed to keep Canadian homes warm this winter at lower costs than would have been otherwise had this tax not existed. That is a worthy objective.

Senator Flynn: Would the government leader acknowledge that he has stated that much will be used, but not all?

Senator Perrault: Not all, no.

Senator Flynn: I see.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: I think the Leader of the Opposition has been in public life long enough to realize that there is no such thing as perfect equity in any program devised by any government. For example, there are a certain number of people who exploit the unemployment insurance and social welfare systems. There is no such thing as a perfectly just tax. If we are trying to devise a system of taxation which is without inequities, then that is an impossibility to mankind, even with the use of computer technology and all the rest of it.

Senator Grosart: You can always come close.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I agree with the deputy leader. We hope to come close. This is why certain amendments have been made to this bill to enable the government, where possible, to make this measure more equitable, more fair and more helpful to the Canadian people.

A number of questions have been raised concerning the impact of the special excise tax on those who must drive their automobiles to their places of business. That will be a problem for many Canadians. There is no question about that. That has to be admitted. But there is the possibility that more car pools will be formed, and that in many, many cases people will be able to go by public transportation to certain places of business. I know, for example, that in the greater Vancouver area, when one goes to the office in the morning, one sees that most of the automobiles have only one person in them, and those automobiles occupy a substantial portion of the streets, bridges and highways. Of course, there will be an incentive for people to group together and travel together, and use public transportation. Perhaps we should have started doing things like this 25 years ago. Perhaps it is time for us to attempt to conserve some of our vital energy supplies by changing our mode of travelling to and from work.

Senator Flynn: It was done during the war with rationing.

Senator Perrault: Is the honourable senator suggesting that we go to a program of rationing?

Senator Flynn: No, I am just making the observation.

Senator Perrault: Because any useful suggestion will be considered by the government.

Senator Flynn: Ha! That's good.

Senator Perrault: If he wants rationing, it will certainly be considered.

Senator Flynn: But you would not get as much revenue, if you were to go on to rationing.

Senator Perrault: But the special excise tax parallels the provisions of the Income Tax Act, which does not allow the deduction of expenses incurred in travelling from one's home to one's place of business.

One of the difficulties, as honourable senators can understand, is that somebody driving a Honda Civic, for example, to the office could claim as a deduction the tax differential on the gasoline purchased in driving to the office, while at the same time his neighbour, who could be driving a Cadillac Eldorado, would also have a similar claim. This is not equity as far as taxation is concerned, to have the same degree of deductibility without any reference to gasoline consumption.

● (1230)

Senator Grosart: They could always walk.

Senator Perrault: Yes, perhaps it would help more Canadians if they walked to the office, but if the Conservative Party is advocating that all Canadians must walk to work, then that idea too will be considered. It must be recognized that every person who works must get from his place of residence to his place of business, but to allow a deduction of the expense of getting to work would give a tax subsidy to those who choose to drive rather than take public transport, to those who choose to live far from their place of work rather than close, and to those who choose to drive a large automobile rather than a small one.

Senator Grosart: You are reading the same book.

Senator Perrault: We have similar thoughts on a number of areas of this bill. But, honourable senators, the measure is being introduced by the government in the earnest hope that at some time in the near future it may be possible to remove it.

We have heard complaints from certain provincial governments about this measure, and yet provincial governments tax gasoline by 15 cents or 16 cents a gallon. If they really wish to assist the residents of their provinces, they most certainly could consider reducing their take from the gasoline tax. In most cases, provincial governments have far smaller deficits, in relative terms, than does the federal government with its many responsibilities. It is the same situation with respect to the sales tax on building materials. There was criticism today of the removal of sales tax on insulation, for example—"It didn't go far enough." The government removed the sales tax on insulation, again to conserve energy, but most of the provincial governments have maintained their sales taxes on insulation and building materials. It may be useful for the Leader of the Opposition to suggest to some of his friends who serve at the provincial level that they might initiate some action provincially.

Senator Flynn: I have no more friends there than you have.

Senator Perrault: That is in the area of building supplies, and so on.

Senator Flynn: Speaking of the provinces, may I ask the Leader of the Government if any thought was given to the fact that by imposing this tax the federal government was entering a field which up to now had been the provinces' exclusive preserve?

Senator Perrault: I cannot agree with that thought. In any case, it is the government's belief that this legislation is constitutionally sound.

Senator Flynn: I did not say it was not constitutional. I simply said that traditionally this tax has been left to the provincial governments.

Senator Prowse: Nonsense.

Senator Flynn: Why does my honourable friend say that? What does he know about it?

Senator Prowse: It was three cents a gallon during the war.

Senator Flynn: Just like the income tax during the war. Practically no taxes were left to the provinces at that time.

Senator Perrault: I want to conclude by stating that the government introduces this measure with reluctance. The introduction of tax measures is never popular, but this measure has been introduced in the earnest hope that it will contribute to the easing of the Canadian energy problem, that the net effect will be beneficial as far as the country is concerned, and that at some foreseeable date it will be possible to remove taxes. Indeed, the idea of lowering taxes is consistent with the entire philosophy of the government.

Senator Flynn: That is the best joke I have heard this morning.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words particularly in view of some of the statements made from the other side of the chamber, one of which was that because it was Canadian oil we could sell it at any price we wanted to. The fact of the matter is that the oil we are dealing with is not the property of any government at all; it is a property of individual owners who have gone in, as they said, to hunt and find, and now have separated the oil from the ground. They are the private owners of it, and they sell it where they can and for as good a price as they can get, which is the basis of all business today. There is nothing wrong with that. So when it is suggested that the federal government or any government can arbitrarily set a price for oil, and that we were setting a price on our oil, it just is not true. We were setting a price on oil which has already been alienated from its original owners who were the Canadian people, and this continues to be the situation. It does not matter whether we are getting oil from a well in Alberta or whether we are getting it from a well in Venezuela. In both cases it is probably the same corporation that is selling it to us.

The second thing we must keep in mind when talking about the 10-cent tax, and other taxes, is that before this last round of unprecedented price changes in oil took place, they were getting about $1.80 a barrel for oil at the well-head in the Middle East. The sheiks over there discovered that they were getting as their share approximately the same amount of money as the freighters were getting for taking the oil from the Persian Gulf to wherever the markets for it were. Then, when they looked a little further, they found that when it went into West Germany, Great Britain or Italy, or wherever it was being bought, those governments were putting taxes on it, and that the final price of the oil to the consumer was in the neighbourhood of $11 a barrel. I do not think there is any mystery in how we got to the price of $11 or $12 a barrel for oil. That was the price which the Western governments, after taxing the oil as it went to the distributors, found that the distributors and the consumers were well able to pay.

It is interesting now, when we stop to consider who is in fact setting the price of oil, to realize that this price comes along at a time when it is most convenient for the oil companies to be guaranteed a price which will help them to replace the oil that is now being used. They figure it will require that price to make it worth their while to bring the tar sands and northern areas into production.

So, let us not suppose that there is any great mystery, and let us not suppose that governments have all the control over this that we think they have either. Whether governments are leading other people around by the nose, or whether they are in fact themselves being led around by the nose, is an interesting matter for speculation.

The fact remains that when you are paying 80 cents per gallon for gasoline, I suggest to honourable members opposite, you are going to start looking to see if your journey is really necessary. I know people who deliberately kept their speed to under 60 miles an hour because they know that at a speed of over 60 miles an hour, and with gasoline at 80 cents a gallon, it will cost considerably more to make a 200-mile trip—because at speeds of over 60 miles an hour the amount of fuel consumed increases quite substantially. And these are not people who are driving Honda Civics either. These are people driving big cars, and if they get 10 miles to the gallon then they have had a really good day's driving.

Honourable senators, the money had to come from somewhere, and this is a tax which was imposed in an attempt to equalize the situation. We are paying it so that the cost of production is not increased. The only people who are going to pay are people who use gasoline for their own convenience. This will undoubtedly encourage the development of improved rapid transit systems which we need, not because we are running short of oil, but because a continuing dependence on the automobile, carrying one person to work in the morning and back home in the evening, is slowly choking the lives out of the people on this continent, particularly in large urban areas such as Toronto and Montreal. The same applies to New York and Los Angeles, which have become ridiculous places for people to live, being deathtraps because of automobile emissions. This legislation is to be cut down on that.

● (1240)

In my opinion, it would not hurt the Opposition in a case such as this to declare, although this is not the manner in which they would like to see it done, that in the circumstances it is a good thing for Canadians, and it will achieve the purpose of providing Canadians with fuel cheaper than that available in any other part of the world and at approximately the same price throughout the country. While I know that their function is to make the government take a second look at everything it does, they could serve a useful purpose in this situation, the facts of which are as well known to them as to each one of us. That is the purpose of the legislation. Now, let us all be men enough to admit it, and give credit where credit is due.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: I have heard amusing remarks this morning.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Macnaughton speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, in view of the very interesting and informative debate we have had this morning and the reasons for the presentation of the government case, which are basically the conservation of gasoline and oil and the fair pricing of those commodities throughout the country, I do not believe there is anything more I need say. There may be technical questions which honourable members of the Opposition would like to ask in committee, if they think referral of the bill to committee is necessary.

[Senator Prowse.]

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Macnaughton: If they do, then in due course I shall ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Greene, that this bill be now read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to announce that the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is making arrangements for a meeting of that committee at 2.30 this afternoon in room 256-S.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I should like to ask leave to revert to Reports of Committees.

Senator Flynn: With leave? Of course. As usual, we are cooperative.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-66, to amend the Excise Tax Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Senator Flynn: With leave?

Senator Macnaughton: With leave.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators—

Senator Greene: For he's a jolly good fellow.

Senator Flynn: I thank my good friend, Senator Greene, for this kind reference to me. Of course, it could not be addressed to anybody but me.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, this bill has been considered in committee and is now reported without amendment. We could not, in fact, amend this bill. In practice we could not amend it because it is impossible to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. That fact was made quite clear in committee, and there is no doubt about it. Senator Macnaughton's wishes will be acceded to. Not much discussion has taken place; this bill is in fact being given what has to be called speedy passage. The Senate has performed its duties expeditiously. We started dealing with this bill at 11 o'clock this morning, and in about ten minutes or so we will likely have disposed of it.

I do not mean to imply that the Senate has not done a good job; it did everything it could in the prevailing circumstances. The idea was to verify whether the criticisms levelled against this bill in the other place, elsewhere in Canada and in the press since the June 23rd budget, were justified. My conclusion is that the debate in the Senate, and the examination of the bill in committee, have proved that they were. We did not need to spend too much time to satisfy ourselves that this is a bad bill, and that the 10-cent increase on gasoline is an unfair, discriminatory and excessively complicated tax. Investigation reveals a singular lack of imagination on the part of the government. They obviously did not look into the problems that would result from the administration surrounding the exemptions to this tax, nor did they consider the unfair treatment to many Canadians that would result from its application.

It was made clear in committee that this tax would normally, if the consumption of gasoline remained the same—which was the assumption made by the officials of the department—have no effect on the so-called conservation objectives of the government. It was stated that this tax would normally bring in $700 million and that the exemptions provided in the bill as it stands—and that without taking into account, if my assessment is correct, the Orders in Council which may be passed under the new section 47(1)(g) which is introduced in the bill—

Senator Hayden: Creating classes of persons.

Senator Flynn: Yes, classes of persons, or kind, it could be anything. As I was saying, on the basis of the other paragraphs of the new section 47(1) the refunds would amount to $170 million. That means that approximately 25 per cent of the tax monies collected would be refunded and the end result for the government would be the raising of approximately an additional $525 million. It was stated by the government leader this morning that the government does not need all that money to meet the deficit in the amount of subsidies paid to Eastern consumers.

The government leader also this morning belittled the criticism levelled at this bill from this side. I ask you where else could criticism come from? There is never any criticism from the government side. In my opinion, we on this side are serving a very useful purpose by doing this, because it is apparent no one else will dare do it. It is about time that the Leader of the Government realized that the small group on this side of the chamber is performing an essential service. He should not minimize the work done by the Opposition, especially when he spent eight years in the British Columbia legislature doing precisely that type of work. At that time he had a huskier voice than he has now. In fact, when he was appointed to this chamber he made fuller use of that extraordinary voice of his. He was much more impressive then. I do not know what has happened to him, but he has lowered his tone somewhat.

In any event, what I am simply saying is that the job done by the Opposition in this place should not be minimized, but should be appreciated by all those on the other side who do not feel that they can criticize the government or its legislation.

The government leader was asking me if I had any ideas. I have many ideas. The tax of 10 cents per gallon represents an increase of close to 15 per cent, and in some cases it may be even higher than that, to the consumer. An additional 15 per cent on the price of gasoline is a tremendous increase, I suggest to the Leader of the Government. What the government could have done, without introducing this complicated system of exemptions, would have been to increase the price to all consumers by three cents or four cents. That, I think, would have received general acceptance. It would have brought to the government between $210 million and $300 million a year, depending on whether it were three cents or four cents.

The budget also provided increases in income tax which will bring several hundreds of millions of dollars into government coffers. That also might have been sufficient to meet this deficit in the subsidy to the Eastern consumers of gasoline. Those are a couple of alternatives which could have been used alone or in combination. There are others. I am not the Minister of Finance, but it is not difficult to have more imagination than was displayed by the minister in this particular case. I say to the Leader of the Government and to the Senate that this tax is unfair and will prove to be totally unworkable. This tax brings us no closer to the so-called just society that we were promised by the present Prime Minister over seven years ago, and for which we are still waiting.

● (1610)

I repeat that this bill—which will pass, of course, on division—is a bad bill. We at least have done what we could to show the defects in this bill.

In closing, I would like to refer to Senator Prowse's last sentence in his speech of this morning. It is a ringing sentence. He said:

Now, let us all be men enough to admit it, and give credit where credit is due.

That was said in praise of this bill. I would say to Senator Prowse that if he wanted to be realistic what he should have said is, "Now, let us be men enough to admit that it is a bad bill, that it is an unfair tax, and let us give hell to whomsoever hell is due."

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I rise simply to correct the record. At no point in my remarks earlier in the day did I suggest that the government did not need the money which would be collected under this particular taxation measure. I said—

Senator Flynn: I have no objection to Senator Perrault's correcting what he said, but if he denies that he said that, I will quote from his speech.

Senator Perrault: If that appears in the verbatim record, it is inaccurate, and I will correct it. I said there is a real need for this money—

Senator Flynn: All of this money.

Senator Perrault: The following facts and figures should be put on the record. The Leader of the Opposition states that this measure is an imposition on Canadians least able to pay the tax.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps we in Canada have been living in a fool's energy paradise. The following are the taxes paid per gallon by other leading countries in the world. In France today the government tax on a gallon of gasoline, regular grade, is 94 cents, and on premium grade gasoline it is $1. In Japan the tax is 57 cents per gallon on regular grade and 52 cents on premium grade; in Germany it is 99 cents per gallon on regular grade and $1 on premium grade; in Italy it is $1.37 per gallon on regular grade and $1.42 on premium grade; in the United Kingdom it is 86 cents on regular grade and 87 cents on premium grade.

Honourable senators, those are governments not unaware of the social responsibilities they bear toward the poorer people in their countries.

Senator Flynn: The situation is not the same.

Senator Perrault: Those taxation levels are much beyond anything proposed by this government. One fact clearly emerges, that in the present energy crisis governments throughout the world have found it necessary to increase taxes on their energy supplies in order to maintain their economic viability. When we compare the Canadian tax levels with those existing in any other part of the world, I think we must admit that we are singularly fortunate in a world beset with problems concerning energy resources.

I enter a defence of the government, because this is not a measure which any government wishes to advance. No government wishes to impose measures which include an imposition of higher taxes. I can only repeat the assurance that these monies will be used for the benefit of the people of Canada, to minimize, insofar as possible, the deleterious effects of the energy crisis in this country.

Senator Flynn: May I just add that the amount of tax paid by people in other countries depends upon the situation in those countries, which, in most cases, is not comparable to the situation in Canada. Also, out of price of 70 cents per gallon to the consumer in Canada, close to 50 cents is attributable to various taxes. That is a huge proportion.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: Even if one adds up all of the various taxes, Canada still has some of the lowest priced petroleum products in the entire world, and I think we are very fortunate people, indeed.

Senator Flynn: Percentagewise?

Senator Perrault: And may I add by way of a conclusion that there will never be any effort on this side of the House to restrict the right of the Opposition to enter its fair criticism of any measure that comes before this Chamber.

Senator Flynn: That is the best thing you have said today.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

July 30, 1975

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wilfred Judson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 30th day of July, at 4.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
R. de C. Nantel
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 21, 1975, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Flynn: Does the Deputy Leader of the Government intend to give an explanation with respect to the adjournment motion?

Senator Langlois: Does it need an explanation?

Senator Flynn: As I understand it, the House of Commons will be returning on October 14, and we will be coming back one week later.

Senator Langlois: That is right.

Senator Flynn: I suggest to the Deputy Leader of the Government that he could have said that it is a well deserved recess for the Senate, especially for the Opposition in the Senate, before we disappear entirely.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Wilfred Judson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Wilfred Judson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk Assistant.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to establish a national petroleum company.

An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act.

An Act to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

An Act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, No. 2.

An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972.

An Act to amend certain statutes to provide equality of status thereunder for male and female persons.

An Act to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

An Act to amend the Olympic (1976) Act.

An Act to amend the Privileges and Immunities (International Organizations) Act.

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, (No.3).

An Act to provide an exception from the general law relating to marriage in the case of Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass.

An Act to incorporate the Canadian Commercial and Industrial Bank.

An Act respecting Alliance Security & Investigation, Ltd.

An Act respecting The Royal Canadian Legion.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 21, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 21, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that George Isaac Smith, Esquire, has been summoned to the Senate.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons, which was read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and was seated:

Hon. George Isaac Smith of the City of Truro, Nova Scotia, introduced between Hon. Jacques Flynn, P.C., and Hon. Fred M. Blois.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, may I be among the first to welcome to our ranks the Honourable Senator Smith, an individual who has served with such great distinction in the public life of this nation in another forum of activity and who now joins us in the Senate. We are enthusiastic about the admittance of the Honourable Senator Smith to this chamber for many good reasons, and among them, and as one who has served in Opposition in another place, I welcome the strengthening of the ranks of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: I have always felt—and I know that other senators share the same belief—that our parliamentary system can only be effective if we have a vigilant and ever-active Opposition in our midst. I hope this trend can be continued in the future.

On behalf of all honourable senators on the government side of the house, I welcome Senator Smith. I know he will serve with real distinction in the months and years to come.

Senator Asselin: When will the next Opposition appointment be made?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am happy to join the Leader of the Government in welcoming Senator Smith to the Senate of Canada, an institution that harbours some of Canada's most outstanding authorities on what not to do to win elections. The Senate is the only place in the country where the Grits are willing to admit that it takes four of them to match one of us.

An Hon. Senator: At what?

Senator Flynn: Senator Smith's appointment comes as a gift from heaven. I am not sure what it means. Perhaps God has decided to help the deserving Tories, which is only fair when you consider that the undeserving Grits have been helping themselves for years.

I should warn Senator Smith that we senators do not pay much attention to those who criticize us. After all, they are only repeating what everybody else is saying.

However, I wish to say that Senator Smith is most welcome in our midst because, as Senator Perrault has indicated, we dearly need help on our side. Consequently, Senator Smith may count on our giving him plenty of work to do, and on his having, at times, to deal with some of the members opposite.

In conclusion, I simply wish to add that I thank the Prime Minister for having appointed Senator Smith, and it is my sincere hope that he will make many similar appointments in the near future.

THE SENATE

RENOVATIONS TO CHAMBER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you may have observed that the chamber has undergone extensive changes, which it is hoped will bring about improvements in services and will aid all honourable senators in the performance of their duties.

The old carpet, which had become worn and, indeed, in certain spots a tripping hazard, has been replaced by a new one.

The obsolete sound amplification and interpretation system has been discarded, and a new—and, we hope, improved—system installed by the Tannoy Company under contract with the Department of Public Works. Honourable senators will have noticed the new microphones on the desks, and the new controls conveniently placed before them. On each microphone is a small red light which will be turned on by the console operator when a senator rises to speak. It will indicate that the microphone is open. The controls attached to desks have six channels, but only numbers 1, 2 and 3 function. The other three are extras for additional channels should the necessity arise. When an honourable senator uses the earphone which is provided, if he turns the knob to number 1 on the controls, he will hear the speech as it is being delivered in the chamber. If he turns it to number 2, he will hear the English interpretation, and, if he turns it to number 3, he will hear the French interpretation.

For a period of one year, the operation of the system will be controlled by a technician from the Tannoy Company. During that period he will also train a number of Senate personnel in the operation of the console.

Honourable senators will also have noticed in the galleries the new loud speakers and control boxes which will provide the public with simultaneous interpretation of the debates.

The area surrounding the Throne and the Chairs has been given a new look. This was arrived at through consultation with some senators and other distinguished persons interested in this chamber. The beautiful stone work behind the Throne has been cleaned, and honourable senators, visitors and the public generally, may now admire its fine sculpture.

This new decor is an experiment, and the Chair and officers of the house would welcome suggestions or comments by honourable senators concerning this new arrangement. The present arrangement will remain until the Christmas adjournment. Then, if it is the wish of honourable senators, it will remain permanently; otherwise, the canopy and drapes will be brought back and the former arrangement will be restored.

In conclusion I should say that, initially, problems might be experienced with the new sound and interpretation system, even though it underwent thorough testing by technicians, interpreters and members of the staff who sat in the chamber for that purpose.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Lefebvre had been substituted for that of Mr. Goodale on the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region.

● (2010)

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Portelance had been substituted for that of Mr. Rompkey, that the name of Mr. Brewin had been substituted for that of Mr. Orlikow, and that the name of Mr. Stollery had been substituted for that of Miss Bégin on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read a second time at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Flynn: I understand that the idea is not to force the continuance of the debate on Thursday.

Senator Perrault: That is true. It is hoped that because of the importance of this legislation we can at least initiate second reading with a government statement tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copy of Ordinance, Chapter 1, passed by the Council of the Northwest Territories during its 55th Session and assented to May 2, 1975, pursuant to section 16(1) of the Northwest Territories Act, Chapter N-22, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1975-1417, dated June 17, 1975, approving same.

Report of the Canadian Dairy Commission, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 22 of the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, Chapter C-7, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the number and amount of Loans to Immigrants made under section 65(1) of the Immigration Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 65(6) of the said Act, Chapter I-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the administration of the Canada Student Loans Act for the loan year ended June 30, 1974, pursuant to section 18 of the said Act, Chapter S-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the months of April, May and June, 1975, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Revised Capital Budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the year ending December 31, 1975, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, as approved by Order in Council P.C. 1975-2138, dated September 11, 1975.

Report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada for the year ended May 31, 1975, pursuant to section 18 of the Law Reform Commission Act, Chapter 23 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 10 of the said Act, Chapter E-5, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of activities under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the Crop Year ended July 31, 1974, pursuant to section 12 of the said Act, Chapter P-16, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the administration of the Canada Assistance Plan for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 19, Chapter C-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Reports of the Atlantic Pilotage Authority, the Laurentian Pilotage Authority, the Great Lakes Pilotage Authority, Ltd. and the Pacific Pilotage Authority, including accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 28 of the Pilotage Act, Chapter 52, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of the Department of Transport containing a Statement of Wharf Revenue Receipts and a Statement of Harbour Dues for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 14 of the Government Harbours and Piers Act, Chapter G-9, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Northern Canada Power Commission, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 24 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, Chapter N-21, and section 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Fisheries Prices Support Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 7 of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, Chapter F-23, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of operations under the Canada Water Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 36 of the said Act, Chapter 5 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of White Paper entitled "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action", together with a booklet giving the highlights of the Government's anti-inflation program both dated October 14, 1975.

Copies of a statement, dated October 14, 1975, relating to federal measures to deal with mercury contamination.

Public Accounts of Canada, Volumes I, II and III, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 55(1) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1975-2429, dated October 14, 1975, appointing the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin and Mrs. Beryl Plumptre Commissioners under Part I of the Inquiries Act to the Interim Anti-Inflation Board, for the purpose of implementing an anti-inflation program.

Copies of Terms of Reference of the Committee appointed to study the operation of the Abortion Law.

Auditor General's Report to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on the examination of the accounts and financial statements of the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 138 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, Chapter 48, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

[Senator Perrault.]

Copies of a report by the Advisory Committee of the Canada Pension Plan respecting the rate of return on the Investment Fund of the said Plan, dated June 1975.

Capital Budget of Air Canada for the year ending December 31, 1975, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1975-2412, dated October 9, 1975, approving same.

Capital and Operating Budgets of the Canadian National Railways for the year ending December 31, 1975, pursuant to section 37(2) of the Canadian National Railways Act, Chapter C-10, and section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1975-2411, dated October 9, 1975, approving same.

Report on proceedings under the Canada Labour Code Part V (Industrial Relations) for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 170 of the said Code, Chapter L-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada, Volume I, Abstract of Statements of Insurance Companies in Canada, for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, Chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

I draw the attention of honourable senators especially to the White Paper entitled, "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," and the accompanying booklet, both dated October 14, 1975.

Senator Flynn: A memorable day in Hochelaga.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, because of the importance which I am sure all honourable senators attach to the problem of inflation, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 23, I will call the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled, "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate today.

It seems to me appropriate that all honourable senators be given an opportunity to express their views with respect to the program to combat inflation in this nation.

Senator Flynn: It is too bad that we shall not commence the debate tonight in view of the presence in the gallery of the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. I am quite sure he would be interested in listening to the statement by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: Well, I am sure the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in this place agrees with me that there is a great deal of wisdom here that will assist in furthering the objectives of this program.

Senator Flynn: It is too bad that the government did not use the wisdom of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place earlier.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS— QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we now have a very good simultaneous interpretation system—for which I thank Her Honour the Speaker—I should like to ask my question in French.

[Translation]

Since we were advised this morning that there would be a postal strike, we also realize that it will have an extremely painful effect on the economy of the country and since the government has belatedly decided to fight inflation, can the government leader tell us whether the cabinet has already decided, owing to the seriousness of the situation, to solve quickly the problem by introducing a special legislation requiring the postal employees to return to work immediately?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to assure the Honourable Senator Asselin and the house that the government is most concerned about the maintenance of adequate postal services in this country. However, the resolution of this difference rests upon the initiative of the union involved. At this time it is not possible to say how or when negotiations will be resumed. I should mention, however, that there is a firm resolve on the part of the government not to yield to inordinate demands put forward by any sector of the economy—whether by professionals, those in the trade unions, those in management or those in any other sector. Yielding to inordinate wage demands on an indiscriminate basis would shatter the guidelines announced just a few days ago, and the government feels confident that in its position it has the support of the great majority of the Canadian people.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

UNAUTHORIZED PRESS PUBLICATION OF CONFIDENTIAL DRAFT REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Riel: I rise on a question of privilege, Madam Speaker. I would like to draw the attention of this house on some facts that happened Monday and Tuesday of this week, when Le Devoir of Montreal and the Toronto Globe and Mail published without authorization extracts of a confidential preliminary report for the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

As you know, a Special Joint Committee of Parliament was set up in March. This committee, made up of eight senators and fifteen House members, held a great many meetings for the purpose of hearing witnesses, as well as several meetings behind closed doors. Moreover, a team of specialists had compiled the necessary statistics to be able to make recommendations to Parliament as to what the new immigration bill should include. This joint committee is to submit its report to Parliament on October 30.

It is only normal that such an important working paper—only a draft—be prepared by the committee. Of course, each and every page was clearly stamped "Confidential until presented in the House". It is the result of proceedings conducted behind closed doors.

The unauthorized publication of this report on October 20 and 21 in the newspaper Le Devoir and the Globe and Mail respectively constitutes a breach of the privileges of the Senate and the House of Commons.

● (2020)

[English]

I would quote Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, Chapter IX, citation 320, paragraph (5), page 250:

No act done at any committee should be divulged before the same be reported to the House. (Clarendon 1826 ed. II, p. 159). Upon this principle the Commons, on April 21, 1837, resolved "That the evidence taken by any select committee of this House, and the documents presented to such committee and which have not been reported to the House, ought not to be published by any member of such committee or by any other person."

The citation continues:

The publication of proceedings of committees conducted with closed doors or of reports of committees before they are available to Members will, however, constitute a breach of privilege.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I rise on Standing Order 34. The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Immigration Policy had been asked by Parliament to report on an extremely touchy matter which may have important repercussions on every segment of our Canadian society. The non-authorized publication in its present form of that preliminary report, which is in no way definitive, of which certain aspects have yet to be discussed, and on which the members of the committee had not voted, as I say, makes the task of the committee very difficult. In addition to this, it is also such as to give the public completely erroneous information on our work.

Under the circumstances, Madam Speaker, as the definition given in Beauchesne of a breach of privilege includes such erroneous and unauthorized publications, we feel that the following motion is well founded. Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator McElman, that the unauthorized publication of the preliminary version of a confidential report of the Special Joint Committee of Parliament on Immigration Policy be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

In closing, honourable senators, I want to advise you that a similar motion was presented this afternoon in the House of Commons with a view to referring the matter to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Privileges and Elections, which motion was taken into consideration by the Speaker at the other place.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Riel for having given me notice of the motion he has just moved. As there are some doubts in my mind as to the acceptability of the motion, I would like to take the matter under consideration and give a ruling later.

I understand that this question has already been raised in the other place and, in the circumstances, I do not feel it advisable to put the motion proposed by the Honourable Senator Riel before the house at this time. However, I would welcome any comments by honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am taken by surprise because I was not advised of this motion before I heard it moved by Senator Riel. The problem that I see at this time, even if the motion is in order, is the duplication involved in having a committee of this house and a committee of the other house studying separately the same problem, with the possibility that each might come to a different conclusion.

It seems to me that the proper procedure probably should be to have a special joint committee of both houses look into this. That is the only reaction I have at this time, not having had occasion to read the papers in question, or examine the problem and the difficulties which Senator Riel has outlined this evening. I think it would be a good idea if this motion were taken under advisement and Madam Speaker were to give us an occasion to discuss the problem again tomorrow. That is my initial reaction to this question.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, if I might make a comment, I am as surprised as the Leader of the Opposition that this motion has been moved without any indication to us on this side that it was going to be moved this evening. My first reaction is that it is completely unnecessary to request that this matter be referred to a committee of the Senate.

We are dealing, as I understand it from the words of the mover of the motion, with a draft of a report which happens to have leaked out. If we are going to take this position with every draft of every report of any committee that the press have been enterprising enough to discover, surely we are going to put ourselves in a ridiculous position. That is my own view. It is a draft. It may have been marked "Confidential," but to whom is it confidential?

• (2030)

The quotation from Beauchesne, in my view, is not appropriate to these particular circumstances. It does not refer to drafts of reports. Are we going to get into the position that if the press happens to find a draft of a report of a committee, and publishes it, we are going to regard that as a breach of privilege of this house? In my view, we are thinking in very anachronistic terms of the contours of the privilege of Parliament.

It is only a draft which has fallen into the hands of an enterprising newspaperman. Unquestionably, it was given him by a member of the committee, but where is the breach of privilege? I merely say that I can see no breach of privilege, because this is happening all the time.

Senator Perrault: That does not make it right.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps it does not, but it is the trend. If we are going to take this position, my own view is that we will make ourselves appear ridiculous in terms of the right of the media, the press, to insist on disclosure when they discover information to which they feel the public is entitled.

Senator McDonald: Or steal it.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Riel's deep concern about this matter is understandable. The subject of immigration is a sensitive one, of concern to many Canadians of all political parties. What has been described as an "unauthorized leak" to the media has distressed all members of the committee in both houses who have spent many hours listening to testimony and considering divergent views about immigration policy.

It is rather distressing in society today that situations have arisen which feature divulgence of confidential information of this kind, or of other privileged information, to the media. I join with Senator Riel in expressing the concern felt by many people in public life over what is becoming, as Senator Grosart correctly pointed out, almost an established procedure. It is not necessarily a good or beneficial trend, however.

The suggestion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, that the matter raised by Senator Riel is of concern to members of both houses, is a good one. We on this side of the house will await the statement by Madam Speaker tomorrow afternoon, at which time there will be an opportunity, if necessary, to continue our discussion of the issue.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, since the reporter was not a member of the committee, I am wondering how he obtained the report—from which member or from which clerk. That, to me, is the more important aspect rather than the publication.

Senator Asselin: First make your investigation among the members of the committee.

Senator Croll: That to me is as important as the publication itself. We should give that aspect a little thought before we jump further into this issue.

Senator Grosart: My point is that if a committee, the government or anyone else, marks a document as being confidential, and someone finds it and publishes it, and we then call it a breach of privilege, that in my view, in terms of the situation today, would be nonsense.

[Translation]

Senator Riel: Let me mention, Madam Speaker, that I forgot to say that this joint committee is a non-partisan one. All its members agreed that this motion was to be introduced tonight. It was moved in the other place this afternoon with the unanimous support of all members and all parties in the House.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, and with your permission, I should like to review very briefly the work done by the Senate to date in this First Session of the Thirtieth Parliament.

Some 59 bills have been received from the House of Commons, of which 50 have been government bills, eight public bills introduced by private members and one private bill. These bills have been studied and passed by the Senate and in due course have received royal assent.

In addition—and this is a fact which has escaped the attention of many Canadians, including certain members of the media—27 bills have so far been initiated in the Senate this session, of which 18 have been government bills, four public bills introduced by private members and five private bills. Seventeen government bills have been passed by the Senate and sent to the Commons. One government bill has not been proceeded with on the recommendation of the committee to which it was referred, two public bills are still before the Senate and two have been referred to committee. The five private bills have now been passed by both houses and assented to. This is a creditable record by any parliamentary standard. And there is much to come.

As honourable senators know, public bills involving the expenditure of money cannot be introduced in the Senate, and there are certain policy measures which, traditionally, ministers have introduced in the other place. This has become standard practice, but, as the Leader of the Government here, I wish to assure honourable senators that I have made, and will continue to make, every possible effort to have the practice continued and extended of having many government bills made available to us for introduction here. Indeed, it is the intention of the government, following the successful work undertaken by the Senate so far this session, to continue the practice whereby a number of important measures are initiated in the Senate and referred to the Commons for further action.

As honourable senators are well aware, all of the work undertaken by the Senate is not done in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: For example, the volume and quality of the work undertaken by our select committees has been outstanding, not only in past sessions but during this session. In addition to its study of legislation, in recent months the Senate has authorized its committees to examine and report upon various matters of public concern and interest. The list includes competition in Canada; combines; television programming; U.S.-Canada relations—an important study now in progress—budget resolutions; income tax; manpower programs; agricultural questions, such as crop insurance; bankruptcy; the textile industry, and many other subjects.

Many of these efforts have gone “unhonoured” and “unsung.” Traditionally, senators do not seek honour, praise or publicity, but in justice there should be placed on record at regular intervals the useful work done by members of this chamber.

During this session, as well, the Senate has appointed members to sit on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy, and we owe a great debt to those senators who have put in long hours on that committee and on other committees. I mention also the Special Joint Committees on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, and the National Capital Region.

Honourable senators have played an active part on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. Amendments have been made to several government bills which have come before the Senate, notably Bill C-29, an Act respecting Canadian business corporations, to which the Senate made 27 amendments, all of which were accepted by the other place without change, significant criticism or further comment. Those changes proposed by the Senate and accepted by the House of Commons represented the culmination of detailed and careful study by members of this chamber who brought to that legislation their experience, knowledge and dedication. As a result, the country will benefit very significantly.

During this session, as in the past, Senate committees have given careful consideration to all bills referred to them. I mention particularly the work done on Bill C-29 by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which, following careful consideration, proposed those 27 worthwhile amendments mentioned earlier.

● (2040)

Bill S-19, better known as the “Cannabis Bill,” as honourable senators are aware, was initiated in the Senate. It was studied over a period of many weeks by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Many briefs were filed with the committee and many witnesses were heard. The committee made proposals for changes in that measure—changes which, we believe, were of a beneficial nature.

There have been a total of 48 amendments made to bills which have come before the Senate so far this session—48 amendments ultimately accepted by the Commons—and yet I heard a badly informed commentator say the other day that the Senate does nothing but “rubber-stamp,” that it never changes anything. Well, perhaps it is time that we started telling the Canadian people exactly what is going on in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Every one of those 48 Senate amendments was accepted by the other place—at times, I suspect, with great gratitude because of the strengthening and improvement they represented.

Senator McElman: Perhaps they will now call the House of Commons a rubber-stamp.

Senator Perrault: Of course, we all recall the pioneering effort of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee during the hearings on the “Cannabis Bill” in permitting, for the first time in parliamentary history, the admission of television and radio broadcasting of the committee's proceedings, an experiment, which proceeded successfully and without any difficult aftermath.

To keep this a short presentation, may I say that there are already indications that the Senate will be just as busy during the balance of this session as we have been so far in the life of this Thirtieth Parliament. I want to thank all of those who have made this such a productive session so far for the Senate and for the parliamentary system. I thank you wherever you sit in the Senate, whether on the Opposition side or on the government side, and particularly we owe a great vote of thanks to the chairmen of the various committees, all of whom have exercised a special measure of devotion and dedication to the activities of the Senate.

Senator Walker: Would the Leader of the Government agree with my summing it up in this way: From what you have said, we are wonderful?

Senator Riel: Well said.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps after what Senator Walker has just said, I should remain silent—probably I should—but I am not prepared to be silent. It is sometimes more difficult to remain silent than it is to speak.

The Leader of the Government is in a very buoyant and self-congratulatory mood this evening, so his voice is comparatively low. He is only loud when he has a bad case to defend, which is quite often. This evening he chose to review our accomplishments thus far in the First Session of this Parliament, and that was a good idea. I agree with him that our accomplishments have indeed been worthwhile.

During this session, as in others gone by, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has studied bills simultaneously with studies carried out by the House of Commons. It is doing so now with the competition legislation and the bankruptcy legislation.

The purpose is to provide the Senate with an opportunity to study such bills and make recommendations thereon before the other place has finished its study, and then we sit back and hope the other place will accept our suggestions and not make a fool of itself. Sometimes it does accept, in which case it gets the credit and we get the satisfaction. We will have another opportunity in connection with the competition legislation, which is to come before the Senate shortly, to compare the bill as passed by the other place with the recommendations made by our committee.

Our National Finance Committee undertook a study of the Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, but has yet to report thereon. From looking at the list of departmental officials who appeared before the committee, I am tempted to conclude that one of the government's secret weapons against unemployment is to vastly increase the number of employees in the Department of Manpower and Immigration. However, I am willing to wait for the report before going any further on that.

The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee was the centre of attraction this session with its study of marihuana and whether or not its possession, use and sale should be legalized, or at least decriminalized. Although I may not be in complete accord with the final recommendations of the committee, I have to admit that I would like to see more bills of similar importance initiated in the Senate. I think the Senate did good work on this bill. We could have ended up sending the other place a better bill, but that would have required a Tory majority in the Senate, and no problem should wait that long for solution.

The Foreign Affairs Committee has been hard at work studying our relations with the United States. In the past, it studied our relations with the European Economic Community, with the countries of the Pacific, as well as Canada-Caribbean relations. It decided that perhaps we had better pay some attention to our closest neighbour; that although the United States has always been friendly towards Canada, it should not be taken for granted. For that reason, it initiated the study of Canada-U.S. relations. When the report is finished, bearing in mind the events of last week, hopefully there will be a chapter on how not to entertain American dignitaries for dinner!

The Agriculture Committee has done a good deal of work on the agricultural problems of Kent County, New Brunswick, and other problems facing the agricultural community.
[Senator Flynn.]

The Transport and Communications Committee has rejected a bill, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Government, dealing with aircraft registry, and by so doing saved the country from legal chaos in that area. It also had a look at what the CBC offers as entertainment and found it wanting in some respects, although I am sure we really didn't require a Senate committee investigation to establish that fact. But there it is.

The Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy has been busy, as has the Internal Economy Committee. Even Senator Connolly's Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber has been busy, but it has taken too long in bringing down its recommendations on how to improve the look of the Senate. So, the Prime Minister beat the committee to the punch, and appointed Senator Smith.

Seriously, it has been a productive session so far and I, for one, sincerely hope that the government will see fit to introduce even more legislation in the Senate, as has been indicated by the Leader of the Government. I would further hope that it will be important legislation, something that Senator Perrault and I can really scrap about.

I do not think I would surprise anybody by saying that I thoroughly enjoy my work in the Senate. I should probably say that I enjoy it in spite of the presence of so many Grits, but sometimes I think it is because of that very fact that I enjoy it so much. Not only do they provide vast quantities of comic relief, but they force the Opposition to be on its toes all the time, and my colleagues and I are not noted for backing down in the face of a challenge.

Honourable senators, I am glad to see all of you again, but I am especially glad to see Her Honour the Speaker who, at times, has come to my rescue. I hope she will keep up the good work.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I am glad to be back and find you in excellent health. As far as the Opposition is concerned we undertake this second part of the session with a renewed wish to work very hard, especially because of the presence among us of our new colleague, Senator Smith and especially because dawn has appeared to break somewhere since last October 14, in the Hochelaga riding where electors from Quebec decided that finally the Conservative Party could be seen as an alternative—not only worthwhile but desirable—to this government.

● (2050)

[English]

CRIME AND VIOLENCE

PROPOSED SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, July 23, the debate on the motion of Senator McGrand that the Senate considers it desirable that a special committee of the Senate be established at an early date to inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in support of Senator McGrand's motion. Crime and violence is a continuing and worsening problem, not only here in Canada but throughout most of the free world. I should therefore like to congratulate Senator McGrand, not only on taking the initiative in an effort to explore the causes and possible solution to this problem but also on his scholarly presentation when he opened the debate on this subject on May 14 of this year.

Because so much time has elapsed since then it may be well to refresh our memories by briefly reviewing some of the main points emphasized by Senator McGrand. He covered the subject so thoroughly that one can do little more than expand on the arguments he has already made.

One of the main points emphasized by Senator McGrand is our abysmal ignorance of crime and its causes. We spend millions upon millions in research on cancer, heart disease and other human ailments, but next to nothing on research into either human behaviour in general or the causes of crime and violence in particular.

Senator McGrand also pointed out the stark contrast between human behaviour and that of the lower animals, as well as between the behaviour of so-called modern man and his primitive ancestors.

He cited Dr. Anthony Storr, physician and psychologist, of London, England, Dr. Eric Fromm, the author of the book entitled The Anatomy of Human Aggression, and a number of other eminent authorities, to show that primitive man, like the lower animal, killed only to eat and showed little aggression to his neighbours, while the so-called modern man is the only primate that kills and tortures members of his own species without any reason—and derives satisfaction from doing so.

This contrast between modern man and primitive man indicates that crime, violence and other undesirable facets of human behaviour are characteristics which man has acquired along the long road to civilization.

It would be a contradiction in terms to say that crime and violence are products of civilization itself or of the civilizing process, even if they are regarded as negative products. It is, in my opinion, more accurate to regard them as products of the type of society we have developed.

This conclusion is borne out by the report of the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence and Crime, which was set up by the President of the United States in 1968 under the chairmanship of Dr. Milton Eisenhower.

This commission divided its research work into seven basic areas of detailed inquiry with a task force assigned to each area. These were as follows: (1) Task Force on Historical and Comparative Perspectives; (2) Task Force on Group Violence; (3) Task Force on Individual Acts of Violence; (4) Task Force on Assassinations; (5) Task Force on Firearms; (6) Task Force on the Media; and (7) Task Force on Law Enforcement.

In assigning terms of reference to the various task forces, the commission drew a distinction between what it termed legitimate violence—from a shooting in lawful self-defence to international violence in the form of warfare—and illegitimate violence. Each task force submitted its own report and recommendations, comprising together a total of 81.

In the course of its investigation the commission turned up some very interesting facts. For example, 26 large cities, with a population in excess of a half-million each, accounted for over 50 per cent of violent crimes although they represented only 20 per cent of the total population. It found also that violent crimes were committed mostly by males in the age group of 18 to 24, followed closely by the age group of 15 to 17. The male homicide rate was five times the female rate, and robbery by males was 20 times as high as robbery by females.

It discovered also that by far the greatest proportion of crime was committed by repeaters, and not by one-time offenders. The number of hard-core repeaters was relatively small but was responsible for the largest proportion of crime. Its research showed that the violent offender, once released, if he recidivates at all, will most likely commit crime from two to three years after his release, and that the length of the sentence served bears no relationship whatsoever to the chance or the possibility of recidivating. In other words, criminals are being recycled. The same criminals are turning up over and over again, and a recent report indicates that the rate of recidivism is now nearly 70 per cent.

As for the crime of murder, the United States, with a population of 200 million people, averaged about 650 murders per year. By contrast, England, Germany and Japan, with a combined population of 214 million people, reached only 135 murders per year. The rates for robbery, rape, aggravated assault and other crimes were all significantly higher in the United States than in the countries mentioned.

● (2100)

The interim report was published in 1969, and the situation has worsened considerably since then. In one year, from 1973 to 1974, serious crime jumped 17 per cent. To bring the commission's statistics up to date, since 1961 the rates for all serious crimes in the U.S.A. have more than doubled. During the past 14 years, the rate of robberies has increased by 255 per cent, out of all proportion to population growth. During the same period, rape increased by 143 per cent, aggravated assault by 153 per cent, and murder by 106 per cent. FBI reports show that for serious crime there was an 18 per cent rise during the first three months of 1975.

Actual statistics calculated by three mathematicians at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology prove that homicide is increasing so fast in the larger American cities that 2 per cent of all babies born today will probably be murdered, and the actual figure may reach 5 per cent.

Since no such systematic study has been carried out in Canada, comparable and reliable statistics are difficult to come by. However, we do know that crime is on the increase in Canada and that, next to inflation, unemployment and poverty, it is probably our most serious national problem. It is clear, however, from the statistics that I have just mentioned, and the comparison of crime rates in the United States with those of European countries and Japan, that the criminal is not born, but made. He is the product of the type of society that we have developed, and since our Canadian society parallels so closely that of the U.S.A., even allowing for differences, Canadian crime rates and patterns are bound to parallel closely those of our neighbour to the south.

If, therefore, we are to look for the causes of crime and violence in Canadian society, we must study the changes that have taken place in our society and the influences that have produced those changes.

Among the contributing causes listed in the recent report were the usual ones of alcohol, narcotics, dangerous drugs, et cetera, but included also were such causes as public defiance of the law—disobedience with impunity of court orders and court injunctions by unions, organizations and protest groups—deterioration of home and family life; and rising expectations which are beyond the power of the economy to provide.

It was discovered that criminal conduct was much more likely to be found among the poor, the uneducated, the unskilled and the unemployed than among those higher up the economic ladder. However, all were agreed that the overall cause was the permissiveness that has characterized our society, particularly over the past three decades.

This permissiveness coincides with the changes in the moral values of our society which have accelerated over the past 30 years, and have been allowed to develop to the point where we actually have rejected the very values on which our society was founded and nourished.

This was stated very forcibly in an article by Claire Boothe Luce which appeared in the Wall Street Journal, and reprinted on page 5 of the Vancouver Sun of September 27, 1975. The article was in reply to an editorial in Time magazine which suggested that Miss Fromme, who attempted to assassinate President Ford, was "an amoral freak". The editorial went on the bemoan the fact "that such a liberal and free society should somehow generate a "sprinkling" of warped souls..." Claire Boothe Luce's reply, in part, was as follows:

To write of a "sprinkling" of warped souls is to ignore the fact that America is now producing a deluge of "warped souls" and amoral freaks.

The rise in this decade in juvenile muggings, armed robberies, rapes, car thefts, prostitution, drug peddling, drug-taking and alcoholism, is horrifying. In the most affluent society on earth, more than $5 billion a year are purloined by youthful shoplifters. Youthful vandalism costs our society another $7 billion annually.

Congress has just passed a $40 million bill for fiscal '76 to study and prevent juvenile delinquency. But sociologists have begun reluctantly to face the appalling fact that the majority of juvenile crimes are committed just because they "feel good" and are "something exciting to do."

Secondly, it is no "paradox" that a society which has, helter-skelter, been abandoning its traditional Judeo-Christian moral values, is now producing demons. And to say that it has found no way of controlling them is to ignore the reasons why our "free and liberal society" is continuing to produce them in ever-greater numbers.

The parents, teachers and professors of today's Youth Rebels were in their cradles when the intellectuals proclaimed "the death of God," the "Old Man" of the entire Judeo-Christian tribe, and began to scrap the moral standards by which Western society had judged right and wrong, good and bad, desirable and undesirable human conduct for centuries. The parents, naturally enough, became "permissive."

But their children were also in their cradles, when—in the sacred name of free speech—the liberal intellectuals defended, in the Supreme Court, the right of publishers, play and film producers to flood America with filth. The merchants of porn, grue, perversion and violence became millionaires. The kids who were nurtured on them are today's hop-heads and alcoholics, fire-bomb throwers and thrill-killers.

Nor did the counter-culture kids invent the idea that crime—when it is not a form of "mental illness"—is a form of social protest. The liberal politicization of crime and its causes was in the air that the counter-culture kids breathed from birth.

In the liberal view that prevailed among their elders, although "crime" existed, there were no criminals—only "sick" people, and misguided "reformers", driven to commit their acts of protest by the political forces, generally identified as "conservative," who lack "compassion"... for the "sick", the alienated, and the under-privileged.

The article continues:

Lynette Fromme was in her teens, and Patty Hearst in the sub-teens, when the intellectuals were praising the idealism of the burgeoning Youth Movement. The students who rioted at Berkeley for the right to use themselves the four-letter words used in the novels they were given to read in their English Lit. classes, were being seen as defenders of the First Amendment. The students who cut classes that bored them were only demanding a "relevant" education.

The lads who burned their draft cards and destroyed ROTC buildings were enlightened patriots. The lads and lassies who shackled up together in the dormitories against rules were discarding the obsolete taboos of puritanism, and the last vestiges of Victorian sexual hypocrisy. Altogether, the youth rebels were creating a "New Morality" and a "New Politics."

The writer of this article then refers to the appearance, by invitation, of Jerry Rubin on the campus of the University of Hawaii in 1970. He counselled his student audience to stiffen their resolve to destroy the Establishment by killing their mothers and fathers. He also enjoined them to avoid the use of soap—a long-haired, dirty appearance and scruffy clothing were to be the uniform of the Youth Revolution.

● (2110)

She observes also that there was no real protest from the faculty of the University of Hawaii. The faculties of most American universities, the higher educators, did not—and do not now—figure that they have any responsibility for criticizing, no less forming, the moral judgments of their students. On the contrary, American faculties practice what they preach to their students, which is the avoidance of "value judgment."

Then after observing that humanism has become the dominant philosophy of our educators, that its dregs are the ideas of the counter-culture, she winds up her article as follows:

We deceive ourselves if we fail to see that the counter-culture thrust is not towards reform, or even social revolution. It is towards terror and nihilism, violence and anarchy. Its impact upon American youth is not receding—it is growing.

And not the least of the reasons is that, in America, nothing still succeeds like success. In our increasingly existential world, "instant fame"—or notoriety—is the goal. To be a success is to be a media celebrity. The more brutal and bizarre, the more terrible and sexually titillating the act, the more attention the media pays its perpetrator.

She concludes the article with this very telling statement:

Elizabeth Seton, the first native American to be canonized as a saint, couldn't make the cover of Time. But Lynette Fromme made it.

It is getting late.

Since the end of the First World War, throughout the whole free world and particularly in North America, there has been a growing concentration on material possessions as a means of attaining happiness. As the emphasis on material values increased, the emphasis on spiritual values declined to the point where a large section of our society has rejected them altogether. In other words, quality of life has been exchanged for a standard of living. Success has been portrayed in terms of acquisitiveness, and acquisitiveness has led to a renewed emphasis on aggressiveness as a desirable human trait—especially in the male. Aggressiveness has been encouraged not only in society at large, but also in the school and even in the home.

The decline in the emphasis on spiritual values and moral principles has resulted in a diminished sense of individual responsibility, particularly in the home which is the basic unit of society. Spiritual values are to a society what vitamins are to the physical body. Without vitamins the body cannot be healthy, no matter how great or how extensive the quantity of food absorbed, and without spiritual and moral values we cannot have a healthy society. Our North American society is the most affluent society in the world, but it is very clear that affluence and acquisition of material things have not brought happiness. However, the real tragedy is that in the process of rejecting spiritual values and substituting material values for them, we have lost our sense of right and wrong.

This aspect of our sick society is dealt with in a recent book by Carl Menninger entitled Whatever Became of Sin? Chapter 8 of this book is headed, "The Old Seven Deadly Sins (and Some New Ones). On page 133 he asks this question:

What is this "sinning" that seems real in private but which gets swiftly and successfully swept under the rug in public discussion? What are those mortal sins, the classical seven of olden times, that stood firm for so many people for so many centuries? Are they gone?

What about the famous Ten Commandments? They have been a basic guide for many more centuries. We learned them by heart once.

On the next page, he answers the question in this way:

The forms of sin in the traditional list of seven were envy, anger, pride, sloth, avarice, gluttony, and lust.

He mentions the variations in the list that have occurred down through the ages, and observes that curiously—to our thinking today—none of the lists included dishonesty, vindictiveness, cruelty, bigotry, or infidelity, and goes on to say:

If we translate the official names of the cardinal sins into their approximate equivalents in modern speech, they begin to sparkle with relevance.

Remember, as we run down each of these individual acts or attitudes, which for convenience we will refer to as sins, that each is not THE sin per se, but only a form or expression of it. Sin is not against rules, but against people—and it is the "against-ness" or aggression in the intent or motivation that constitutes the designation."

Scripture refers to sin as a disease. A sinful society is a sick society—a society that has destroyed its signposts and its guidelines. Such a society does not know where it is going or where it wants to go because it has no fixed point of departure and no true compass to steer by.

A sick society is a confused society. It cannot fully comprehend basic causes of crime and violence and, therefore, it lacks the ability to develop a proper solution, and lacks also the will to enforce such solutions as may be found. Instead of dealing with root causes it concentrates only on the symptoms, and falls back on punishment as the only solution.

Crime and violence call for an answer that goes beyond linguistic, cultural, economic and social barriers. A well structured society resembles a woven fabric. In a good fabric each thread has its place and supports the other threads, as it is supported by them. Our society today is more like a sand castle, which can only keep its form with the pressure of an outside force.

It has been estimated that in the United States the cost of crime amounts to some $75 billion per year. On a proportionate basis Canadian crime must be costing some $5 billion to $7 billion per year. Crime and violence is, therefore, a huge national problem both from the economic and the social standpoint. It is a problem that cries out for the kind of investigation that the Senate can provide, and for that reason I have much pleasure in supporting the motion.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

PUBLIC BILLSMOTION TO SUSPEND RULES DROPPED

On the Motion:

That until Parliament adjourns for the summer recess, Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, may I ask that the motion standing in my name be removed from the Order Paper?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion dropped.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 22, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Miss Bégin had been substituted for that of Mr. Stollery on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Department of National Revenue containing Tables and Statements relative to Customs, Excise and Taxation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 5 of the Department of National Revenue Act, Chapter N-15, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Arts Centre Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 17 of the National Arts Centre Act, Chapter N-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, together with the Report of the Auditor General on its accounts and financial statements, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 20 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act, Chapter C-8, R.S.C., 1970.

Report respecting receipts and expenditures under Part V (Sick Mariners) of the Canada Shipping Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 306 of the said Act, Chapter S-9, R.S.C., 1970. Nil Return.

PRIVATE BILL

EASTERN CANADA SAVINGS AND LOAN COMPANY AND CENTRAL & NOVA SCOTIA TRUST COMPANY—FIRST READING

Senator Barrow presented Bill S-29, to enable The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company and Central & Nova Scotia Trust Company to amalgamate.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Barrow moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday next.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI DECLARATION—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether it is the intention of the government to afford the Senate an early opportunity of considering the Helsinki Declaration on European security and co-operation.

Senator Perrault: While it is not the intention of the government to proceed in a formal way to consider this subject, we would certainly welcome the initiative of any honourable senator if he wishes to advance a resolution or notice of inquiry with respect to it.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER RE ANTI-INFLATION LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government for a complete explanation of the statement made by the Prime Minister to the effect that he would not withdraw the right to strike, but that if anyone were given an increase above the guidelines provided in Bill C-73 it would be immediately taken away by taxation or otherwise?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall certainly endeavour to obtain a clarification of the reported remarks of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. I understand that the statement attributed to the Prime Minister appeared in the media, but I have seen no formal statement in that regard.

While I am on my feet I should like to state once again that it is the intention of the government to establish guidelines which are going to be equitable for all sections of society. The Prime Minister, if he was quoted accurately, appears to have simply reinforced the statement made on Thanksgiving evening that those people who choose to violate the guidelines will be resisted by the government, and by the anti-inflation measures advanced by it.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING— DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.)

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

When I made my maiden speech in this house in December of 1973, I spent some considerable time discussing the problems of a senator, who was a partner in a corporation law firm, with respect to conflict of interest respecting legislation being considered in this house which might affect his clients. With regard to this particular legislation, Bill C-2, which is about to be debated, I should like to say that before I was appointed to the Senate I was active in the preparation of briefs, on behalf of clients of my firm, addressed to the minister concerned. Under the circumstances, I feel that I should make a public declaration of what I consider to be my conflict of interest, and state that I will not be participating in the debate, or in any of the votes or discussions in committee arising from it.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I move second reading of the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Cook, seconded by the Honourable Senator Paterson, that the bill be now read a second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, in these sophisticated days the average consumer is subjected to all sorts of pressures and inducements by merchants and others who are selling goods and services. Sometimes these pressures and inducements go far beyond that which is honest and fair. It is therefore right and proper that the law should be extended and expanded in order to protect, as far as it is possible to do so, the average man or woman from improper and fraudulent practices.

The general thrust of Bill C-2 is to amend the Combines Investigation Act in order to afford greater protection to the consumer. I feel sure no one would disagree with this.

In my view the Senate has a great responsibility when dealing with legislation of this nature. I say this because it seems to me that there is a tendency for those who draft legislation creating new offences to make the language all-embracing and too wide. Because of what is perhaps a commendable desire to make sure the guilty do not evade the law, they may go too far and deprive those who are not guilty of their right to establish their innocence. It seems to me, therefore, that even if we approve of the changes to be made by this bill, it is for the Senate to weigh very carefully the language used in every section, and to satisfy ourselves that the law will not have the effect of sometimes convicting those who never had any intention of committing an offence.

In this respect I am happy to be able to advise honourable senators that already much has been done to discharge the Senate's responsibility. On October 16, 1974, on the motion of Senator Hayden, the Hayden formula was once again invoked, and the subject matter of Bill C-2 was referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for study.

● (1410)

During what I might refer to as the committee's unofficial consideration of the bill, the committee held 19 meetings, heard 19 groups and considered 40 briefs. I refer to this as the committee's "unofficial" consideration of the bill because should Bill C-2 receive second reading, then it will go in the normal way to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for official consideration. As a result of the committee's unofficial consideration, as all honourable senators are aware, two reports were made suggesting a number of amendments. The first interim report of the committee stated that the committee's study of amendments proposed by the minister indicated that a reasonable attempt had been made to meet many of the criticisms of the proposed legislation as outlined in various submissions. The report also noted that the minister had indicated he might propose further amendments to the bill. In the result it might be said that the bill now before us incorporates the substance—in whole or in part—of a number of the more important amendments proposed by the Senate committee.

Honourable senators, it would not serve any useful purpose at this time for me to comment further on the nature and extent of these amendments. If this were to be done at this particular stage of the bill, then it could probably be better done by the chairman of the committee. In addition, if the bill receives second reading it will be referred for further study to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce where all amendments now recommended or new ones to be proposed may be studied in detail and be fully covered in the final report of the committee.

Honourable senators, I shall now endeavour to explain as briefly as possible the main clauses of this bill. I say "the main clauses" and "as briefly as possible" because it seems to me that this is very much a committee bill, and if I were to attempt to go into too much detail, then, long before I had finished, our colleagues, the Whips, would be hard pressed to provide a quorum in the chamber.

The three main features of the bill are:

1. The extension of the Combines Investigation Act to service industries which, with but a few exceptions, are not at present covered.

2. The strengthening of provisions which deal with misleading advertising, and providing new protection to consumers against other unfair or dishonest selling practices.

3. Granting the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission the power to review certain trade practices which, in some circumstances are perfectly legitimate but which, in other circumstances, have serious adverse effects on competition, such practices being:

- (i) refusal to deal,
- (ii) consignment selling (when used to thwart the price maintenance ban),
- (iii) exclusive dealing,
- (iv) tied selling,
- (v) market restriction,
- (vi) implementation in Canada of foreign judgments, laws and directives.

Let me say a few words first on the extension of the act to services. The act now applies, with only one or two exceptions, to dealings in goods. Thus, for example, retailers of goods are currently subject to the act. However, a wide variety of activities which do not involve dealing in goods are exempted by the present wording. Lawyers are exempted whereas pharmacists are not, since the latter deal in goods. Parts of the construction industry are exempted whereas other parts are not. In all cases the test is whether or not they deal in goods.

Bill C-2 amends the present act to remove the distinction between goods-related activities and solely service activities. Henceforth, virtually all commercial activities will be subject to the act as amended, unless they are subject to government regulation. The exemption for regulated activities is not stated in the bill, nor in the existing act, but arises from past judicial interpretation of the act.

It will be noted that bona fide trade union activities are specifically exempted, since these activities are governed by federal and provincial labour laws. Banks are covered in the bill by appropriate amendments to the Bank Act. The inclusion of services is a most important aspect of the bill, since it will bring approximately 20 per cent of the gross national product within the competition laws of the country for the first time.

Next, the bill will make bid-rigging—that is, the practice of entering into agreements to refrain from bidding on tenders, or submitting tender prices arrived at by collusion—an offence without further proof of the intention or effect of this practice. These provisions are primarily designed to protect the public interest in competition. There is another provision which also has this object as its purpose, and that is the redefinition of the word “unduly”. The present law states that for a collusive agreement to be illegal it must be proven that the agreement prevents or lessens competition unduly.

However, in some cases in recent years the courts have interpreted the word “unduly” to mean the complete or virtual elimination of competition in the relevant market. It is argued that cases can and do arise in which competition is lessened to an extent that is obviously detrimental to the public, but which might not meet the full test of complete or virtual elimination of competition. The bill proposes, therefore, that in order to prove that an agreement prevents or lessens competition unduly it would not be necessary to establish complete or virtual elimination of competition in the market. In other words, the amendment would make clear to the courts that Parliament does not intend the more rigorous interpretation, which has been a matter of argument in the courts for some years, to be the one applied.

The second main feature concerns misleading representations. The bill considerably broadens the present provisions dealing with misleading advertising respecting comparative prices. Section 36 of the act as it presently exists relates exclusively to misleading statements about prices used to demonstrate purported savings in the sale of articles. The present section 37 is limited to the prohibition of publication of advertisements containing statements that are untrue, or misleading, or that are intentionally so worded as to be misleading.

These sections are consolidated in the proposed new section 36, and are strengthened in a number of important respects. For example, the proposed new section 36 applies not only to advertising, but to any representation to the public to promote the sale of goods or services that is misleading in a material respect. Moreover, under the new provisions, the general impression created by representations, as well as their literal meaning, would have to be taken into account by a court in determining whether they are misleading.

However, in strengthening the sections on false and misleading advertising, account has been taken of the position of retailers in selling goods with descriptive labels attached by the manufacturer. The section is phrased so as to make the supplier, rather than the retailer, liable for such representations.

● (1420)

Section 36.1 makes it an offence to represent that any product had been tested as to performance, efficiency or length of life, or to publish a testimonial about it, unless the advertiser can show that such representation was made or testimonial was published by the person to whom it is attributed, or that approval was given by that person in writing for the advertiser to publish it.

Among other measures to protect the consumer in the market place, the bill contains provisions respecting double ticketing, pyramid selling, referral selling, bail and switch selling, sales above advertised price, and promotional contests.

Section 36.2 prohibits what has come to be known as double ticketing. There have been a great many complaints by consumers about finding two different prices on an article, and being charged the higher one. Consumers have felt that merchants should not place higher priced stickers on the goods already in stock. There is, however, nothing in the bill to prevent a merchant from applying higher or lower prices to goods which he has not yet marked.

Section 37.1 prohibits selling goods at a price above the advertised price. In other words, if a merchant advertises a product at a particular price, he must not sell it at a higher price during the period to which the advertisement relates. However, the section makes certain allowances. If the price was in a catalogue which states prominently that the prices are subject to error, then it is open to the issuer to establish that the price was stated in error. If the price was in an advertisement, the seller is protected if he immediately issues another advertisement correcting the first one.

Finally, as part of the consumer protection provisions, the bill would strengthen the existing prohibition in resale price maintenance. Resale price maintenance keeps selling prices higher than they would otherwise be by eliminating competition at wholesale and retail levels.

One of the ways the bill strengthens the present law is to make it an offence not only to require a customer to resell a product at a specific price, but also to make any attempt to influence a price upwards or discourage the reduction of a price.

Lastly, a word on business practices subject to review by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. In its Interim Report on Competition Policy, the Economic Council of Canada recommended that particular practices be subject to review by a proposed tribunal, and prohibited if found detrimental to the public interest. In recommending that that particular situation be brought under some form of civil legislation rather than under criminal prohibition, the council recognized that the practices in question are not bad in themselves and could have either good or bad effects on competition. Therefore, Bill C-2 would empower the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to review particular situations of refusal to deal, market restriction, tied selling, exclusive dealing and consignment selling.

It is because these practices can result in some advantages that the bill departs from the criminal law technique of prohibition. However, the complaint files of the Director of Investigation and Research and other evidence have established that the reviewable practices do, in many circumstances, lead to abuses over which some form of control is required. Indeed, many of the complaints have come from small businessmen.

The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission would not be empowered to initiate reviews itself, but would deal only with cases brought before it by the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act. Any person whose practices are under review would be assured of full opportunity to be heard.

Appeals from decisions of the commission would, pursuant to the Federal Court Act, be to the Appeal Division of the Federal Court. There are grounds for appeal if the commission failed to observe a principle of natural justice or otherwise acted beyond, or refused to exercise, its jurisdiction; if it erred in law in making its decision or order; or if it based its decision or order on an erroneous finding of fact that it made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard for the material before it.

Another new provision which should assist small businessmen is the proposal that anyone injured by a violation of the act would be able to sue for full damages and costs.

I should also mention that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission will be given the jurisdiction to make orders to forbid the implementation in Canada of foreign judgments, laws or directives where it finds them to be contrary to the Canadian public interest. This would include such matters as their effects on Canadian trade and industry. The bill proposes that the Director of the Combines Branch would have authority to bring such situations before the commission, and where the orders are not obeyed this would be grounds for criminal prosecution.

The bill grants the Attorney General of Canada and the provincial attorneys general the power to seek interim injunctions to prevent the repetition or continuation of alleged offences against the act until main issues are settled by the courts.

The bill brings professional sports under the ambit of competition laws with a special prohibition against unreasonable arrangements among member clubs of the same sporting league. However, the courts must take the particular relationships among the clubs of a league or between leagues into account in applying the prohibition.

Finally, the bill would allow the Director of Investigation and Research to appear before federal regulatory boards and commissions where matters relating to competition are in issue.

I hope I have in broad and brief terms outlined the provisions of the new sections and the main purposes of Bill C-2. As already stated, following this debate, and if the bill receives second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further study and review.

Honourable senators, I have one last comment to make. At the commencement of the summer break I left in my office, neatly or otherwise arranged, piles of books, papers and what not relating to the various subject matters and committees in which I have an interest. Upon my return those piles of papers were mixed up one with the other, and chaos reigned. Therefore, when I was assigned the task of introducing Bill C-2 I had to turn to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for help.

I should like to express my thanks and appreciation to Mr. T. D. MacDonald, Q.C., who has been working on the bill as a consultant, and Mr. L. A. W. Hunter of the department, for the assistance they gave me. These two gentlemen came to see me on Friday afternoon last, and because I pressed them to give me the necessary material so that I might review it over the weekend and prepare these remarks, they very kindly gave up their Saturday holiday. By 4.30 on Saturday afternoon they had supplied me with all the information and material necessary for me to be able to speak to the Senate today.

Senator Walker: The honourable senator has made a grand speech, but I am wondering if his wife really did throw out all his material.

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, would Senator Cook permit a question? I wonder if he could say whether or not the exemption pertaining to combining for export purposes is being maintained.

Some of our exporters are in a very unfavourable position in the world markets by reason of too strict an application of the principles of the Combines Investigation Act. There are times when it is in the Canadian national interest to combine for export purposes. Is this exemption maintained under the new act?

Senator Cook: I would not like to be absolutely dogmatic, but I think the bill pertains only to the Canadian consumer, and, therefore, an export combine would not come within its ambit.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 23, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Auditor General's report to the Solicitor General on the examination of the accounts and financial statement of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (Dependants) Pension Fund for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 55(4) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, Chapter R-10, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion for Adjournment:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 28, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I would like to give a brief outline of the work schedule for next week. I shall deal first with the committees.

On Monday, there will be a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region. On Tuesday, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet at 2.30 p.m. to consider the Green Paper on Conflict of Interest, and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 8 a.m.

On Wednesday, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has scheduled a meeting for 9.30 a.m. to continue the advance study of Bill C-60, the Bankruptcy Act.

On Thursday, the Special Senate Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber will meet at 10 a.m. The Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region will hold a meeting at 11 a.m., and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 3.30 p.m.

In the Senate, we will continue with the second reading of Bill C-2, the Combines Investigation Act, and proceed with the debate on the White Paper entitled "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action", as well as other items on the Order Paper. In addition, we can expect that at least one bill will reach us from the other place before Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ADJUSTMENT PAYMENTS TO GRAIN PRODUCERS—QUESTION

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, I have certain questions that I wish to ask the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. By way of preface, I should point out that there is an adjustment payment owing by the Canadian Wheat Board to producers who have delivered wheat, oats, barley and Durum wheat to date in the 1975-76 crop year which began on August 1, 1975. My questions are as follows:

1. What is the amount that will be paid for each of the grains?
2. When will the cheques be available for distribution?
3. If there is no mail delivery due to the postal strike, when the cheques are available is there any provision made to have the cheques distributed other than by mail?
4. Is a producer or representative of that producer allowed to pick up a cheque when ready at the office of the Canadian Wheat Board in Winnipeg?
5. Would it be possible to have this chamber informed when the cheques are ready for distribution and what provision will be made for delivery of those cheques?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, first of all I should like to thank Senator Sparrow for having given me prior notice of his detailed and important question. As a result of his notice, I have been able to obtain most of the information he seeks. The answers are as follow:

1. Amount of adjustment payment for each of the grains is as follows: Wheat, $1.50 per bushel; Oats, $0.10 per bushel; Barley, $0.30 per bushel; Durum, $2.00 per bushel.
2. Cheques will be available in about a month.
3. Because cheques will not be available for a month, no arrangements have yet been made for distribution if there is no postal delivery.
4. Only with sufficient identification—payment book and driver's licence or birth certificate.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE (TOTAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator O'Leary, for the second reading of the Bill S-23, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code (total abolition of capital punishment)".—(Honourable Senator Prowse).

Senator Prowse: Stand.

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, if this item is standing, and since Order No. 3 is in somewhat similar terms, is it not now purely an academic exercise to discuss these matters since we have been told by Mr. Allmand that he intends to present a bill to bring about total abolition of capital punishment? Could it not be considered as a matter of just filling time to discuss these items?

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, may I volunteer a statement on these two orders? It is my understanding that legislation will be introduced in the other place some time in the middle of November in connection with this subject, and this would certainly affect the two orders which we have at the present time on the Order Paper for this chamber. I might suggest that we stand these orders for a period of, let us say, a month, and in that way they will not of necessity have to appear on the Order Paper day after day. I make this suggestion in the hope that it will be agreeable to honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: It all depends. Order No. 2 stands adjourned in the name of Senator Prowse, and any motion to adjourn this debate for one month should be made by him. If he suggests that this course be followed, I am willing to do so with respect to Order No. 3, which stands adjourned in my name.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I would move that Order No. 2 be set over until November 29, or some suitable date around that time.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I move that Order No. 3 stand until Tuesday, November 25, if that is agreeable.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that Orders Nos. 2 and 3 stand until Wednesday, November 26?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

● (1410)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to initiate discussion in the Senate on the White Paper which has been prepared and presented by the government, entitled "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action." This policy statement was tabled in this chamber on Tuesday, and in the other place on October 14. Honourable senators will recall Thanksgiving evening, when the Prime Minister addressed the nation on the problem of inflation. He pointed out in that notable address that Canada is in the grip of very serious inflation—

Senator Flynn: That was news!

Senator Perrault: —a fact, I believe, known to most Canadians. The White Paper in its introduction states:

If this inflation continues or gets worse there is a grave danger that economic recovery will be stifled, unemployment increased and the nation subjected to mounting stresses and strains.

It has thus become absolutely essential to undertake a concerted national effort to bring inflation under control.

[Translation]

Of all evils that afflict our society, inflation is now without doubt the most intolerable and the most insidious.

It is the most intolerable because, more than any other, it exacerbates social injustices by attacking first of all the weakest and the poorest of our citizens, those who live on fixed incomes, those who see their life savings melt like butter in a saucepan; finally, those who are not in a position to protect their purchasing power because they are in no way able to unite to defend their rights to an adequate income.

It is also the most insidious evil because we tend to consider inflation as a fatality against which we are helpless, except to save our own skin by sacrificing our neighbour's.

[English]

We are still in the first week of the government's anti-inflation policy program, but I suggest that we are moving quickly.

Senator Flynn: Who is moving quickly?

Senator Perrault: I understand that this afternoon progress has been made with the ministers of finance of the various provinces. Shortly before I entered the chamber I was informed that a broad consensus has been achieved with respect to the provinces.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: That is certainly a most encouraging development for this nation, because inflation is no respecter of political labels or parties. It affects mostly those unable to protect themselves—those on fixed incomes; those senior citizens who earned a dollar when a dollar was worth a dollar and who now find every day that their example of prudence and good citizenship is being translated into an ever-diminishing purchasing power.

Senator Flynn: Who said that before you?

Senator Perrault: In terms of the 1946 dollar, today's dollar is worth 38 cents. If in 1975 we do not act together as Canadians regardless of party, the 1946 dollar will be worth precisely nine cents 10 years from now.

It seems to me that when we are experiencing this kind of trend, it affects not only the purchasing power but also the very fabric of society. It has a demoralizing effect, especially on the majority of those who pay their taxes and are law-abiding. There are good people in our communities, wherever we may live. Inflation which goes uncorrected affects our very social system.

This is a time when Canadians in every walk of life are asking questions about the policy, and how that policy will affect them in their lives and work. The details legislation will be in this chamber in due course, depending on the number of questions asked by the Opposition and Government members in committee in the other place. We shall then have an opportunity of studying the bill.

I shall attempt, in my brief remarks, to describe some of the main themes and purposes of the White Paper now under discussion.

Since the benefits of restraint are long-term and the economic effects of non-restraint are relatively complicated, the government feels that, first of all, Canadians must take a crash course in the economic facts of life, and, more specifically, that we have to do our best to understand not just the new policy but also the nature of the economic conditions which have brought that policy into being.

Part of the task has to be an attempt to dispel myths and misconceptions about inflation and its origins. It is important above all to understand the potential of individuals to affect the issue and to comprehend the extent of the government's capacity to control some of those limits spelled out in the White Paper, which all of us have read.

Inflation, of course, is the result of not just one but many scattered and converging forces. Not all, or even nearly all, originate in Canada. Not all are within the capacity of the Government of Canada, or, indeed, the capacity of the individual provincial and municipal governments, to control by decree. Those critics who suggest that inflation is a domestic phenomenon which is within the capacity of any government to control are doing no service to the country at the present time by perpetuating that belief. That is economic and illogical mischief.

Senator Flynn: Who said that?

Senator Perrault: Some of the hurricane force of inflation in our time was originally generated by decisions and actions taken by sovereign governments in other areas of the world, the raising of energy costs by the OPEC nations, for example, being one which produced spectacular economic effects around the world. Certainly the OPEC action affected Canada.

● (1420)

But there are other causes of inflation, including that of having to live in a finite, increasingly crowded world, and the absence of matching growth and productivity. The pressures of population and income growth have meant real scarcities—scarcities which translate into higher prices at many points from the commodity markets to the retail cash registers.

There are other influences which we can truthfully define as beyond our control now—that amount of inflation, for instance, resulting from earlier errors made in the human story. The piper must be paid for various kinds of neglect, and I cite as examples here the neglect of our environment and the reckless waste of resources.

Having accepted the reality that some of the forces are not immediately manageable, we should also recognize that some of the sources are controllable; that in many respects we are in command of our destinies. One of the most prominent of these alterable factors is that of human attitude itself. There is a portion of inflation which traces its origin, not to bad weather, crop failure, or foreign price hikes—we often cite these as some of the main reasons—but to the human mind, the inflationary psychology. There has been a substantial change in that human psychology in the past 12 or 14 months.

Senator Flynn: Since July 1974, do you mean?

Senator Perrault: Prior to the elections of 1972 and 1974. We could easily point to the drought in North Africa, the floods in the Soviet Union, and commodity scarcities throughout the world, and say that Canada, as a very major exporting and importing nation, could not be unaffected by price escalations caused by shortages.

In recent months we have seen the phenomenon—and I think we must all admit this—of people wanting not only a catch-up in their wage packets to keep pace with the cost of living, but also a buffer against what they presume will be a disastrous inflation rate continuing into the future; they want protection against that possibility. This is where the psychological factor is of such critical importance at the present time, and why it has assumed such major dimensions in recent months. When workers in any sector of the economy ask for 75 per cent increases, 50 per cent increases, or 30 per cent increases, without any reference whatsoever to productivity, the gross national product, or the inflation rate, it simply means that governments must act. Such demands indicate that we are on a disaster course, and I think we must all agree on that. It is not merely a matter of wage earners, hourly paid workers, asking too much; there are sins of omission and commission in other parts of the economy.

Economic well-being is ultimately the product of certain human qualities, the most important of which is confidence. I think it was President Roosevelt who, in the depth of the great depression, told his countrymen, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself." That was in the Inauguration Address, I think, of 1932. At that moment in history, the economic manifestation of fear was inertia, a seizing up of the economic machine, and a descending spiral of economic vitality towards zero. In our time, the problem is not paralysis, as it was then, but runaway prices and a shrinking of the buying power of money. Here, too, fear is implicated—the old bogies of pessimism and apprehension, and decisions framed in these moods.

We have undergone, in a sense, a sort of revolution of apocalyptic expectations about the future. Shocked by dramatic price increases, powerful elements of society in Canada and elsewhere reacted, not only to the real and current problems but to the dire predictions of the gloomiest soothsayers. This response had its most serious initial effects in the actions of the largest and most powerful groups in our society, the largest companies and the powerful unions—the most powerful sectors in the economy—and the effect was transmitted, eventually, to all sectors.

To put it simply, here, as in many other countries, the response seems to have been a self-defeating overkill. As one escalation followed the other, at a tempo and on a scale unmatched in living memory, the basis for confident planning and for reasonable restraint was removed. Society set out not only to catch up with the runaway horse but to leave it far behind. It has been, as I feel sure honourable senators will agree, most futile as an exercise, for these increases, unaccompanied by sufficient increase in productivity, have done nothing to improve our economic well being.

In the process of trying to inflate ourselves out of inflation, we set the stage for real hardship. The gap between real productivity and money income has only widened, yet the illusion continues that if we speed up the printing presses and get more money out, and obtain higher wages, that is really the important thing when, after all, purchasing power is the only thing that really matters.

Senator Flynn: Social Credit.

Senator Perrault: The hot pursuit of prices by earnings leads not to a finish line, but to a circular unending course. Despite the mesmerizing quality of the figures—the double-digit measurements and the massive mark-ups—the chase has proved to be futile and self-destructive. In the wider context of international trade, this stampede psychology means we will eventually price ourselves out of the market, and Canada lives or dies by trade.

We cannot have wage settlements in the forest industry of British Columbia, for example, which are now markedly higher than settlements in Washington and Oregon, and still compete for the same pulp and paper markets around the world.

The factor of human motivation, the assurances of reward, has been fundamental to the operation of our economic system. The expectation that toil and enterprise will be enriching has been, without doubt, the extra ingredient which has made North American agriculture one of the best hopes of an overcrowded, hungry world. This aspiration of a better life in all aspects is the dynamo of Canadian progress.

So, the specifications for the anti-inflation machinery that can do the job must include the preservation of the drive to produce—incentives for people in Canada to increase productivity to increase the gross national product, because social advances are only funded by productivity.

We must construct a set of delicate brakes without damaging the motor. To respond to inflation, the government is in the process of designing a system that will make the necessary adjustments with the minimum amount of inhibition of our economic vigour.

In practical terms, this means that we do not attempt to impose restraints on the economy by the application of guidelines or restraints of other kinds to every last workshop and office. It means that we focus on the largest and most powerful elements, the prime centres of economic influence—big government, big business and big labour. The point of impact will thus be relatively localized. The policy will take hold at the top, curbing excess, creating gradually but surely the climate for restraint in these sectors of the economy. The government expects that these healthy influences, not overnight but in a reasonable period of time, will permeate the economy.

As the White Paper points out, the selected number of powerful groups comprise the following: the federal government and all of its employees; the 1,500 largest companies in Canada, including every company in the construction industry with more than 20 employees; all employees of these companies; all professional people—for example, physicians, dentists, lawyers, accountants, engineers, and, yes, the politicians; they are within the guidelines as well, as indeed they should be.

[Senator Perrault.]

These will be immediate objects of attention, but other sectors will—

Senator Phillips: And deputy ministers?

Senator Perrault: Yes, the deputy ministers, too. As I say, these will be the immediate objects of attention, but other sectors will be expected to observe the guidelines.

It is obvious that the setting and enforcement of guidelines for prices and profits will be a much more complex job than the setting of guidelines for individual incomes. Because of this we will have to apply a greater proportion of our effort to price control than to wage control.

I assure you, on behalf of the government, that it is our intention that all bases will be covered—employers and employed; wage-payers and wage-earners; government and non-government. Compliance will be monitored. Violators will be penalized.

It is not the intention of the government, however, to hire a whole host, an army of gumshoes, to prod and probe into every section of Canada and to lean over every shoulder. The emphasis is on achieving as much voluntary restraint as is possible, given the nature of the problem which we face.

On this matter of price and profit guidelines, let me say that the philosophy here is identical to that applied to wages. In general, the purpose is to check all contributions to the inflationary firestorm, but we want to do so without removing the incentive for productivity, individual and corporate. I have met many groups in the past week, and the first question asked has been, "Does this mean that I cannot improve my position beyond $2,400 a year?" The answer is, "Yes, you can, if you get out and produce more, and can prove that you are producing more and are contributing to the economy of this country by working harder." Anybody can make more than his established guidelines, if he achieves a greater degree of productivity.

As I said, all bases will be covered, compliance will be monitored and violators will be penalized. When the bill comes to this chamber, I am sure all honourable senators will find the penalty sections of interest.

The guidelines will prevent a firm from increasing prices by more than it increases its costs. The intent is to prevent inflationary, panic-button, opportunistic increases. What we are saying is that business must restrict its profit per unit, whether that unit is a ballpoint pen or a bulldozer, to no more than the average unit profit it had been experiencing in the immediate past. The result will be a narrowing of percentage net profit margins before taxes as costs increase.

The guidelines have been shaped so that they do not cripple the fledgling or fragile industry. They apply to firms with more than 500 employees, except in the case of construction firms for which the inclusion figure is to be 20 employees. The guidelines will cover the federal government, its crown corporations and its agencies. They will also embrace participating provincial governments and, as I have said, professional groups.

I want to repeat that the talks in the past two days between the government and the ministers of finance of the various provinces have been constructive and productive. We will need the help of provincial governments in making these guidelines work. Indeed, in many key aspects the guidelines literally cannot be applied without provincial cooperation. The provinces, for instance, have constitutional responsibility for rental and professional fees. Talks with provincial premiers indicate that we share an appreciation of the urgency of the situation, and of the need to work together to deal with it.

Perhaps a special word should be said to the professional community covered by the guidelines. In the case of the professional community the objective is to get in the way of inflation, but not to get in the way of productivity. The guidelines seek to prevent professionals from raising their fees above prescribed limits, but they do not penalize extra productivity. A professional can earn more by increasing effort. This is the essence of the guideline philosophy right across the board. It applies with equal force to wage guidelines.

As honourable senators are possibly aware, the initial ceiling on wage increases has been set at 10 per cent. Eight of these allowable 10 percentage points of income growth constitute an inflation shield for the income-earner. The shield will be about 6 per cent in the second year, and 4 per cent in the third. They are to make up for ground lost as measured by the cost-price index which has been rising at an average rate of 8 per cent over the past two years. The additional 2 per cent is the individual Canadian's share in Canada's increased productivity. This, measured over the long term, has been growing at an annual rate of 2 per cent.

To freeze all wage-earners in their relative positions as of October 14, when the guideline policy came into effect, would be, in the view of the government, unjust. At that date some people were ahead of the game; some were far behind. Many were beneficiaries of wage settlements which had won them increases in excess of the increase in the actual cost of living; many others had not been so fortunate. So the guidelines have a plus and minus factor built into them. For the gainers of the past two years that figure of 10 per cent can be lowered to a maximum of 2 percentage points. For those who had fallen behind there can be a maximum pickup of 2 percentage points, for a total maximum increase of 12 per cent. In a sense this is a catch-up clause.

It has also been kept in mind that percentage systems can, if used unintelligently, be unjust. The guideline percentage rules do not apply to increases of $600 or under. A $600 increase, regardless of what percentage value it represents, is within the guidelines.

Senator Asselin: Will this be changed?

Senator Perrault: The question has been asked, "Will this be changed?" I want to say, as has been said by other spokesmen for the government, that the government is open to useful and constructive ideas on this point and others. There have been suggestions received from many quarters to the effect that the $600 basic should be increased. That matter is now being studied by the government.

On the other hand, no one in any income bracket will be permitted an annual increase of more than $2,400. This would apply even in cases where $2,400 represents considerably less than 10 per cent, or even 5 per cent, of annual income. There again the ideas of honourable senators on these maximums and minimums will be very much welcomed during the course of the discussion on the White Paper. The ideas presented in this house will certainly be brought to the attention of those in government responsible for reshaping parts of this program.

No discussion or contemplation of problems of inflation could be considered adequate without consideration of the housing needs of Canadians. I want to announce to the Senate that the government plans major initiatives to increase the supply of housing, and to bring that increased supply within the reach of Canadians of moderate income. These measures will be announced shortly. In all the measures which are being taken, the government has proceeded on the basis that the intention must be applied with a light touch and for as short a period as practical—no less than is needed to do the job, but no longer either.

While there is a formal period established for this program—that is, until December 31, 1978—I want to assert that the government will endeavour to bring it to a termination just as quickly as possible, and as soon as the problem has been brought satisfactorily under control.

● (1440)

During its lifespan the Anti-Inflation Board will operate to the limit as a fast-moving and flexible organization. Procedures will be devised to make it into what has been described as a catalytic agency. The ability to work quickly is recognized as an essential characteristic. The restoration of confidence and the removal of uncertainty are the objectives, and uncertainty cannot be banished if decisions are left hanging.

The question inevitably is asked, "Is it going to work?" Well, of course, there are prophets of doom in our society who say that nothing is going to work, and that we must let inflation run its course because any interference in the marketplace is doomed to disaster.

Many people say that we are administering a very rough form of justice in trying to bring in at least a degree of leadership and of regulation, and to institute guidelines of this kind. They may describe it as a rough form of justice, but the rough injustice of inflation in recent months has been intolerable for the Canadian people, especially those on low incomes. What we have to strive to do in the next few days is consider all of the good ideas that are coming from various sections of Canada and from the political parties, remove the inequities in so far as is humanly possible, and make this an equitable program. In order to succeed this program must be seen to be just, and it must be just in so far as it is possible for us to construct a just law.

I believe, and I think most of us believe, that among Canadians there is a basic sense of fairness with respect to sharing the resources of our community. Every one, whatever his income level or whatever his occupation, will recognize that we have a responsibility for restraining our demands on the economy. Those at the lower end of the income scale are in the least powerful position to pose demands of a major type on the economy, and they are in a very difficult position from the standpoint of protecting their incomes in light of the inflation we have been experiencing. Therefore, what we are proposing to do by this particular White Paper, and the bill which will follow it, is go after the major concentrations of power—that is, those sections of the economy with big clout, and all of those groups which have been seeking to draw from the economy more than would be reasonable in relation to the demands of the whole.

If there are demands of this kind, the Anti-Inflation Board can seek to persuade those who are making the demands to moderate them, and seek to persuade them that if they do not do so the course of the law will have to be followed. In extreme cases, if there were still a refusal, there would be resort to other measures. The basic fact that has to be recognized—basic for the person for whom we have responsibility, namely, the little fellow at the lower end of the income scale—is that if the kind of people with clout, in order to get more, always seek high wage settlements and price increases, the less there will be available for the Canadian of modest income.

We feel we have to seek this power to protect that particular group, which also includes retired persons, those on fixed incomes, and those who have jobs but are not organized. In other words, those at the lower end of the income scale are not, contrary to what has been said in some circles, the victims of this particular bill. They are the principal beneficiaries of the program, and as it unfolds in the days and weeks to come this will become obvious without any possibility of contradiction.

I think there is a philosophical aspect to this program upon which we are embarked. I was in Russia last month, and for me it was a voyage of discovery upon which I intend to report to this chamber in more detail later. In speaking with representatives of the government of the Soviet Union I found they had a deep interest in the economy of North America. Our reception as a Canadian delegation was a magnificent one, but I remember one notable conversation in the course of which a member of the Presidium, with a great smile on his face, stated, "We want peaceful competition. Very frankly, we have a better economic system than you, and I think we can prove it."

There is something pretty fundamental about the challenge facing this country and North America, and the Western World in general, today. There are nations in the West which are almost on the brink of dictatorship, and an overthrow of their democratic systems, because they have permitted their economies to get out of control. You know them and I know them. There has to be a determination on the part of the Canadian people and those who lead public opinion—people in this chamber and the other house, and those who serve at other levels of government—that we are not going to permit this kind of thing to happen in our society; that we are going to make our system of government, our free enterprise economic system and our parliamentary democracy, work. This is a pretty fundamental consideration.

All too often these days we hear speeches the titles of which contain such questions as, "Is democracy governable?", and "Can capitalism survive?" Ten years ago such questions would never have been raised. Today they are one of the reasons why the government has introduced a policy of price and wage restraint. They are a measure of the doubt that exists in a social system threatened by world inflation—the most widespread major inflation in world history.

We live in a country where we take freedom for granted. It is one of the richest countries in the world. It is a country with the resources to solve every problem but one—that of inflation—which really is not one problem but a complex of problems summed up in one dilemma: How do we control the energy of freedom before there is no freedom left to control? Other nations are now asking themselves this same question.

A free society functions on belief in equality and justice, on support of law and order, on willingness to put the public interest first and last, but far from least, on faith that it will function. Today, however, the system is being racked by extremes of violence and apathy, spawning cynicism, illegality, disorder, self-interest and doubt.

Our Canadian society is not exempt from these troubles. It is in a state of ferment. Everyone wants more rights. This translates, in almost every case, into demands on governments. There are demands by students to decide how they should be educated; demands by consumer groups to restrict the power of corporations; demands by environmentalists, minorities, women's groups and all sorts of other groups; and there are demands for subsidies, loans, tax concessions, and welfare of all kinds. These are all legitimate demands, but they add up to insistence on more money being handed out at a time when the economy is giving us less. Perhaps we have been saying yes too often. The government is not exempt from this either, and everyone knows it.

Every group knows that to take more means less for others, yet everyone acts as though restraint should be practised by someone else. Already we are seeing representations being made to the Anti-Inflation Board by some of the most powerful groups in the country saying, because of the nature of their work and the importance of the position they occupy in society, that they should be exempted. But they also say, "We want to congratulate you for the policy of restraint you are imposing on the nation." These representations are pouring in.

As I say, it seems that everyone believes that restraint should be practised by someone else. I think we have to agree, at this particular time in our history, that restraint has to be practised right in this chamber and in the other place, and then we can perhaps go on from there and see everyone practise it.

Our system depends on restraint. Its energy needs to be checked. All machines have limits, and when these are exceeded the machines self-destruct. Freedom and restraint are opposite sides of the same coin, but lately freedom seems like a coin with one badly worn side. Bit by bit our restraints are wearing away.

Inflation is a symptom of lack of restraint. It is a symptom of an underlying illness. It is, however, more than a symptom; it is like cancer, where the cells flout the rules that govern the health of the organism. It begins as a symptom but it ends as a cause.

● (1450)

The setting of these guidelines is only one part of our fight against inflation. Time does not permit me to discuss the fiscal and monetary policies that are being undertaken to ensure that economic growth and the progressive slowing of inflation are kept in phase. There will be some cynics, I am sure, in parts of the house, but I can only say that we will curb federal spending by holding down Public Service employment and reducing the federal payroll in most departments in the year ahead. The guideline of 1.5 per cent has been established for those employees on the federal payroll, and I may say that a number of these employees will be associated with this program while others will be associated with the anti-crime program which will be announced very shortly.

[Translation]

If we refuse to yield to the inflation psychosis, if we submit willingly to the rules set out by the government without playing the game of cynics who suggest that the small always end up paying for the big, in short, if we all decide individually and collectively to stop living beyond our means, then we will have made an enormous step in the right direction. And Canada will be back on the road to economic health and social peace, both based on a fairer participation of all in the national wealth of this country.

[English]

Before closing let me say that the imposition of restraint by government is, we hope, a temporary intervention. The Anti-Inflation Board is not intended to be a permanent feature of Canadian life. It is not in the interest of Canadians that it should be. A lingering presence of this kind would be an admission that we had assigned the responsibility for restraint to government. But government in a free society should not, and cannot, be expected to do this job alone. What the new measures will provide is, we hope, a breathing spell, a change of course away from certain disaster, a rebuilding of the basis for confidence, and the re-creation of a climate for a rewarding and productive society. I think all of us can feel confident that Canadians in all parts of this country are going to cooperate to make this program a success.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in his opening remarks indicated that a substantial consensus had been reached between the federal government and provincial ministers of finance. I understand that at the same time the provincial ministers of labour were also engaged in talks with the federal Department of Labour. Can we take it that a comparable consensus prevails in the field of labour as in the field of finance?

Senator Perrault: At this time, honourable senators, I can only report that a substantial consensus has been developed in the conversations with provincial ministers of finance. That is not to say that there is absolute agreement or absolute assent on all points. Indeed, a number of good suggestions have been received from the provincial ministers, and these are now being considered as possible amendments to the general program.

There have been a number of conversations with trade union leaders across Canada, and in due course we are hopeful of having the cooperation of that sector, which, of course, will be quite important.

Senator Manning: Perhaps I did not make quite clear the point I was concerned about. I understand that there was a meeting with the provincial ministers of labour. I can appreciate that there were other discussions with heads of labour organizations, but it seems to me to be tremendously important, in view of the announced resistance to the program by a number of major labour unions, that the federal government should have the cooperation of the provincial departments of labour. My question was: Has there been a consensus in that field?

Senator Perrault: I agree with the honourable senator that a consensus among provincial ministers of labour would be very useful. However, I am not yet in a position to report progress in that area. I shall undertake to obtain the information should it become available.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? In his remarks he stated that the dollar had declined since 1946 to a value of 38 cents. I wonder if he could give us the amount of that decline since 1970-71.

Senator Perrault: I am unable to give that figure, but I can undertake to attempt to obtain that information for the honourable senator. I do not have it with me now.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

HONOURABLE NORMAN A. MacKENZIE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to welcome a distinguished visitor in the Senate gallery this afternoon, the former Senator Norman MacKenzie. I extend to him our best wishes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I also pay a brief tribute to the Honourable Norman MacKenzie. Not only is he a distinguished former member of this chamber, but he was a professor of mine when I was studying international law in university. I am delighted that he is in the gallery this afternoon. He is a great Canadian, who richly deserves the award from the Institute of International Jurists which he is to receive this evening. We are delighted to have him here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 28, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 28, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Lachance had been substituted for that of Mr. Daudlin, that the name of Mr. Daudlin had been substituted for that of Mr. Guay (St. Boniface), that the name of Mr. Orlikow had been substituted for that of Mr. Brewin, and that the name of Mr. Stollery had been substituted for that of Mr. Lachance on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS SUPERANNUATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-23, to provide for the payment of superannuation benefits to Lieutenant Governors.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Customs Convention on the International Transport of Goods under cover of TIR Carnets (with Protocol of Signature) (Amended text). Done at Geneva, January 15, 1975. Entered into force January 7, 1960. Canada's Instrument of Accession deposited November 26, 1974. Entered into force for Canada February 24, 1975.

Copies of Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects. Done at London, Moscow and Washington, March 29, 1972. In force September 1, 1972. Canada's Instrument of Accession deposited February 20, 1975. In force for Canada February 20, 1975.

Copies of Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) Weapons and their Destruction. Done at London, Moscow and Washington, April 10, 1972. Canada's Instruments of Ratification deposited at London, Moscow and Washington, September 18, 1972. Entered into force March 26, 1975.

Copies of General Agreement on Technical Cooperation between the Government of Canada and the Government of Colombia. Done at Bogota, November 17, 1972. Entered into force December 12, 1974.

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America for promotion of safety on the Great Lakes by means of radio. Done at Ottawa, February 26, 1973. Instruments of Ratification exchanged at Washington, May 6, 1974. Entered into force May 6, 1975.

Copies of Protocol relating to Refugee Seamen. Done at The Hague, June 12, 1973. Canada's Instrument of Acceptance deposited January 9, 1975. In force for Canada February 10, 1975.

Copies of Agreement on the Garp Atlantic Tropical Experiment (GATE) between the World Meteorological Organization, the Government of the Republic of Senegal and other Member States of the WMO participating in the experiment with related Protocol of execution. Agreement done at Geneva, June 27, 1973. Protocol done at Geneva, December 28, 1973. Agreement entered into force June 27, 1973. Protocol entered into force December 28, 1973. Agreement and Protocol entered into force for Canada June 18, 1974.

Copies of Air Transport Agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany. Ottawa, March 26, 1973. In force provisionally March 26, 1973. In force definitively February 18, 1975.

Copies of Agreement between Canada and the Kingdom of Denmark respecting Boundary Waters. Ottawa, December 17, 1973. Instruments of Ratification exchanged at Copenhagen, March 13, 1974. In force March 13, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Governments of Canada and the Republic of Nicaragua to provide for the exchange of Third Party Communications between amateur radio stations of Canada and Nicaragua. San José, Costa Rica and Managua, Nicaragua, August 29 and December 20, 1973. In force January 19, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany concerning the training of Bundeswehr units in Canada (CFB Shilo). Ottawa, January 23, 1974. In force January 23, 1974. With effect from January 1, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Trinidad and Tobago, constituting an Agreement relating to Canadian investments in Trinidad and Tobago insured by the Government of Canada through its agent, the Export Development Corporation. Port of Spain, February 8, 1974. In force February 8, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Governments of Canada and Honduras, constituting a reciprocal amateur radio operating Agreement. San José, Costa Rica and Tegucigalpa, Honduras, November 20, 1973 and February 27, 1974. In force March 14, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Governments of Canada and Guyana, constituting an Agreement to provide for the exchange of Third Party Communications between amateur radio stations of Canada and Guyana. Georgetown, December 11, 1973 and February 26, 1974. In force March 28, 1974.

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of France concerning Films and Film-Productions. Done at Ottawa, May 8, 1974. In force June 7, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Republic of Senegal, constituting an Agreement concerning the applicability to Canada of GARP, and related Protocol of Execution. Dakar, May 3 and June 18, 1974. Entered into force June 18, 1974.

Copies of Development Co-operation Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Republic of Honduras. Done at Tegucigalpa, D.C., September 3, 1974. Instruments of Ratification exchanged at Tegucigalpa, February 18, 1975. Entered into force February 18, 1975.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Barbados, constituting an Interim Air Transport Agreement. Bridgetown, November 20, 1974. In force November 20, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Governments of Canada and the United States of America, extending until June 30, 1976 the Project Skylab Agreement. Ottawa, September 30 and November 26, 1974. In force November 26, 1974.

Copies of Trade Agreement between the Governments of Canada and the Republic of Afghanistan. Kabul, November 27, 1974. In force December 27, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America, extending until June 30, 1977 the Agreement concerning the operation of Mobile Seismic Observatories (Project Vela Uniform). Ottawa, August 14 and December 19, 1974. Entered into force December 19, 1974. With effect from July 1, 1974.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Governments of Canada and the United Republic of Tanzania, concerning liability for damages in connection with a Programme for Flight Training in Canada of Pilots of the Tanzania People's Defence Force. Ottawa, December 19, 1974 and January 2, 1975. In force January 2, 1975.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Governments of Canada and the U.S.S.R. extending and amending the Agreement on Co-operation in Fisheries in the Northeastern Pacific Ocean off the coast of Canada signed January 22, 1971, as amended. Moscow, January 24, 1975. In force February 19, 1975.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Governments of Canada and the U.S.S.R. extending the Agreement on Provisional Rules of Navigation and Fisheries Safety in the Northeastern Pacific Ocean off the coast of Canada signed January 22, 1971. Moscow, January 24, 1975. In force April 15, 1975.

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Kingdom of Sweden concerning Defence Research, Development and Production (with Memorandum of Understanding). Done at Ottawa, February 3, 1975. Entered into force February 3, 1975.

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Revolutionary Government of the Republic of Cuba, establishing a Development Line of Credit for Cuba (with Memorandum of Understanding). Done at Havana, March 18, 1975. Entered into force March 18, 1975.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America, extending the Agreement concerning Joint Participation in the Augmentor Wing Flight Test Project of November 10, 1970. Ottawa, December 5, 1974 and March 24, 1975. Entered into force March 24, 1975.

Copies of Agreement between Canada and the United States of America relating to the exchange of information on Weather Modification Activities. Washington, March 26, 1975. In force March 26, 1975.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Norway, amending the Agreement of July 15, 1971 concerning the conservation of seal stocks in the Northwest Atlantic. Ottawa, April 18 and 23, 1975. Entered into force April 23, 1975. With effect from March 15, 1975.

Copies of Notes exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America, extending to April 24, 1976 the Agreement on Reciprocal Fishing Privileges in certain areas off their coasts signed June 15, 1973. Ottawa, April 24, 1975. Entered into force April 24, 1975.

Copies of Development Co-operation Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Jamaica. Done at Kingston, Jamaica, May 5, 1975. Entered into force May 5, 1975.

Copies of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Republic of Ghana, concerning the training in Canada of Personnel of the Armed Forces of Ghana. Accra, May 13, 1975. In force May 13, 1975.

Copies of Treaty on Extradition between Canada and the United States of America as amended by an exchange of Notes constituting a Treaty. Washington, December 3, 1971 and June 28 and July 9, 1974, respectively.

Report of the International Development Research Centre, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 22 of the International Development Research Centre Act, Chapter 21 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the activities of the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) for the fiscal year 1974-75, pursuant to section 3 of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations Act, Chapter F-26, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Roosevelt Campobello International Park Commission, together with its financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 7 of the Roosevelt Campobello International Park Commission Act, Chapter 19, Statutes of Canada, 1964-65.

Report on the administration of the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 17 of the said Act, Chapter I-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of operations under the Foreign Investment Review Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 30 of the said Act, Chapter 46, Statutes of Canada, 1973-74.

Report of the National Museums of Canada, including accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 22 of the National Museums Act, Chapter N-12, R.S.C., 1970.

PRIVATE BILL

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA—FIRST READING

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) presented Bill S-30, to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada.

Bill read first time.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Senator Stanbury, on behalf of Senator Riel, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Immigration Policy, presented the following report:

[Translation]

Tuesday, October 28, 1975.

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Immigration Policy has the honour to present its second report as follows:

On March 3, 1975, and March 5, 1975, the House of Commons and the Senate, respectively, adopted a joint resolution which empowered your committee to consider the Green Paper on Immigration Policy tabled by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in the House of Commons on February 3, 1975, and tabled by the Leader of the Government in the Senate on February 4, 1975.

[Senator Perrault.]

Your committee is of the opinion that it will be unable to complete its inquiry within the time prescribed by its Order of Reference as amended on June 4, 1975. Your committee recommends therefore that the date of submission of its report be extended until November 14, 1975.

Respectfully submitted,

Maurice Riel,
Joint Chairman.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(e), I move that this report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, this report might be worthy of a short explanation. The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Immigration Policy is well along in the preparation of its report, but has come to the conclusion that it will need an additional two weeks to complete it. Therefore, the request is made for an extension of the time for submission of the report to November 14, 1975, instead of October 31, 1975.

Senator Flynn: A late report is better than none. Motion agreed to and report adopted.

COMMITTEES

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk on the list of senator serving on the Special Senate Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Smit (Colchester) be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator MacDonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Quart on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (2010)

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Deschatelets be removed from the list of senators serving on the Special Senate Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

An Hon. Senator: Explain.

Senator Deschatelets: I would ask the sponsor of this motion to give the explanation.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, the reason is that Senator Deschatelets is now on two special joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons and time does not permit him to attend the other three committees.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO ARGENTINA AND KOREA—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: I have a question for the Leader of the Government, which he may prefer to take as notice, although in view of his encyclopaedic knowledge of public affairs I have some hope that he may be able to answer it immediately.

What is the present state of negotiations with Argentina, in the first place, and the Republic of Korea, in the second, in the matter of sales of CANDU reactors to those countries?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the reply to that question is not immediately in my encyclopaedia. I must take it as notice.

Senator Flynn: Surprising.

PRIVATE BILL

EASTERN CANADA SAVINGS AND LOAN COMPANY AND CENTRAL & NOVA SCOTIA TRUST COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Augustus Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill S-29, to enable The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company and Central & Nova Scotia Trust Company to amalgamate.

He said: Honourable senators, before speaking to this bill, perhaps you will allow me a moment, as a relatively new member of this august body, to say how delighted I am to welcome our newest senator who comes from my province, Nova Scotia—Senator G. I. Smith. I know there will be many others who will dwell with eloquence on his long career in both public and private life, and on his many accomplishments, but none will be more sincere in saying that the addition of Senator Smith to this chamber is a most fitting recognition of his demonstrated abilities as soldier, lawyer, politician and citizen of his native province. I extend to him a most hearty welcome.

Honourable senators, the bill before you concerns two well-known financial institutions in the Atlantic provinces, of relatively the same size in assets under administration and shareholders' equity and earnings. One carries on business as a loan company, the other as a trust company. I should like to give the house a short resumé of each company.

The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company was established in 1887 and was incorporated under a special act of Parliament in 1914. It is a loan company subject to the Loan Companies Act. It maintains a head office in Halifax and 11 branches throughout the Atlantic provinces. Its shares are listed on the Toronto and Montreal stock exchanges.

The following information was compiled as of December 31, 1974: Assets, $368,817,000; shareholders' equity, $18,293,000; net income for 1974, $2,185,000; number of shareholders, 2,213; number of employees, 152; percentage of shares held by residents of Canada, 98.3.

The Central & Nova Scotia Trust Company was formed under the Trust Companies Act on January 1, 1974, by the amalgamation of The Central Trust Company of Canada and The Nova Scotia Trust Company. The trust company maintains a head office in Halifax, and an executive office in Moncton. In addition, it has 23 branches throughout the Atlantic provinces. Its shares are not listed on a stock exchange, but are actively traded over the counter.

The following information respecting this company was compiled as of December 31, 1974: Assets, $378,727,306; shareholders' equity, $19,096,090; net income for 1974, $1,860,087; number of shareholders, 1,008; number of employees, including real estate agents, 447; percentage of shares held by residents of Canada, 99.8.

In other words, both companies are of approximately the same size, and they operate in the Atlantic region. For some time, talks of amalgamation have taken place. However, there is an anomaly in that there is no readily available machinery for the amalgamation of a trust company and a loan company.

The Loan Companies Act permits the amalgamation of two loan companies; the Trust Companies Act permits the amalgamation of two trust companies. Neither act permits the amalgamation of a loan company and a trust company. If the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company and Central & Nova Scotia Trust Company are to amalgamate, a private act of Parliament is required. These circumstances are set out in the preamble to the bill.

The provisions of the bill may be summarized as follows:

1. The bill permits the amalgamation of the two companies but does not require them to amalgamate—that is, it is permissive, and not mandatory.

2. If the two companies are to amalgamate, they must enter into an amalgamation agreement. For the purposes of the agreement Eastern is to be considered a trust company. The agreement must set out all of those matters which the Trust Companies Act requires two trust companies to agree upon if they enter into an amalgamation agreement.

3. The only major technical difficulty in amalgamating a trust company and a loan company is that a trust company is not permitted to issue debentures. Instead, it issues what are known as guaranteed investment certificates. On the other hand, a loan company may issue debentures but it may not issue guaranteed investment certificates. At the time of amalgamation, if this is decided upon, Eastern will have debentures outstanding and Central & Nova Scotia will have guaranteed investment certificates outstanding. This difficulty is resolved by clause 4 of the bill which provides, in effect, as follows:

(a) the new company will have one guarantee fund;

(b) the liabilities of the guarantee fund will be the guaranteed investment certificates and deposits of Central & Nova Scotia at the time of amalgamation, plus the debentures and deposits of Eastern at the time of amalgamation;

(c) the assets of the guarantee fund will consist of the qualified investments of Central & Nova Scotia Trust at the time of amalgamation, plus qualified investments at least equal to the debentures and other deposits of Eastern at the time of amalgamation.

I understand this procedure has been approved by the Superintendent of Insurance, as well as the Inspector General of Banks.

Some of the advantages which would be achieved by the amalgamation of these two companies are as follows:

(1) Each company carries on its business within the Atlantic provinces. Both wish to expand. Such an expansion would be more likely to succeed if it were supported by the financial resources of the two companies rather than if each company endeavoured to achieve this expansion separately.

(2) The operation of the two companies overlap in a number of localities. By combining their operations in these areas, the amalgamated company will be able to achieve worthwhile cost savings and provide a higher level of service to their customers.

(3) By combining and re-organizing the head office and regional office staffs of the two companies, a higher degree of efficiency and improved customer service will be achieved.

● (2020)

(4) The companies anticipate that the financial strength and stature of the new company will assist it in raising the additional share capital, and in the sale of guaranteed investment certificates, in the years ahead to permit it to grow with the economy.

(5) The Loan Companies Act limits the business operations in which Eastern can engage to borrowing and lending money. It is not permitted to exercise trust functions.

[Senator Barrow]

This limitation impairs the capacity of Eastern to compete in certain fields with trust companies, although both loan companies and trust companies operate in the same financial markets.

(6) The amalgamated company will be in a stronger position than Eastern or Central & Nova Scotia separately to withstand the erosion of its competitive position vis-à-vis the national trust companies and particularly the chartered banks that carry on business in the Atlantic regions.

Meetings of the shareholders of both companies were held on September 4 and 5 of this year, and they have approved the proposal to seek this enabling legislation.

There are undoubtedly questions which some honourable senators will wish to raise concerning this bill and it is my intention, therefore, if the bill is given second reading, to ask that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce at which time both companies are prepared to have their officials available to answer questions.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, if this new hybrid company is formed, will it have any powers which a trust company at the present time does not have?

Senator Barrow: No.

Senator Perrault: It will not.

Senator Walker: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Barrow moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 22, the debate on the motion of Senator Cook for second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, before I address myself directly to the bill, I would like to say a word about Senator Godfrey's declaration last week. He said, prior to Senator Cook's introduction of this bill, that he would not participate in this debate nor in any of the votes or discussions in committee arising from it. The reason he gave was, and I quote his words: "I was active in the preparation of briefs, on behalf of clients of my firm, addressed to the minister concerned." He said that that was before he was appointed to the Senate. I have nothing but respect for Senator Godfrey's opinion but I would suggest that he should not want to impose on others his criteria as to what constitutes a conflict of interest.

I suggest to him that because one has taken an interest on behalf of clients at some time or other, in some particular piece of legislation, that is no reason why he cannot now give an opinion; why he should now feel he is forbidden from expressing his views. It would be very difficult for the Senate to operate if this were the case. Such an attitude would compel a person, the minute he was appointed to the Senate, to devote himself exclusively to the Senate and abandon all other interests. For instance, as a lawyer I happen to be what you would call a general practitioner. I have never had any special occasion to concern myself with combines, but it is not unlikely that some of the partners in my firm have. Well, if I were bound by the criteria suggested by Senator Godfrey, I would not be entitled to discuss any kind of legislation here at all because I or my partners have touched on practically every field of law. The same thing would apply to other members of the Senate interested in particular fields such as agriculture, labour relations, and so on. If all the expertise we have in the Senate could not be put to use, of what use then would the Senate be? Senator Godfrey most certainly should act according to the dictates of his conscience, but I would not want his attitude to become binding on any of the rest of us.

In any event, since the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is presently studying the Green Paper on Members of Parliament and their Conflict of Interest, I would suggest that this particular case be discussed in that committee and that we have a ruling as to the validity of the attitude taken by Senator Godfrey in this respect.

With regard to my own position, I have no hesitation in saying that I do not consider myself in any way involved in a conflict of interest in dealing with various kinds of legislation simply because I happen to be a lawyer and occasionally must deal with such legislation in defending the interests of my clients.

Having said all that, I come now to the bill. Bill C-2 has had a long history. It is undoubtedly an important piece of legislation, which requires the concentrated attention of the Senate. The present bill has been under discussion and in preparation for over eight years, but, in fact, the first overt step taken goes back to July of 1969 when the Economic Council of Canada issued its interim report on competition policy. The government never asked for a subsequent or additional report after that first and last report of the Economic Council. However, in June 1971, the government presented Bill C-256 entitled "The Competition Act," based on the Economic Council's report. Bill C-256 contained a number of consumer-protection features. It would have created new criminal offences and would have granted an appointed tribunal the power to regulate many types of business operations, such as mergers, vertical integration and specialization. That bill gave rise to much opposition, however, and, as a result, in 1973 the government decided to drop it and, instead, to present its competition legislation in two stages. Stage one was to contain the consumer features; it would have given an appointed commission legal power to rule on the appropriateness of certain business trade practices. Stage two was to contain the more contentious legal framework for activity among business and was to be presented at a later date.

Thus, in November of 1973, stage one was introduced as Bill C-227; but that bill died on the Order Paper. In March of 1974, stage one was reintroduced as Bill C-7, but died with the dissolution on May 8, 1974.

In October of last year, stage one was again reintroduced, this time as Bill C-2. So Bill C-2, which is before us now, is essentially the original Bill C-227. It has survived procedural delays, debate, representations and politicking, and it arrives before us not dramatically different from what it was three years ago.

The approach used in Bill C-2 is essentially the same as that used in C-227. The bill makes a number of amendments to the Combines Investigation Act while retaining all the act's basic machinery. Numerous consumer protection measures are proposed. With respect to competition policy, the bill attempts to strengthen the legislation in certain areas where a high degree of consensus has developed. The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is authorized to review and make corrective orders in the case of certain situations which, it is generally agreed, need careful supervision and yet in all cases do not require such supervision.

● (2030)

The three main features of Bill C-2 have been pointed out by Senator Cook in his very able, and I would add, cautious presentation, for which we are indebted to him.

These three main features are:

1. The extension of the Combines Investigation Act to service industries which, with but a few exceptions, are not at present covered.

2. The strengthening of provisions which deal with misleading advertising and providing new protection to consumers against other unfair and dishonest selling practices.

3. Granting the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission the power to review certain trade practices which in some circumstances are perfectly legitimate but which in other circumstances have serious adverse effects on competition, such practices being:

- (i) refusal to deal;
- (ii) consignment selling when used to thwart the price maintenance ban;
- (iii) exclusive dealings;
- (iv) tied selling;
- (v) market restrictions; and
- (vi) implementation in Canada of foreign judgments, laws and directives.

In a nutshell, the idea behind this bill is to provide protection to the consumer from some of the shady practices indulged in by big, intermediate-sized, and small businesses alike. Big business is not always worse than small business. I know from my own experience that small business ventures have often been more financially rewarding to those involved than would have been big business ventures.

Senator Asselin: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: We are out to put a halt to practices which take advantage of the consumer and use his lack of knowledge and sophistication in an effort to make him the economic victim of a system which at times is unfairly weighted against him. We also want to put an end to practices which limit competition, thus cutting down on opportunities for the consumer to benefit as he seeks to get more for his consumer dollar.

As we go about doing all of these laudable things, however, we must bear in mind a few interesting and important points. The free enterprise system as it is today allows for millions of sale transactions to be carried on annually without the hindrance of direct government regulation or control. The method of purchase and the purchase price are the result of agreements between individuals to exchange earnings for goods or services.

When the market is allowed to operate freely, suppliers compete for the consumer's business. In this way, all the products needed, of the proper quality and at the best possible price, are provided. There are, however, aberrations of the free market. At times attempts are made to control competition artificially. There are forms of advertising which not only border on fraud but are undoubtedly fraud. These practices we want to see stopped, but we must also be very careful. Senator Cook warned us not to go too far. He said we should not make the legislation so stringent as to deny those only suspected of transgressing it the opportunity of establishing their innocence.

There is also another danger. There has existed for some years in North America an economic power syndrome. The attitude has developed that profits are bad, and that anyone who works towards making them is an obvious enemy of the rest of us. Governments wishing to pander to this particular cynical outlook have taken to looking upon the business community with less-than-veiled suspicion, and we should therefore be careful of what we are doing here, since unnecessary government interference with the system may eventually work to our great disadvantage.

It is all very well to want to root out fraud, and it is fine to render impossible the forceful institution of unnatural monopolies; but we owe it to ourselves to be careful. The business community cannot be said to be flourishing these days. Profits are not what those dedicated to statist philosophies of government would have us believe. These are lean years for the honest, fair-dealing businessman. These people have suffered as much as anybody from the general economic chaos attributable to uncontrolled inflation and deepening recession. I do not say this because I want to see us give those who are victimizing the consumer a free ride. I want the clamps put on them. But I do not want to see us straitjacket all businessmen in order to get at those who deal with the consumer in an unscrupulous fashion. This bill vastly extends the scope of the federal government's authority over business practices which can in any way be looked upon as not in the consumers' interest.

To summarize the contents of the bill I would say that it contains a series of propositions against particular trade practices harmful to the interests of the consumer. One example is misleading advertising. If you were to read the section pertaining to it, you would be tempted to say that if the bill had been in force during last year's election the attitude of the Liberal Party would have been judged an offence under this legislation.

Other prohibitions contained in the bill against harmful trade practices are against misleading warranties, pyramid selling, referral selling, bait and switch selling, and selling at higher than advertised prices. The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission will have a lot of power to prosecute and especially to issue orders to do certain things when there is an obvious infraction of the rules established by the bill.

As Senator Cook has indicated, this bill is not entirely, as far as the Senate is concerned, a new piece of legislation. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has considered this bill in advance of its coming to us, and I think as many as 19 meetings have been held by the committee. We listened to witnesses and representations from all sections of society. The business world was represented, and, if memory serves me right, the labour world as well.

The committee issued two reports. The main report made several representations, and in addition there was an interim report. Following these reports, and following representations made not only before the Senate committee but also before the committee of the House of Commons, the minister agreed to make several amendments which were incorporated in the bill in the other place before it came to us. As a result, I would say that the bill is quite different from what it was at the beginning, although, I hasten to add, many items of importance remain for us yet to consider. I think the job of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which I hope this bill will be referred, would now be to consider how the amendments made by the minister, or, at least, made in the other place, stack up against the suggestions made by the Senate committee.

• (2040)

There are, however, two items in particular about which I want to say a few words. These items were not dealt with by the minister or by the House of Commons. To this end I would like to refer now to the interim report which we issued on March 18, 1975. They deal mainly, in my view, with constitutional problems. I quote from the report at page 33:7 where it says:

Several of the new provisions which Bill C-2 would enact may rest on questionable constitutional ground. Reference is made particularly (1) to the provision (new s.31.1) which would give to a person who has suffered loss or damage a civil right of action to recover damages for breach of any of the statutory offences under the Act or for failure to comply with an order of the Commission and (2) to the "civil jurisdiction" (new Part IV.1) given to the Commission which, in effect, enables it to look into a specific set of facts under very broad legal criteria and make an order affecting one or more named suppliers.

Then it goes on to say this:

Speaking of the civil damages provision, the explanatory booklet "Proposals for a New Competition Policy for Canada" published by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—

And I think that was in 1973 or before.

—says as follows at p. 67:

While the constitutionality of new section 31.1 may be challenged as relating to property and civil rights or matters of a local or private nature which, under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act, are within provincial rather than federal, jurisdiction, it is nevertheless hoped that the section will be upheld* as a matter ancillary to the criminal law, or relating to trade and commerce, and therefore within federal jurisdiction under section 91 of that Act.

*In a later edition of the booklet, this phrase was changed to read "it is considered that the section is supportable".

Now, there is one comment about the right to claim civil damages under this legislation at the bottom of page 33:7 which reads as follows:

The Bill would provide that a person aggrieved by a breach of the provisions of the Act by another person would have a right of action in the civil courts for the damages suffered as a result of such breach. While the position may be different under the civil law of Quebec, the leading jurisprudence under the common law leaves considerable doubt as to whether a party has such a right of action on the theory that the only sanctions intended are those provided in the Act itself, namely, fines and imprisonment. Thus, for the common law provinces at least, a statutorily created right would be required in order to ensure the right to claim damages.

Well, the first thing I want to say about this right is that to me it is entirely within the competence of the provinces and really has no place in this kind of legislation. This is quite obvious, since even the booklet reciting the principles or the objectives of the bill expressed doubts concerning this matter. I do not see how one could say that it is ancillary to the problem of the criminal law involved in the competition legislation that you would have a civil right if, under that pretext, all you are doing is to encroach upon civil and property rights which are properly the jurisdiction of the province. "Ancillary" means it is entirely necessary and not accessory to the legislation. This may be accessory; it may be useful, but it is certainly not necessary to go into that in the federal Parliament.

As is mentioned in the report, I think, in Quebec, if you contravene any kind of legislation, then this generates a right of action. But if it is not the same case in the other provinces under the common law system, then I would say it should be the responsibility of the provincial legislatures to bring in corrective measures. It is not because of the failure of the provincial legislatures to legislate in this restricted, exclusive field falling within their competence that the federal Parliament automatically acquires a right to intervene. I would say that it has too often been the case that the federal government, supported, of course, by Parliament—but that is another problem—has entered into a field reserved by the BNA Act to provincial legislatures. I dislike this practice, although I agree that anybody who suffers damages because someone else has contravened the legislation which we are asked to enact should have a civil recourse for damages resulting therefrom. But for the federal government to enter a field of provincial jurisdiction in this way is a practice too frequently indulged in.

I suggest to the Senate that we should protest vehemently against this kind of intrusion. I say this because there is a related problem created by the fact that not only does the legislation provide for this civil remedy, but it also gives jurisdiction to the Federal Court to hear anyone who wants to take action under the right given by the legislation to claim damages. The act says you may do it before the Federal Court. Herein lies another constitutional problem. As the report indicates, it is of even more doubtful constitutional validity to give this right to the Federal Court. Therefore, by doing so, I suggest, we are simply adding to the confusion. If anybody starts an action before the Federal Court to claim damages for violation of the combines legislation, then one may be dragged into a debate on constitutional validity that may take five or six years to resolve. Nobody will even know for sure whether they are really right in going before the Federal Court.

So, honourable senators, I suggest that this problem of a civil remedy provided in federal legislation is a very real and important problem. Dealing again with the jurisdiction of the Federal Court, I should like to quote from page 33:12 of the report, where it says:

The Act provides that prosecutions shall be brought in the ordinary criminal courts in the provinces but that, with the consent of the accused, most offences may be prosecuted in the Federal Court—Trial Division.

And here we are dealing with criminal prosecutions.

Bill C-2 would amend the relevant provisions so that a prosecution could be brought against a corporation in the Federal Court—Trial Division—without obtaining its consent. A prosecution against an individual in that court would still require his consent.

This is of doubtful constitutional validity since, although Parliament has jurisdiction in relation to criminal law, the provinces have jurisdiction in relation to the administration of justice and the creation of criminal courts. Doubtless this was the reason for making the jurisdiction of the Federal Court under the Act conditional upon the accused's consent.

That is, of course, if he is an individual. But if the accused is a corporation, then it can be brought before the Federal Court, and there again you have the opportunity for a case which could create uncertainty, confusion and possibly legal chaos.

● (2050)

I do not understand why the federal Parliament or, I should say, the administration, are not more careful about these matters. They seem to say, "Well, let's see how it goes." Someone has had the bright idea that it would be simpler if we did not have to deal with the provinces, and everybody is happy with that. However, as long as they are there and have constitutional authority in certain areas, we must respect the provinces.

These two items especially are a serious problem for the Senate to consider at this time. The committee should look into them very closely. It should also review those other matters on which the committee made recommendations and with respect to which, judging from the other place's amendments, nothing much was done.

I repeat, let us consider seriously these two constitutional points raised. Unless they are solved they will only create problems and prevent us from achieving the main objectives of this legislation which are to protect the consumer and real competition in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Cook speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, I am sure we all wish to thank Senator Flynn for his most exhaustive and helpful address. I do not believe that there is anything I can add at this stage. As I have already said, this bill calls for very careful study in committee, rather than general debate on the floor of the chamber, a view which I believe to be shared by Senator Flynn. Therefore, I intend to move, should the bill receive second reading, that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Cook moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 23, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, traditionally, Canadians have enjoyed turkey on Thanksgiving. This year Prime Minister Trudeau served a different fowl. He ate crow, and the right honourable gentleman must have been rather hungry because he ate a generous portion.

I am sure that Senator Perrault would have preferred B.C. salmon rather than the cold crow leftovers he served us last Thursday. The honourable gentleman did a commendable job in what must have been a most difficult task for him. He was very active in spreading the propaganda against the Progressive Conservative platform during the last election, and his words must have been coming back to haunt him as he spoke on Thursday. No doubt this contributed to the great effort he put into his speech. At times he had all the enthusiasm of a drummer at a rock festival, and at others he changed his tone to that of a player in a Shakespearian tragedy. When he resumed his seat I thought he resembled the perfect advertisement for Alka-Seltzer. I am sure I heard him say, "I can't believe I ate all that crow."

The Leader of the Government in the Senate found a general consensus in support of the proposed policy. The former Minister of Finance, Mr. Turner, could not obtain such a consensus. On Friday evening last the Prime Minister stated in Toronto that his selling trip was starting slowly and he certainly needed more on the bandwagon. Also on Friday evening, at the end of a two-day conference between the federal Minister of Finance and the provincial Ministers of Finance and Ministers of Labour, one of the western delegates stated that he was going home disillusioned because the federal government did not know what it was doing. This was no surprise to me; the only surprise was that there was such a person left in western Canada who would believe that this government knew what it was doing.

[Senator Cook.]

Honourable senators will forgive me if I mention that the Progressive Conservative leader, a fellow-Maritimer, in the last election followed the course he thought best for Canada, although it did prove unpopular at the polls. The so-called White Paper or, as some term it, the whitewash, emphasizes the evils of inflation.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: Yet the document, Attack On Inflation, accepts the fact that it already exists to an intolerable extent. It accepts this situation, and merely attempts to slow down the destructive effects of inflation. We have experienced 50 per cent inflation during the last five years. Is this to remain a built-in feature of our economy? Is there provision for any rollback or correction in the existing inequities? I can find none in the White Paper.

The first step mentioned by the Leader of the Government in the Senate is a crash course for Canadians in the economic facts of life, the economic conditions which brought about our high rate of inflation. I suggest, honourable senators, that we are starting at the wrong end of the spectrum. The Prime Minister and the members of his Cabinet and, especially, those hundred or so advisers in the Prime Minister's office, are those who should receive the first crash course in the economic facts of life. Let us close Parliament for a month and send the whole lot of them off to Meach Lake for a month in the hope that they can find a solution.

Part of that course should include a review of the warnings issued by the Parliament of Canada with respect to inflation. Senator Everett and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance several years ago issued a warning against inflation. That report stated that the committee had considered wage and price controls as a possibility, but did not believe Canadians were ready to accept them. There is still considerable evidence today that that report is correct.

In 1970 the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, dominated by Liberals and chaired by Mr. Herb Gray, who was later a Cabinet minister, reported that the inflation of the day had tended to institutionalize itself as a persistent and would-be permanent guest in our system through, among other factors, the widespread development of an inflation psychology. Now, five and a half years later, the government has found that an inflation psychology has gripped the nation. This is hardly jet age communication.

● (2100)

Let us review a few of the events which have occurred since 1970. The cost-of-living index in September 1970 was 129.7. Three years later, in September 1973, it was 151. In June 1974 the cost-of-living index had reached 166.7.

Honourable senators will recall that an election was held, and a Liberal government returned. Six months later the cost-of-living index was 176.6, an increase of 10 points in six months. In February of this year the index was 178, and in September it had reached 189.3, an increase of 12 points.

Budgets were presented in November and June, but they did not check inflation. In fact, many Canadians believe the government allowed inflation to develop so that they could point to such factors as an increased gross national product and say, "The land is strong."

Instead of trying to check inflation at the outset, the Prime Minister moved around like a grasshopper on skates. One statement was that inflation had been checked, that unemployment was now the problem. Two months later the pendulum had swung the other way and he was reversing his statement. Today we have the worst of all worlds—inflation, high unemployment, and interest rates that almost equal those of loan sharks.

Honourable senators, it is a legislative tragedy that the government ignored so many warnings, and allowed a 50 per cent inflation rate in five years. It is even worse that after witnessing the devastating effects of inflation for many years, the planned attack is one of compound confusion. The Minister of Labour makes the statement that the inside postal workers are not within the guidelines, the Minister of Finance contradicts it, and the Prime Minister makes a different statement each time he is booed, which is about every time he makes a public appearance.

Last week on his selling tour, the Prime Minister started out in Winnipeg by talking about an 8 per cent increase in wages. By the time he had reached Toronto he had upped the ante to 12 per cent. If he visits the 1976 Olympics site in Montreal, he will certainly have to raise the ante again.

If the planned attack on inflation is to work, the wage increase cannot be in direct proportion to the boos and adverse reception received by the Prime Minister and other cabinet ministers.

Senator Perrault has asked us on this side of the house to make suggestions that would assist in having the planned attack on inflation accepted. I have noticed that the Prime Minister's "inflation psychology" speeches are made before the more affluent groups such as chambers of commerce, Rotary clubs and other service clubs.

Senator Perrault: Are you attacking Rotary?

Senator Phillips: No, I am not. Honourable senators realize that not every citizen in Canada can afford to eat in the most expensive hotels in the country and not every citizen can deduct the cost of a meal as a business expense from his income. Most people have been hard hit by inflation and must budget.

I have noticed during election campaigns that the Prime Minister is brought into closer contact with voters than he is during his present selling tour. I have noticed too that certain senators, such as Senator Davey, Senator Stanbury, and perhaps Senator Perrault, have had a hand in arranging huge rallies for the Prime Minister in various parts of the country. I would suggest to honourable senators opposite that they arrange a rally to which everyone is invited, and let the Prime Minister present his program. I realize it would take a major and expensive advertising campaign to get people to attend such a meeting, but we could sell the Prime Minister's swimming pool and use the proceeds for such a purpose. No doubt it would help draw a crowd, and would give the Prime Minister a more representative audience than he has had in the past.

I am sure that most Canadians would like to practise the voluntary restraints which have become part of the political theme song. However, it is impossible for the average individual to practise voluntary restraint. Let us take the case of an individual, a public servant, married with two children, receiving a salary of $16,000 a year. He receives a pay increase of 8 per cent, or $1,280. His first deduction is that of income tax, of at least 25 per cent, or $320. Another $100 will be deducted for superannuation, unemployment insurance, and other deductions at source. If he is lucky he will be able to take home approximately $860 of his pay increase. His rent will have gone up $300; his utilities—hydro, water and telephone—another $100; and heating fuel and gasoline, another $100. Household and car insurance is up 25 per cent, and we can therefore deduct another $50 or $75. The increase in the cost of food will amount to $385, based on a low estimate of $60 per week for four people.

This individual faces an increase in his cost of living that is greater than the increase in his take-home pay. And we have not considered extras such as clothing, entertainment, municipal taxes—which have gone up approximately 20 per cent—and many other services.

In many cases five-year mortgages at 8½ per cent are coming up for renewal. They are being renewed at 12¾ per cent and 13 per cent, costing the homeowner an extra $1,000. In the case of someone having to renew his mortgage this year, the increase in interest rates and income tax alone would consume that pay increase of $1,280.

Honourable senators, among the items I have listed, not one is voluntary on the part of the citizen. He is forced to pay them all.

One of the most frequent criticisms of the rather indefinite anti-inflation program is that it is unfair to those receiving the lowest income. The $600 increase permitted in the White Paper is considered too low, and last week the Prime Minister stated that it would be reviewed. However, one aspect that is overlooked is the fact that working women earn less than men. In 1974, the average woman in the labour force faced a wage differential of $5,400. This plan will perpetuate, and indeed widen, the gap between salaries earned by men and women, and, of course, will do the same thing in the case of those receiving a low income compared with those who receive a medium range income.

● (2110)

The plan makes no allowance for catch-up in respect of regional disparities. Workers in the Atlantic provinces receive far less—approximately one-third less—than those in Ontario and the rest of Canada. I should like to see some provision to enable workers in the Atlantic provinces to obtain, or approach, parity with workers in other parts of Canada.

In order to have the plan obtain acceptance by the general public, it will be necessary to avoid further tax increases at all three levels of government. It will be necessary to cut back on some expenditures and improve the administration of others. We must persevere without more Mirabels, and we must have more accurate estimates of projects undertaken by the federal government. The first phase of the Mirabel Airport has now cost more than the original estimate for all three phases. The third phase of the government building in Hull, Place du Portage, was originally to cost $27 million. The cost is now at $97.5 million, and still climbing. The new Bank of Canada building is the most expensive building in Canada. We must cut back on many of these expenditures.

The federal government must provide leadership and example. It must be open and aboveboard. Just before the austerity program was announced, over 1,100 senior bureaucrats received last minute pay increases up to $6,000. There seems to be some great secrecy about the date those pay increases became effective, but it is interesting to note, honourable senators, that our deputy ministers receive twice the salary of their counterparts in the United States.

If these mandarins are so good, why was it necessary to raid that maximum security institution for defeated Liberals, the Power Corporation, in order to get a chairman for the Anti-Inflation Board? Surely, among the 1,150 mandarins who received last minute pay increases, there must be at least one who could have been appointed chairman of that board. If not, why raise their salaries?

Interest rates are one cause of our high rate of inflation. Not only are high interest rates reflected in the increased cost of production, but our workers must receive more to meet increased mortgage and rental payments. Yet, we are able to make loans to various foreign countries at practically no interest. Last May Canada loaned $500 million to Russia. We have also loaned money to Iran, which is a very rich country. If we can make money available to Russian communists at practically no interest, why can't we do something of a similar nature for Canadians? Why not lower interest rates? The government has promised that we will shortly receive a new housing program. Let us hope that this will include lower, more reasonable, interest rates.

Again, let me emphasize the necessity for restraint by the federal government as well as the other levels of government. Since this Prime Minister took office, federal government spending has tripled. Also, the money supply has increased by 111 per cent—15 per cent in the last year alone!

Senator Perrault listed external forces, such as the increased cost of imported oil, as being the culprits contributing to inflation. Admittedly, increased oil costs have been a factor, but certainly not the major factor that some would lead us to believe. The main cause of inflation has been sheer financial irresponsibility on the part of the federal government, and until we receive better leadership from the government in this regard, inflation will continue. It is going to take a major change in government policy to halt inflation, and I hope we will see that change in the months ahead.

Earlier I mentioned the effect of income tax and other numerous deductions from an individual's pay. The balance is further hit by provincial and municipal taxes to the point where the individual has very little left except an empty pay envelope. The Government of the United States is considering a huge tax cut to help those in the lower income brackets. This is a policy which I feel should receive further consideration in Canada. I know the subject can be argued on two sides. There are those economists who say that tax cuts will put more money into circulation and increase the inflationary spiral. However, my view is that the Canadian worker has to receive some relief, and the only logical source of that relief is a cut in tax rates.

The Anti-Inflation Board will have extremely wide powers. The chairman will have all the powers of a communist commissar. There is no provision for a parliamentary review of the regulations established by the Anti-Inflation Board. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments can review these regulations, but only in the context of the regulations being within the scope of the act. It cannot consider the fairness or the wisdom of the regulations. I believe there should be provision made for a review of those regulations by both Houses of Parliament, thereby allowing a check on the wisdom of the regulations and, what is more important, the effect of the regulations. After all, we are granting a lot of power for three years.

Last evening I watched a special edition of News Magazine on the CBC. I was surprised to hear accountants state that companies could juggle their accounts in the range of 5 to 15 per cent. Perhaps they were merely looking for business. I was rather surprised at that figure. However, should that be the case, it will take an army of accountants to check the accounts of multinational corporations and large Canadian corporations with a number of subsidiaries. It is little wonder that labour feels the attack on inflation favours business.

In summation, if this program is to be successful, many changes will have to be made. If the government expects cooperation, government arrogance must be a thing of the past, and the government must realize that cooperation is a two-way street.

Honourable senators, I have tried to convey to you the fact that I have a certain amount of pessimism concerning the success of this program. I want to close my remarks by saying that no one will be more pleased than I if it does work.

On motion of Senator Forsey, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 29, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Last night Senator Flynn made some comments on my declaration of conflict of interest which I made last Wednesday with respect to Bill C-2. I must say that after listening to Senator Flynn it became apparent to me that my brief remarks explaining why I considered that there was a conflict of interest were misunderstood, and it was obvious that the reason that they were misunderstood could only be because they were inadequate, and for this I must take the blame. I feel I owe it to this house to amplify my remarks because it would be unfortunate to leave the wrong impression. I shall be as brief as possible.

You may recall that I said last Wednesday, and I quote from Senate Hansard of that date:

With regard to this particular legislation, Bill C-2, that is about to be debated, I should like to say that before I was appointed to the Senate I was active in the preparation of briefs, on behalf of clients of my firm, addressed to the minister concerned.

While I did not explicitly say so, I certainly meant to imply, and I thought everybody would understand, that a fee was charged by my firm for my services in the preparation of those briefs, and that I as a partner shared in that fee.

Senator Flynn referred to the Green Paper, Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest, presently being considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. That paper at page 1 gives the following definition of "conflict of interest":

A conflict of interest denotes a situation in which a Member of Parliament has a personal or a private pecuniary interest sufficient to influence, or appear to influence, the exercise of his public duties and responsibilities.

Every definition that I can recall ever having read, including one, I might say, by Winston Churchill, emphasizes the fact that even the appearance of conflict of interest constitutes conflict of interest in itself. Furthermore, I should point out that the definition is confined to "pecuniary" interest. Senator Flynn expressed the hope that my action in declaring what I considered to be a conflict of interest would be considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs during their deliberations on the Green Paper. In that connection I would like to refer to proposal No. 3 contained in the Green Paper, appearing at page 28, reading as follows:

It is recommended that the following provision be incorporated in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons and the Rules of the Senate:

A Member (Senator) shall not advocate any matter or cause related to his personal, private or professional interests among Members or Senators, or among public servants, or before any Government boards or tribunals, for a fee or reward, direct or indirect.

The Green Paper continues in an explanatory paragraph, to which I would like to refer:

On occasion Members of Parliament, regardless of profession or occupation, may be requested to intercede with public servants or government bodies on behalf of constituents. This should be considered part of their normal representative duties and it seems unreasonable to prohibit Members from discharging such a fundamental responsibility. However, if Members accept a fee for performing these duties, there is little doubt that they can be accused of having a conflict of interest in as much as they are receiving pecuniary rewards for performing duties associated with their public office.

In view of the proposal which I have just read, Senator Flynn can rest assured that the principle behind the position I took last Wednesday will be considered during the deliberations of the committee. However, whether or not the committee or this house agrees with proposal No. 3 in its entirety, with all of its ramifications, I want to say as bluntly and as clearly as I can, so that there will be no possibility of misunderstanding; that in my judgment it would be highly improper for any member of Parliament, be he in the Commons or the Senate, to accept a fee, professionally or otherwise, either for personally making direct representation to a minister, or for his personal assistance with the preparation of a brief to a minister, with respect to legislation then before Parliament. That does not mean he cannot do so, but simply that he cannot take a fee for doing so. I wish to make it equally clear that I am not implying that a member of this house has ever done this because, knowing the members of this house as I do, it would be inconceivable to me that any member would do so.

I had accepted such a fee before I was a member of this house. Of course, there is nothing improper in that, but I did feel that I owed a duty to this house and to the public, and that is just as important, to disclose this fact and disqualify myself from voting and speaking on Bill C-2. No one will ever convince me otherwise. I can hardly imagine anyone seriously arguing that there was not at least an appearance of conflict of interest.

Senator Flynn also said last night, and I quote from page 1309 of yesterday's Hansard:

Well, if I were bound by the criteria suggested by Senator Godfrey, I would not be entitled to discuss any kind of legislation here at all because I or my partners have touched on practically every field of law. The same thing would apply to other members of the Senate interested in particular fields such as agriculture, labour relations, and so on. If all the expertise we have in the Senate could not be put to use, of what use then would the Senate be?

I covered this very same point at great length in my maiden speech delivered in this house on December 5, 1973, when I moved second reading of the Foreign Investment Review Act. I mentioned this speech last Wednesday. In order to save the time of interested senators so that they will not have to wade through the whole of that lengthy speech, I would like to quote briefly from it. On page 1262 of Senate Hansard of December 5, 1973, I said:

I certainly have no greater financial interest in this particular subject than, say, a farmer speaking on agricultural matters, a doctor speaking on medicare, or a manufacturer speaking on manufacturing. It would, in my opinion, be ridiculous to say that Parliament should be denied the benefit of the opinions, advice and vote of those gentlemen on those subjects because they have a special personal, financial interest in them. Surely one of the strengths of Parliament is that it is composed of members who represent diverse interests, as well as different regions.

However, in my opinion lawyers have special problems. When a farmer or doctor or a manufacturer rises to speak it is common knowledge that he is a farmer, a doctor or a manufacturer, and people will judge what he says in that light. When a lawyer in active practice gets up to speak it is not common knowledge who his clients are, or even what type of clients he or his firm act for, or what influences there are which consciously or subconsciously may have been brought to bear on him.

Later on I said:

I think that for the purpose of this debate, and any similar debates in the future on legislation generally affecting the business community, it should suffice for me to say that my firm acts primarily for corporate clients, covering a broad spectrum of the business, financial, manufacturing, resource and transportation businesses, many of which will be affected by this legislation.

It goes without saying that I shall certainly make a conscious effort to make sure, as I am sure every honourable senator who is a lawyer does, that anything I say or do in this chamber will not in any way be influenced by the fact that it might affect a client of my firm, and that I will in no way allow my professional interest to conflict with the proper discharge of my duties as a senator . . .

I trust that what I have said will be considered sufficient to disclose any possible conflict of interest or bias which I may have with respect to this particular bill. I do not propose to repeat what I have said today if I speak or vote on other bills which may affect corporate clients of my firm generally. I think my firm is of sufficient size, and our clientele encompasses such a broad spectrum of the business world, that I can hardly imagine any bill which comes before this house affecting business generally which will not in some way affect one of our clients. However, if any bill affects a particular client in some special way, then of course I shall have to consider whether or not it is proper for me to vote or speak on such a bill, and if I did whether, in addition to pointing this out, I should actually name the particular client.

[Senator Godfrey.]

I trust that Senator Flynn will now be reassured by the remarks I have just quoted and what I have said today, and be convinced that any precedent that may be established by my action of last Wednesday should not normally restrict or embarrass any senator, particularly those who are lawyers, in carrying out their duties in this house; nor should it restrict their partners or associates in carrying out their professional duties for their clients.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I also rise on a question of privilege. I have heard the remarks of Senator Godfrey on conflict of interest. My purpose in rising today is to state that I share Senator Flynn's views on conflict of interest. I do not feel it would be in good taste to discuss the merits at this time of what could be the definition of a conflict of interest, or how it should be handled, because this is a matter which is presently under study by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

• (1410)

I should like to say only that I fully, and without reservation, concur with Senator Flynn's views yesterday regarding his interpretation of what constitutes a conflict of interest.

Briefly, I will not let the thinking of others on what constitutes a conflict of interest influence me or prevent me from expressing the views and experiences that I have acquired through a full and long life, and I will continue to give the Senate the benefit of my thinking, based on my practical experiences and those of my associates, as to what I believe would be best for our Canada. I can inform honourable senators now that it is my intention to express my views in the Senate as long as I am a member of the Senate and able to do so on the basis of these criteria.

I need say no more at this time other than to express the hope that no member of this chamber, under any circumstances, will hesitate to continue on all occasions to do just that, to give us the full benefit of his or her tested experiences and acquired knowledge.

THE HONOURABLE SALTER A. HAYDEN

CHAIRMAN OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE—TRIBUTES

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, I should like to say a few words about one of our colleagues, the Honourable Senator Salter A. Hayden. I believe this is an excellent occasion to pay special homage to Senator Hayden, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This outstanding and illustrious Canadian has been participating in civic and public life since 1935, a period of over 40 years. He has been continuously active in the Senate since 1940, a good 35 years. Senator Hayden and Senator Pater-son are equally first on the senators' seniority list, both having been summoned to the Senate on the same date.

A few months ago, Senator Hayden decided to retire from a very brilliant and highly successful legal career during which he served Canada and his fellow Canadians for some 53 consecutive years. I am told his retirement turned out to be somewhat symbolic as he is still hard at work and continues to help many of his fellow Canadians with his sound legal advice, his good counsel, and lucid judgments.

We in the Senate are privileged to be able to work with him and we are grateful to have benefited from his great wisdom, his prudent advice, his foresight, his broadness of views, his fairness and perspicacity, his comprehension, the liberalism of his ideas, his humaneness, his clearness and lucidity, and what has become known as the "Hayden approach" to the important problems of our country in our time.

It is of deep personal satisfaction for me to have the opportunity to serve on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, a committee which he has so brilliantly and ably chaired over the past 25 years.

When the frankness of his thinking and his actions made him a target of some, he courageously chose to ignore those and pursued the course which seemed to be beneficial and good for Canada. It is no wonder he has become one of the most valuable constructive contributors in the public life of Canada.

To the Honourable Senator Hayden I express today our gratefulness. Senator Hayden gives so much of himself and has accomplished so much for our country, for our Parliament and for the Senate. It is to be hoped that our illustrious senator and his charming wife will continue to have a long life of personal satisfaction and happiness with us in the Senate.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I do not know whether we are out of order but I would certainly second the very appropriate remarks of my honourable friend who has just concluded.

Never in my experience, either in the Senate or the House of Commons or at the Bar, have I ever known a person having a more acute legal mind, with a great ability to express himself in legal matters and with an uncanny ability to almost, off the top of his head, dictate legislation. It is an amazing gift. It takes most of us hours and hours and hours to do a paragraph, but he can do it off the top of his head. He is one of the most remarkable people I have ever met in my life.

In addition, he is a very human person. Day after day we get these long-winded witnesses in the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee and he would just say, "Leave it to me." He would, without offending them, or hurting them, or even without their knowing about it, cut them down to size. They would even go away rejoicing that they had such a good hearing. That is a talent that very few of us can match.

I have a special reason to thank him. In 1962, after I had been in the largest majority since Confederation in 1958, I ran and was defeated by none other than Senator Hayden's junior, Donald Macdonald. That was a great favour he finally conferred on me but I did not think so at the time. Not only that but, to knock off Walker, he gave Donald Macdonald a whole year off with salary, provided that he do a house-to-house canvass. He worked that out quite successfully. Secretly I have had a great admiration for him, to be able to contrive that. I did not think it was possible.

I was only in my riding for three days in that election. I went across Canada three times as the Minister of Public Works, responsible for housing, and so on. I did not realize that this handsome young man, about six-foot four, was canvassing homes a second time, showing what a nice fellow he was, and all the time getting a salary from Salter Hayden's firm.

Another reason he is a friend is that he indirectly did me a favour. If I had not lost that year by 414 votes I would have lost the next time because six months later the person who succeeded me got beaten by 7,500 votes.

I have many reasons to be thankful to Senator Hayden, but let me say again that I admire brains. I admire people with brains who can express themselves and use that expression in a great cause. The very reputation of this house depends to a large extent on the proper working of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, which is known all over Canada for the justice of its hearings and for the amount of work it accomplishes. A great deal of this is due to Senator Salter Hayden.

Again, I have great pleasure in joining my friends, and I am sure I speak for everyone in the Opposition, in paying tribute to Senator Hayden today on the 25th anniversary, not of his being in the Senate, for he has been here far longer than that, but of his being chairman of our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

RULES OF THE SENATE

REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS PRESENTED

Hon. Hartland de M. Molsort: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders recommending certain amendments to the Rules of the Senate, and I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day to form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 1331.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molson moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Wednesday, November 5, 1975.

He said: Honourable senators, although I have moved that the report be taken into consideration on November 5, I should like at this time, if the Senate permits, to make a brief statement in explanation of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molson: As honourable senators are aware, the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders is empowered by the Rules of the Senate on its own initiative to propose to the Senate from time to time amendments to the rules. As amendments to the rules have periodically been suggested and discussed in this chamber, and because it was felt that certain of the rules needed clarification, the committee was called in April to deal with the whole matter. In all, five meetings were held: the first in April, the last on October 22. The committee has gone over the rules thoroughly and has given careful consideration to all proposed amendments. The report presented to the Senate this afternoon contains the recommendations of the committee.

Honourable senators will note that the recommended changes in or additions to the rules are set out in this report in a different manner than is usual in this type of report. The proposed amended rule is set out in one column and the present rule is printed in the opposite column. In the case of a proposed new rule it is noted in the opposite column that it is a new rule. This has been done so that honourable senators may readily see just what the recommended changes are, and to facilitate their consideration thereof.

If these amendments to the rules are agreed to by the Senate, it will of course be necessary to have the rules reprinted. This will afford an opportunity to make some necessary changes in the appendices to the rules.

Appendix 1 is the Table of Related Statutes. The committee has asked the Law Clerk of the Senate to bring this table up to date to cover legislation passed since the last printing of the rules, and also the new revised statutes.

Appendix 2 contains the Forms and Proceedings of the Senate. These are not rules, but evidence of Senate practice, and for convenience are included in this volume as a source of information on customs, usages, forms and practices of the Senate referred to in rule 1. It has been recognized for some time that certain changes should be made in the forms and proceedings for purposes of clarification, and to conform with modern Senate practice. At the request of the committee the Clerk of the Senate has arranged to have these changes made, and, of course, in doing this, he will take into account any amendments that may be adopted by the Senate.

In addition to the foregoing the committee has asked the Clerk of the Senate to revise the marginal notes, and to have a new index to the rules prepared. A number of senators have expressed dissatisfaction with the present index, and as certain changes would have to be made in it to agree with the amendments to the rules, this seemed to be the proper time for a completely new and improved index, which it is hoped honourable senators will find to be more helpful than the present one.

I have asked to have the report printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate, and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, in order to give all honourable senators time to examine the changes. When the report is taken into consideration on November 5 next, I will run over the proposed rules and answer any questions. In this way it is hoped that honourable senators will find themselves fully informed of and in a position to give approval to these proposals.

[Senator Molson.]

Motion agreed to.

● (1420)

PAN AMERICAN GAMES

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN TEAM MEMBERS

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, may I ask for the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass a resolution of congratulations to the young men and women from all over Canada who so distinguished themselves at the recently concluded Pan American Games in Mexico, not only distinguishing themselves by the quality of their behaviour but by their great success in winning more medals than have ever been won by a Canadian team before. It is truly, I suggest, a great national accomplishment and, hopefully, a precursor of similar things to come in our Olympics next year.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Later:]

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, in order to complete procedurally the matter earlier raised, I move, seconded by Senator McIlraith, that the Senate offer congratulations to the young men and young women from all over Canada who so distinguished themselves at the recently concluded Pan American Games in Mexico, not only distinguishing themselves by the quality of their behaviour, but by their great success in winning more medals than have ever been won by a Canadian team before.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Giguère be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

CELEBRATION OF SILVER JUBILEE IN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government. This one he may perhaps be able to answer immediately.

During the summer I ran across an item in the London Times headed, "The Queen's Silver Jubilee to be Celebrated." My question arises out of that.

Has the government made, or is it making, any preparations for celebrating the Silver Jubilee of the Queen's accession? If no such preparations have been made, is it the government's intention to see that suitable celebrations will take place?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice. However, I am sure that because our nation is one of the senior members of the Commonwealth, the Queen's Silver Jubilee will be honoured suitably in this country.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO ARGENTINA AND KOREA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to provide a reply to a question asked yesterday by Senator Forsey. The question was with respect to the present stage of negotiations with Argentina in the first place, and the Republic of Korea in the second place, on the matter of sales of Candu reactors to those countries.

I would like to reply as follows: the present state of negotiations with Argentina and the Republic of Korea with respect to Candu reactors is that they are in the final stages.

● (1430)

Senator Forsey: I congratulate the Leader of the Government on the very informative reply he has given. He may hear further from me on the subject.

Senator Perrault: May I say that I quite realize my reply has been rather incomplete, but I hope that further information will be received in the near future from the appropriate sources.

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he is in a position to inform the Senate as to whether substantial progress has been made in the present dispute between the postal workers and the Postmaster General; are negotiations moving? Can we expect a settlement in the near future in the interest of the Canadian economy?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the opportunity to report to the chamber on the progress of negotiations. I have a situation report as of 2 o'clock this afternoon. Meetings this morning went very smoothly, and the talks broke off at 12 noon, but only temporarily, I am pleased to report. Both sides will be back at the table at 4 o'clock this afternoon to reassess what are termed as the last of the non-monetary requests. Everything seems to be going very smoothly and both sides are quite optimistic.

Senator Croll: But the strike is still on, if you want to know.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF DOLLAR—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Phillips on Thursday, October 23, relating to the purchasing power of the dollar in the years 1970 and 1971. The 1946 dollar had a purchasing power in 1970 of 46 cents, and in 1971 of 45 cents. Of course, its purchasing power has declined further since then.

Senator Walker: What is it now?

Senator Perrault: The information I gave in my speech on Thursday is that the 1946 dollar now has a value somewhere in the region of 38 cents in terms of purchasing power.

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, my first and most agreeable duty this afternoon is to congratulate Honourable Senator Phillips on the admirable and most entertaining speech which he made last night. I don't wish that to be taken as indicating complete agreement with all he said, although there were certain points, as will appear shortly, on which I did agree with him.

I was particularly delighted with his witticisms, though they were rather stinging witticisms for a supporter of the government. There were moments when I almost felt as if I were listening to the Right Honourable Member from Prince Albert, and I think I can pay no higher tribute to Senator Phillips' wit than to say that.

The only points in Senator Phillips' speech that I want to take up directly are, first of all, the rather revolutionary suggestion—at least, this seemed to be the implication of what he said—that the government's proposals for restraint on prices and wages and salaries and other forms of compensation did not contain anything to roll back prices and compensation to a level some distance back in the past. I don't know quite how far he wanted to go, but he seemed to think that it was a fault of these proposals that they were not going to tackle the inflation which existed before the regulations and guidelines were to come into effect. That strikes me as not only a revolutionary proposal—and a revolutionary proposal is the last sort of thing I should expect from Senator Phillips—but really a rather unrealistic one. I don't think one can really expect that any government at this stage of the game could say, "Well, let us now set to work to put all wages, prices and salaries—the whole bag of tricks—back to where they were a few years ago."

Senator Greene: Good Tory thinking!

Senator Forsey: Well, I leave these gibes to an accomplished master of the art like Senator Greene.

Senator Flynn: You can leave it to him for sure.

Senator Forsey: I have no intention of trying to rival the wit of either Senator Phillips or Senator Greene.

There is one point on which I think Senator Phillips made a slight mistake, and I have seen the same mistake elsewhere, in the public prints—the newspapers—namely, that the guidelines do not provide for any rectification of disparities between men and women workers. I think this is a mistake. I think if the White Paper is carefully consulted it will be found that in fact this matter is dealt with—that any levelling up of the wages or salaries or other compensation between men and women is expressly excepted from the operation of the guidelines and regulations. That, at least, is my reading of the proposals.

There was perhaps one other point where I think Senator Phillips was a little bit inaccurate, and that is with regard to the powers of the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, of which both he and I are members, and to which he has already made a distinguished contribution, I am happy to add. I think if he examines carefully the criteria which the committee has adopted he will find that while, of course, it is not within its ambit to discuss the basic policy of regulations or other statutory instruments, it is possible for the committee to comment on, not merely the question of ultra vires or intra vires, but also upon the drafting, the clarity or the obscurity of the drafting, and upon whether the regulations or instruments of any other kind impinge unduly upon the liberty of the subject, whether they make an undue or unexpected or startling or extravagant use of the powers conferred by statute, and so forth. There is a long list of criteria adopted by the committee and approved by both houses, to the best of my recollection, which goes beyond the narrow field that Senator Phillips indicated. I think that is a healthy thing, though I must add that personally I look forward with a certain shuddering and horror to the amount of work that is likely to be thrust upon us in that committee with the regulations that will emanate from the various bodies under the legislation which is to be submitted to us.

I am not going to go into the details of this policy because that is a matter which will come before us later when the bill comes to us; and I might add that although I am anxious to see this legislation go into effect as soon as possible, I hope that when the legislation comes to us it will not have attached to it some kind of red sticker saying that it must go through in the course of 24 hours or something of that kind. I think it is necessary that it should be carefully examined by the Senate. I think it is important to the public that it should be carefully examined by the Senate, especially in view of the fact that we have in this chamber an immense reservoir—which is seldom appreciated outside—of political, legal, administrative and business experience which can quite possibly bring about marked improvements in the details of the legislation. So I don't think we should be backward in coming forward and making this reservoir of experience available to the government and the other place and the people of Canada in regard to this legislation.

[Senator Greene.]

Having said that I want to look at certain general features of the policy, prefacing what I have to say with the statement that I don't think there are any easy answers to this question of inflation.

● (1440)

I am constantly astonished by the number of people who are prepared to come forward with a "fit and fair and simple and sufficient" answer, a single answer, to what appears to me to be a very complex problem. I am always suspicious of easy and simple answers. Most of the problems which face us are complicated and anyone who professes a simple answer I think is fooling himself and may be trying to fool his auditors or readers. I do not think there is any simple answer; I do not think there is any one cause for the inflationary problems we face, in common with most of the countries of the Western world. I think, therefore, one has to have a relatively complex policy to deal effectively with these problems.

The first main point I want to make about this policy has to do with the constitutional validity of the legislation which will be before us later. There was an article in the Globe and Mail the other day by Professor J. D. Morton, from one of the law schools in Toronto—I cannot remember which one at the moment—which expressed astonishment that no one had commented on the constitutional problems involved. He then proceeded to comment himself and I must say that, with all my respect for the legal profession and every member of it, and my respect for professors of law in particular, I think he was throughout the article talking through his hat. I do not think the points he made were in any respect valid. The most foolish of them, I thought, was his suggestion that when the Prime Minister and other members of the Cabinet and, by implication, other members of Parliament, spoke in public on this subject and tried to justify the policy, they were in a sense showing contempt for Parliament. That smells like a whiff of Queen Victoria denouncing the Midlothian campaign of Mr. Gladstone, which she thought exceedingly improper. I can see nothing improper, let alone unconstitutional, in ministers or members of Parliament taking to the hustings across the country, or taking to the Rotary clubs, or whatever else it may be, to explain and defend government policy.

The rest of the article was somewhat more serious than that, but the only part of it that I want to make any specific reference to is the question of jurisdiction of this Parliament in comparison with the jurisdiction of the provinces.

It seems to me quite clear that this legislation is within the powers of the Parliament of Canada, even upon the narrow construction of the peace, order and good government power elaborated first by Lord Watson and then by Lord Haldane, which would have whittled that power down to not much more than one to be used in grave national emergencies, of war, or famine, or pestilence on a national scale.

In the Canada Temperance Act case of 1946 Lord Simon, speaking for the Judicial Committee, pretty well threw that emergency doctrine out of the window, but it was hauled back in again the next year by the Judicial Committee in the Japanese Canadians case.

Since the Supreme Court of Canada became the final court of appeal in this country, the Supreme Court, I think, has tended to lean in the direction of the judgment of Lord Simon in the Canada Temperance Federation case and, incidentally, the judgment in Russell vs. The Queen in 1882, and give to the peace, order and good government power something more like the scope which the Fathers of Confederation unquestionably intended it to have.

But even if the courts were to decide that the emergency doctrine still applied in this case, I should consider it quite clear that the time limitation upon the operation of the act brings it squarely within the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the Board of Commerce and Combines and Fair Prices Act case in 1922.

I am, perhaps, stating this in a rather dogmatic-sounding way, which would be very improper for me if I meant it seriously. I give it merely as my humble lay opinion, but it seems to me perfectly clear that even on the Haldane doctrine, in view notably of the decisions in the Fort Frances Power and Paper Company and the Japanese Canadians cases, the courts would be very unlikely to find that this legislation was invalid, because it is simply temporary legislation for a limited period of time, in other words for something that might legitimately be considered a national emergency. I do not think the courts would go behind the opinion of Parliament itself on this matter unless there were very serious ground for believing it was merely colourable legislation.

The next point I want to deal with very briefly is the gibes the government has had to suffer for having changed its mind on this matter of wage and price controls. Well, in the first place I think it is clear that the proposals which the government has made, which it describes as restraint proposals, are not precisely the same as those advocated by the Conservative Party in the last election, but I am not prepared to lay a great deal of stress on this. You can argue it, and you can argue it back and forth, and if our friends in the Conservative Party get any satisfaction out of saying, "I told you so," and, "Ha, ha, now you have changed your minds," I think they are perfectly welcome to it. I am not worried about that. I am inclined to recall the remark of Lord Melbourne when he had changed his mind about the Corn Laws. He said, "We are very much in the habit of taunting each other with having changed our minds. We are always changing our minds all the time. It is nonsense..."—and here I quote verbatim—"It is nonsense to proceed with measures which it is impossible can succeed." So I think that if any government discovers—

Senator Flynn: You should add that you meant in an election it is stupid to advocate something that will not win the election.

Senator Forsey: No; I was not talking about an election at all. I think that any government faced with a situation which appears to it to have changed in a material manner is perfectly entitled to change its mind if it wants to and say, "The proposals which we formerly advocated now appear to be inappropriate and we propose to adopt other proposals which are suitable to the new situation."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Forsey: I do not think this question, however, of whether the government has or has not changed its mind, whether it has seen the light shed abroad by the Conservative Party in the last election, is really very important. We are confronted with a situation which is more serious than to warrant a long discussion of who started which and who said what first, and whether the Liberal Party has stolen the Conservatives' clothes while they were bathing.

Senator Flynn: No, no; they stole the election. That is the difference.

Senator Forsey: Well, I took a very minor part in the election. Possibly Senator Flynn took a larger part and is a better authority on the subject. I think that, perhaps, the experience in the previous election made the Liberal Party rather dubious of my value as an electioneering personage, because I appeared in 13 constituencies in the 1972 election and we lost 10 of them, including the constituency of the honourable Leader of the Government. He very generously forgives me for my share in his defeat.

Senator Flynn: That was not a very difficult task.

Senator Forsey: This time I think I appeared in five, and I suggested to the Prime Minister after the election that perhaps in the next election I should appear in none and then we might get a landslide; however, that's by the way.

In considering this problem of inflation, we must recognize that there are several different types of inflation. On the one hand, there is demand-push inflation; on the other hand, there is cost-push inflation. Cost-push inflation, in its turn, can be divided into two sub-categories: imported cost-push inflation and domestic cost-push inflation. I think that until a relatively recent time the bulk of our inflation was demand-pull, or cost-push imported. Either we were having too large and too rapid an increase in the money supply—and that I shall come to discuss in rather more detail very shortly—or else we were suffering from imported cost-push inflation through the rise in the prices of oil, notably, and of other imported products we could really do very little about in this country. We simply had to put up with it. We could redistribute the burden, of course, but we could not actually stop the thing.

More recently, we have had more, I think, of the other type of cost-push inflation, the type which has manifested itself more particularly in what seem to me excessive demands by the trade unions for wage increases. It rather hurts me, as an old trade union official, to say that there were excessive demands, but I think it is perfectly plain that, in fact, this is so. I can see the reason for it. Everybody can. You want to catch up. You don't want to suffer a fall in your real standard of living. You want if possible to anticipate further inflation so that you won't have to catch up, but will have got there before the prices do.

● (1450)

But the fact remains that if you have got this kind of demand being made, if you are trying constantly to anticipate inflation, you simply feed the flames of inflation and the demands are likely to become greater and greater, again in the perfectly understandable desire either to catch up or even to get ahead of the rise in prices.

So I think that the time had come when it was really necessary to do something about the domestic cost-push inflation. That is what the government's proposal attempts to do.

This could have been done, of course, in several ways. It could have been done, for example, by imposing an immediate total freeze on all wages, salaries, dividends, other forms of compensation, and all prices. This would have involved setting up a very considerable bureaucracy, I should think, and it would also have run certain risks. One of them is illustrated by what has been happening in the province of British Columbia, if I am correctly informed, where the provincial government has imposed a temporary freeze on all prices, and where promptly, it seems, certain shops have said, "Well, in that case we are just not going to buy any more supplies. We are going to run out of supplies and you will find yourselves queuing up for an inadequate amount of supplies in the shops."

That is one danger. You could easily have that. The second danger provides a nice contemporary illustration of Father Ronald Knox's limerick about the young monk of Siberia:

There was a young monk of Siberia
Who of fasting grew wearier and wearier.
At length with a yell
He burst from his cell
And murdered the Father Superior.

Well, if you put on a temporary freeze, it is altogether likely that various people will say, "All right, three months, but then watch us. Then we shall murder the Father Superior. Then we shall go out for a real whacking demand for higher wages. Then we shall raise our prices to compensate ourselves for the losses we have been suffering during this temporary freeze." You run that risk.

In addition to that, of course, if the freeze is for any appreciable length of time, you are up against all sorts of problems of equity. The people who have just got increases are a jump ahead of the game. The people who haven't just got increases will complain bitterly. The companies which have just been making what they consider reasonable profits will feel this is all right for the time being. The ones which have been having hard luck and have been hoping, perhaps with good ground, to improve their position, will feel that they are being discriminated against.

Then, of course, there is also the problem that Senator Phillips referred to, the equitable relationship between men's and women's remuneration. Well, if the freeze is very short, I suppose these things are not too serious.

But I think there is another factor which enters in here. That is the necessity for people to learn long-term restraint in their demands upon the economy. To say this is to run the risk of being labelled a terrible reactionary, a hard-shell ultra Tory, far more conservative than members of the Conservative Party. It is to open oneself to attacks as a grinder of the faces of the poor, somebody who wants to preserve the Establishment and to blaze with the rest of the people. But I think it is necessary that something should be said about this.

The Prime Minister in his broadcast, I think, was relatively cautious in saying that we might have to learn not to expect such large increases year by year. I am afraid that it goes beyond that. I am afraid that in the whole of Western society we are coming to the point, if we have not already reached it, where the better off people at least—how you would define those is a matter of opinion—the better off people at least are going to have to realize that they probably cannot expect to go on getting more every year. We shall have to look after the poor—and my eye lights immediately upon Senator Croll: not that he is one of the poor, but that he is the champion of the poor. We shall have to look after the poor, and we have not been doing it at all successfully, I think we all agree. We shall have to look after the poor in Canada, and we shall have to look after the poor in the hungry two-thirds of the world.

[Senator Forsey.]

I am not for a moment saying that we should preach restraint to these people. They are restrained enough as it is by force of circumstance, willy-nilly. But I do say that for people getting, let us say—drawing a figure out of the air—$15,000 a year or so and up, which will include a good many members of a good many trade unions, we may have to learn that we cannot go on expecting more and more every year. We are going to be faced in the Western world with an increasing problem of scarcities. We are going to be faced more and more with the population explosion. We are going to be faced more and more with the pressure of the Third World, pressure which can express itself even in violent measures.

These, to my mind, are serious problems to which we have got to address ourselves, and during this period of restraint, which the government is proposing, some of these matters will have to be, I think, very seriously considered; matters even graver than those which the Prime Minister outlined in his broadcast.

I may remark parenthetically that it seems to me that on these long-term problems, which I have just been suggesting, the Senate is in a peculiar position to make a special contribution. A good many hard truths may have to be enunciated and a good many hard decisions may have to be taken; and the elected people are in a very difficult position. They can get out only so far ahead of the procession of public opinion, whereas we in the Senate are in a position to say some things that are not popular if we think it is necessary to say them, and to do something of a job of public education in this regard. Doubtless we should do it more effectively if our debates were more fully reported, but I think we have an opportunity and a special duty here, and one which can be performed perhaps by no other part of the political institutions of the country.

Now, the next thing is the question of price control versus wage control, price control versus compensation control. Some people say that the provisions in the policy for price control are worthless, that they won't work, they are not workable, they are ridiculous, that they are a mere mask, that it is really just a matter of the Establishment clamping down upon the working class and making a show of doing something about prices.

My first comment on that must be that it doesn't appear to be the opinion of the Establishment people themselves. I can hardly pick up a newspaper now without seeing something from the chamber of commerce saying that the policy discriminates against business, or without seeing an editorial or an article by a newspaper publisher saying that the freeze on dividends is going to be perfectly terrible and disastrous, both of which comments seem to suggest that the price control features of the legislation will have some effect.

I cannot pick up a newspaper without seeing a comment such as that by the Premier of British Columbia, that he is putting on his temporary price freeze, he doesn't want it to go on beyond the beginning of the year because he thinks by that time the Dominion Government's policy of price control will be effective. Apparently it hasn't got through to a lot of people that this is going to be completely ineffective. I noticed also an article this morning in the Globe and Mail that the price control features of the policy will be a disaster for the department stores. I saw another article saying that the banks would be perhaps harder hit by this, and financial institutions, generally, would be harder hit by this policy than anybody else.

There have been distinct cries from the business world that labour is being treated too generously and the poor, unfortunate business people are getting the short end of the stick. I think one can balance that against the cries on the other side that the price control features of the legislation are pure eyewash, and that the whole thing is just a cover to do the working class in the eye.

I will say this, however, that if the price control features are not effective, reasonably effective, then it will be very difficult indeed to make the rest of the program effective. If it appears to working people that prices are just going sailing up without any kind of control on them at all, and that they are being asked to abide by guidelines which in fact don't apply to the other side of the economy, then I think it will be extremely difficult to prevent the working people of the country from being highly resentful.

I think that people who say the program will not be effective in this respect, or any other, are in duty bound to propose changes, and the government—notably at page 15 of the White Paper—has explicitly asked for suggestions, explicitly asked for proposals to improve the thing.

● (1500)

I do not think the government is under the impression that it has all wisdom and all knowledge under its collective hat. I think it is perfectly ready to receive suggestions and to give them serious consideration. It would be very foolish if it weren't, and I hope those who are so ready to say the thing won't work, or that it is highly imperfect, or that it is biased, or whatever other accusation they choose to level against it, will come forward with evidence of this and come forward with concrete, specific suggestions for improving the program.

As to the control over wages, I think it should be noted that if the price controls are really effective, there will be a tendency to improve real wages. The limitation on increases in money wages will, to some extent, be counter-balanced by the restraint upon prices, so that the real wages will not be eroded in the way that they have been in the past few years by increases in prices.

I think the $600 exemption is too low. I think the figure ought to be higher, and I think it ought to start at a higher level of income than it does. I gather this suggestion has been received with some seriousness—it has come from various quarters—has been received with some seriousness by the government, and I hope it will be taken into account and some change will be made there, because I think it is highly important that it should be, and it will do a great deal to convince the working people of the equity of the proposals.

The same thing is true about pensioners. I noticed that the Canadian Labour Congress has been saying something more should be done about pensioners. Well, if we really succeed in keeping prices within proper, reasonable, limits, this, in itself, will do something for the real income of the pensioners.

These are "ifs," of course, but I have already suggested that if we want this thing to work, we shall certainly have to put real teeth into the price control side of it and make sure that they bite where they should.

On the whole, I am inclined to think that one can perhaps best sum up the intention of the government's proposals on the subject of wages by quoting the distinguished British trade union leader, Mr. Jack Jones, who said, "What we want . . . "—he was speaking for the trade union movement in England and Great Britain generally—" . . . is a fair-for-all, not a free-for-all." So far we have had pretty much of a free-for-all. We have had the trade union version of unadulterated free enterprise, and I think the time has come, when the country is in such a difficult situation economically, that we must change from a free-for-all to a fair-for-all, which I think is what the government's proposals attempt to do.

I am sorry to have to say that my old comrades in the Canadian Labour Congress and some of its unions appear to be proposing, as an alternative to the government's policy, ideas and suggestions which are not particularly relevant or particularly realistic. Some of them, indeed, it seems to me, would only tend to increase inflation. There are others which are more relevant but which, I think, tend to be contradictory of some of the inflation-promoting proposals put forward by the congress.

The next thing I want to speak of is the cry that the real trouble, the real cause of inflation, is the unwarranted, the excessive, the extravagant increase which has taken place in the money supply. I don't think there is any question that the increase in the money supply has been too great. There was strong pressure for this, of course, because nobody was anxious to see unemployment, and everybody agreed that you had to try and ease things so that there would be stimulation of employment when the level of unemployment was already high, disquietingly high, worryingly high. So that I am not particularly blaming anybody. The pressure was there. It was very difficult to resist. No government would have found it easy to resist it. But I think there is no question that the money supply has, as the Canadian Labour Congress says, been increased excessively.

The Canadian Labour Congress, I notice, in its proposal, suggests that the rate of increase in the money supply should be something like 5.5 per cent per year. I don't know how they arrive at that precise figure. I don't particularly care. I don't think it matters very much. But at the same time that they are asking for this, they seem to be claiming that an increase in the bank rate, and rates of interest generally, is altogether unfortunate. Well, I don't know. Perhaps I am altogether out of date in my economics, but I find it very difficult to understand how you can control the increase in the money supply without raising the bank rate, without raising the rate of interest. This is certainly one of the classic tools for regulating the money supply. I don't know how you can get along without it. It is not the only factor. There is another one which I will come to in a moment.

Senator Lamontagne: It can be done.

Senator Forsey: But I think it is necessary to use that classic tool—doubtless, with care; doubtless, at the proper moment—and, alas, in the past, as Senator Lamontagne reminded us a while ago, we have very often used the right tools at the wrong moment, used them in the reverse order from what we should have, but I think in this case there is no doubt that this particular tool has to be used.

Of course, that is not in the least in conflict with special measures for dealing with, for example, housing, as indeed the government proposes to do in the near future, and I hope it will be in the very near future. I hope there won't be any delay in the matter.

The rate of interest is a very blunt tool, and it can be very inequitable in its operations. It may be necessary in certain fields to say, "Well all right, we will, in effect, subsidize this particular field so that the rate of interest restrictions will not bear heavily upon this type of endeavour."

Incidentally, when it comes to the question of money supply, I cannot help wondering—and here I may be very unorthodox and may be talking through my hat—I can't help wondering whether the extraordinary proliferation of credit cards and the zeal with which the issuers of those cards push people to use them—my wife has had an example of this recently: her banker and the credit card people themselves have been after her, "Why don't you make use of your Chargex? This is terrible. You haven't used it once since you got it," she finally gave in and said, "All right, I will use it for some small purchase;" I have forgotten what it was—but I cannot help feeling that this proliferation of credit cards and this pushing of credit cards may have been a considerable factor, in effect, in increasing the money supply and pushing up prices. I occasionally make use of them myself when I am crossing the country and don't want to carry too much in the way of cash with me, but I can't help feeling that they are an inflationary factor.

I see Senator Lamontagne, who is an excellent economist, shaking his head. As I said, I may be talking through my hat, but I would like to hear an argument to show that this is all wrong, because I have worried about it for a long time.

Then we come to the argument that the real culprit in this whole business of inflation is public expenditure, excessive public expenditure. I want to enter a caveat there at once. Public expenditure, in itself, is not inflationary. It is no more inflationary than my expenditures, or anybody else's expenditures. What is inflationary is deficit spending, the piling up of huge deficits which require the government to go into the money market and find capital or, in effect, to print money. This is inflationary, but if you had a balanced budget—and I am not necessarily advocating that at the moment—if you had a balanced budget, there would be nothing inflationary in government expenditure per se. In itself, it is not inflationary.

Senator McDonald: Oh, come on.

Senator Forsey: I think there is a grave danger that when people talk about cutting government expenditures they will overlook this, and the people who dislike government expenditure in itself, who think it is a bad thing in itself, that it is necessarily wasteful in itself, will get a chance to sharpen their knives and dig into the social services, for example, and engage in a thoroughly reactionary policy.

That article in the Globe and Mail the other day by Brigadier Malone was a conspicuous example of this. One after another of the social programs which have been in effect in this country for some years, and have been supported, as far as I know, by all parties, he had his knife sharpened for and he was prepared to cut and to cut deeply, or, if he could, to get the government to cut and cut deeply.

If you are going to start cutting expenditures, you are going to be up against a terrific problem, because a great many of these are statutory and can only be changed by act of Parliament, and a great many are expenditures which everybody has agreed are necessary—social service expenditures, transfers to the provinces, equalization grants, regional incentive grants, and so forth. If those things have to be cut, in the opinion of certain people, let them come forward and say exactly what should be cut, how it should be cut and how much it should be cut. I am afraid that this could be merely a sort of Establishment ramp at the expense of the poor people of this country.

● (1510)

Possibly we could do something with some of the social expenditures by going back to the principle of selectivity, though this has difficulties, administrative and other. But you have got to be extremely careful what you do with these things or else you find yourself pushed into a position which can be justifiably described by that favourite cant word of the people on the left, "reactionary."

If you cut down the social services, the social expenditures, social security, then undoubtedly the burden, a large part of the burden of dealing with inflation will be cast upon the shoulders that can bear it least, the shoulders of the poor. The same is true of a strong application of a restriction of money supply. If you really use the weapon of the rate of interest on a massive scale, sufficient to cut down inflation drastically, then undoubtedly you will produce an enormous amount of unemployment. The main burden of the exercise will fall upon those least able to bear it.

Now, of course, there is a certain amount of waste in public expenditure. Nearly any of us could offer some suggestions. Senator Phillips last night offered one, with which I most cordially agree. He mentioned the Bank of Canada building. What was it called in one of the articles in the Globe and Mail the other day—that extravaganza of public expenditure, that monumental waste of money? I believe it is the highest energy cost building in the whole of Ottawa. I suppose when they started to put it up the energy crisis hadn't appeared and it looked fairly sensible but I hope nothing like this will be repeated.

[Senator Forsey.]

I might add that another example of waste, in my judgment, is the expenditures, considerable expenditures, in themselves not perhaps very large in the whole picture, on the monstrosities, these so-called sculptures, these pieces of artistic pollution of the landscape, which I have referred to before, which I shall doubtless refer to again.

This last—the affair that they have over there in Hull, which I should think is an insult to all the traditional values of French Canada—this last thing I believe cost $85,000.

Senator Flynn: Million.

Senator Forsey: Well, to my mind that was worse than money just down the drain, it was a most scandalous and outrageous performance. You can find other examples of the same sort of thing.

One example of waste, a colossal waste which we have been saved from by Providence—Providence appearing in the unlikely guise of the Government of Ontario—is, of course, the Pickering Airport. Some years ago, I joined with a number of members on the Liberal side of the House of Commons in a letter to the Prime Minister saying we thought this was completely unjustified, completely foolish. I do not think we used the word “imbecile,” but we very well might have. And now, fortunately, that large and wasteful expenditure which I have long been able to see no justification for whatever, we are not going to have. I hope that the lesson has gone home, and that the government generally will be more careful about the kind of thing that they indulge in.

Senator McDonald: What about Mirabel Airport?

Senator Forsey: I was just coming to that. In the case of Mirabel, there may have been rather more excuse because at the time they started that idea it wasn't so clear as I think it is now that air travel is likely to go down rather than up. In fact, it should go down rather than up and it should be used only for long distance travel as otherwise it is wildly uneconomic in the long run, and a major source of pollution of the atmosphere and stratosphere.

What I find very difficult to understand is why in the present circumstances the government had to make such a tremendous splash—perhaps that is “le mot juste”; perhaps that is exactly the word I should use—at the opening of the Mirabel Airport. It appears to have been done with oriental lavishness.

This again may seem to be a small matter but I am astonished by the degree to which the members of the House of Commons, for example—of the other place, sorry, Madam Speaker—members of the other place who presumably ought to know by experience something about public psychology—certainly far more than I could know, as a repeatedly defeated candidate for public office—I am astonished by the degree to which they don't seem to realize public psychology. They don't seem to realize how a small thing can irritate the public and make them doubt the sincerity of those who are asking them to restrain themselves.

It brings to mind the story that Stephen Leacock used to tell about the Ontario election campaign of 1923, where an opposition orator, I presume a Conservative, was attacking the farmer government for its extravagance. He waxed eloquent on how the government wasted $5 million on this, $10 million on this and $20 million on another thing and the farmer audience sat there almost inert, totally unresponsive. And then he said, “Do you realize, ladies and gentlemen, that the premier paid $75 for a coal scuttle?” and the whole place took fire. Millions meant nothing to them. But when you got down to the $75 coal scuttle, that got home to the Ontario farmer.

The same thing is true, I think, about these relatively small things, small examples of what appear to be extravagances, sometimes rather larger examples of what appear to be extravagances. And I am coming now to one which will make me just as popular as a distiller in a temperance meeting, that is the increase in salaries which the members of the two houses voted themselves last spring. Had I been present, I should not only have voted against that, I should have proposed certain amendments similar to those proposed by Mr. Stanley Knowles in the other place.

Unfortunately, I was—I had just undergone an operation—under orders to stay home and not to show my face here; under doctor's orders. I was very greatly disappointed by that because I had wanted to say strongly what my friend Charles Caccia said in the other place, that this was the wrong thing to do at that time, that this was the wrong way to act when we were asking other people to restrain themselves, that it should not have been retroactive and it should not have come into effect until a new Parliament had been elected. I think it was a great psychological mistake, and I think we might—that is water under the bridge now, I suppose—but I think we might now collectively in the two houses redeem ourselves to some extent, if, come January, when we may get, and probably will get under the present law and within the guidelines, a certain increase, we were to pass as it were a self-denying ordinance and say we won't take it. I think this would have—I do not mean individually, I simply say amend the law so we would not get it—I simply say that I think that would have a marked effect upon the public psychology.

Senator Flynn: If that is the only thing needed to support the program of the government, we might do it.

Senator Forsey: I am sorry, I shall have to put on this gadget to hear what Senator Flynn said.

Senator Flynn: If that is the only thing that will help the program of the government to succeed, we might do it.

Senator Forsey: Well, I will not say it is the only thing but I think it is something. As I said, it is not likely to be a popular proposal with members of either house, but I think it is something that should, in fact, be done.

It is, in a sense, a small thing. It is a bagatelle by comparison, for example, with the amount that is involved in increased wages. Sometimes people think that you can compare wages and profits, for example, and say “terrible” if profits go up so much in comparison with wages. There is a gross amount involved, an absolute amount involved which makes a considerable difference. A relatively small increase in wages bulks larger in the total economy—wages and salaries, that is—much larger in the total economy than even a considerable increase in profits. I am not by that saying that an increase in profits is splendid and an increase in wages is bad. I simply say it is a fact we have to consider.

Well, honourable senators, I think I have now said about all that I can usefully say on this subject. I am afraid I have gone on an inordinate length. I have not on the whole, I think, for some time troubled the chamber with long discourses, not since I did my instalment serial, shall we say, on the subject of the report of the Constitution Committee. I do not think that I shall be troubling the house with long discourses in the future. But this was a subject about which I felt strongly. It was a subject about which I had felt I had a certain knowledge and I felt that I should be derelict in my duty, as a member of this house, if I had not placed before my colleagues the opinions which I had formed about the proposals of the government and the legislation which will shortly be coming to us and which, I repeat, I hope we shall have the time and the will to consider carefully, so that we can make suggestions and proposals for improvement in it, if it comes to us from the other place, in what I believe is technically known as a blank and imperfect form.

● (1520)

Senator McDonald: I wonder if I might ask a question of Senator Forsey. He has just given us his opinion with respect to the increase in indemnities for senators and members of the House of Commons. I wonder if he would also give us his opinion with respect to the increases which have been given recently to the senior civil servants.

Senator Forsey: Yes, I would be glad to. I understand that the decision was made on the executive categories back in the summer and that by September about 1,200 of the 1,400 people involved, or something of that sort, had already received the increase, and that the technical details of providing the increase for the other 200 or so—the top lot, at least in so far as salary is concerned—were still in the works, but that the arrangement was only made final either just about the time the guidelines were brought in or just before. I do not know the precise date, but I think that is another case where the government showed a lack of appreciation of popular psychology. I think this was a mistake, a serious mistake.

Again, in the total picture the total amount is rather small, but I cannot help feeling that it has had an unfortunate effect upon the public mind and it would be very heartening if the top people in the public service, who I think are not by any means destitute, were to come forward and say, "We are willing to submit to a self-denying ordinance in this matter."

Senator Greene: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit another question. I would call on his special knowledge of the organized labour movement in this country in prefacing this question. It would seem to me that organized labour has painted itself into a most difficult corner; that they appear to have said, "Plague the national interest. It is not our affair. We are looking after number one." But I do not believe that that is the real view of organized labour, and the question I would ask my honourable friend is whether or not he would deem it advisable to ask the CLC and other major union leaders to come before an appropriate committee of this Senate to explain their views in order that we might better understand why it is that they apparently have denied any responsibility for participation in the total national program.

[Senator Forsey.]

Senator Forsey: I think it would be excellent to have them appear before a committee. I think they would immediately say, by way of preface to anything more detailed, that their view of what was required in the national interest was somewhat different from other people's views, and I think they would proceed to try to justify that position. I hope, if they do come before such a committee, that they will not be treated as I have known them to be treated at times when I appeared before a Senate committee as one of their representatives. There was a tendency then for various senators to take the line, "These people are a lot of good-for-nothings, not to say thugs. We have been waiting for years to get a chance to go after them. Now watch us!"

We had completely irrelevant questions of a most hostile kind directed to us. I hope, if they do come before a Senate committee, they will not find themselves faced with that kind of thing.

The culminating feature of one of these affairs—it was before the Senate Committee on Immigration, I remember, years ago—was when a certain Conservative senator whose views were such that he would have regarded the first Duke of Wellington as dangerously far to the left, said to Mr. Percy Bengough, the President of the Trade and Labor Congress, "Mr. Bengough, there is a question I have wanted to ask you for years..."—and it had absolutely nothing to do with immigration, I might add—"...and it is this..." and he got off a stinker of a question. As poor Percy opened his mouth to reply, and before he could get out one syllable, out the door went the senator and slammed it behind him. Well, that was an extreme manifestation of hostility to the trade union movement by one senator. But I can assure honourable senators that on that occasion, and some others when I appeared before the Senate committee as a representative of the trade union movement, the kind of atmosphere that prevailed was quite hostile and it was very unfortunate for the Senate.

I would hope that if the trade union representatives are called upon to appear, and if they do appear, they will be asked relevant and serious questions and will be treated with the courtesy which ordinarily distinguishes both the members of this house individually and this house collectively.

I think it is an excellent suggestion on the part of Senator Greene and I heartily hope it will be adopted. This is exactly the kind of thing I think the appropriate Senate committee could usefully do in connection with this legislation.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that I want to associate myself with the remarks of Senator Forsey as they relate to the White Paper. At the same time, let me disassociate myself from his remarks relative to the non-application of the guidelines to members of this chamber. I think that would be tokenism of the worst kind. The Canadian public would not be fooled by that, and it has been my experience that they generally accept what is fair but reject what is unfair. If it was fair to have a guideline applying to other throughout the whole of society, they would expect its application here as well. But, in my opinion, they would react adversely if there was some obvious unfairness. These are some of the things I should like to speak to briefly in reviewing the White Paper.

I think it might be helpful to share with you the views of someone who comes from British Columbia, who has been regulated, ordered back to work, guided, legislated, and anything else you could possibly name. It would be well to examine briefly what took place in British Columbia when Bill 146 was passed in the British Columbia legislature. That bill had the effect of legislating virtually all of the major strikes out of existence and forcing the workers back to work.

My organization, with a membership of 106, was one of the key organizations involved. The whole thread of the legislation passed by this special session of the legislature was to legislate 106 people back to work while ignoring the fact that there were 50,000 other workers who had been out for three months. I think I am entitled to comment, because I believe that our constant protest in drawing to the premier's attention that he could not in good conscience legislate 106 people back to work while ignoring 50,000 others finally got through to him, and he took very positive action. I have no hesitation, having been the victim of that positive action, in saying that under the circumstances the premier of British Columbia did exactly the right thing.

It was interesting to hear in the discussion a concern about what would be the reaction of the official labour movement of British Columbia in response to this legislation. There was some concern that there would be the typical reaction—that of urging defiance of the legislation, encouraging the members to defy and not go back. I was asked for my view and I gave it, and I repeat it now, that I felt that that reaction would take place, that that advice would be given but that it would be drowned out by the sounds of the members returning to work, the majority of whom had had enough and wanted to return to work. And that was the ultimate result.

It is not a happy situation or a happy state of affairs that we in labour and management can reach the stage of almost total irresponsibility. We could not find a solution to those long-standing problems. I think it was perhaps because we could not break the psychological barriers. That will be a major consideration when the White Paper ultimately becomes law.

Following the announcement of the proposed guidelines nationally, first, the province of British Columbia imposed a price freeze; then came a rather irresponsible response from the official labour movement; and we now have the other side, the supermarkets, indicating that they will have no alternative but to let the shelves run dry. Their contribution to the problem facing the country will be to let the shelves run dry, because in filling them they might have to take a loss on a particular item or items.

Of course, there are some supermarkets—I have no hesitation in naming them—such as Canada Safeway, which, in my view, are the worst corporate citizens in Canada. They have never had any real concern about the impact of what they do on the economy. So long as they can preserve their share of the market they will agree to anything at any price, because they can always pass it on. The real test of the provincial legislation and of the federal legislation will be the ability of either government to say to the supermarkets, "You are not going to leave your shelves empty. You are going to continue to service the needs of your customers—that is what your business licence provides—and if you do not perhaps we shall have to re-examine your role in this society." It is not going to be sufficient to say, at the end of the 60 days, as was indicated, "We will wait. We will now recover retroactively all we have lost. There will be no sacrifice on our part. We will simply reach into the consumers' pocket and recover it." If they are allowed to get away with that by either agency of government, then you cannot and should not expect the cooperation of the labour movement.

● (1530)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lawson: When I am examining the proposed legislation, I am not interested in relating it to the constitutionality question. There are others more expert than I who will concern themselves about that. The main reason I am not concerned about it is that if we resolve the constitutional question, the question still remains of whether it would solve the problem. I do not think it would, because we still have the problem of runaway inflation and all the other problems that that creates.

The only question I have to ask myself is: Is there a need for this kind of action? Is there a consensus in the country? Well, certainly I am convinced, from all the people I am in contact with, that there is a desperate need for something to be done. Whether this is the best course of action has yet to be determined, but certainly there is a consensus that something desperately needs to be done. In examining these matters, and trying to do it as objectively as I can, I think the important question that arises is: What are the obvious, visible weaknesses? Senator Forsey touched on one, the question of the limit of $600 for those with lower incomes. On the face of it, if all things stay even for the three-year period, then that gap between the lower rated people and the higher rated people will be widened by an additional $5,400, and it is totally and patently unfair that that should take place. There is, therefore, a need for an immediate adjustment on the ceiling for lower rated people.

One other major area that in my view needs to be examined very carefully is the question of interest rates. I think the first step that should be taken and could be taken is an immediate roll-back of the three-quarters of 1 per cent increase in the prime rate that was announced not many months ago. It was announced for its deflationary value for the economy. If it had had the desired impact there would have been no need for the proposed guidelines, so there seems to be no valid reason in my view why there could not be an immediate roll-back of that increase of three-quarters of 1 per cent, not only for its own value but for its psychological impact. If that cannot be done, then I would think the government has to give serious consideration to allowing write-offs for the mortgages on the average home up to a certain limit. Let them write it off as a tax-free allowance.

The two most important things that have to be dealt with in order to achieve the voluntary enthusiastic support of the working man are really both psychological. One is the preservation of his job security, and the second is the protection of his home, so that he can go home and look his wife and children in the eye, knowing that they are protected.

It is totally unfair, on the one hand, to say, "We are raising the interest rates. We are going to put you in a position where the interest you pay on your mortgage amounts almost to usury," and on the other, to say, "We are now going to tie your hands behind your back and not allow you to recover those increased costs of your basic dwelling—your basic security."

These are two critical areas that in my view have to be attacked, and attacked quickly, if we are going to get the support of labour. I am not talking about the official position of the Canadian Labour Congress. This is something that has to be done if the government wants the support of working men and women across the country.

There are a couple of other areas that have to be examined. What is going to happen to people who have signed multi-year contracts is patently unfair, on the face of it. Just before the deadline they were successful in signing contracts that in the second year provide for increases of 15, 20, 25 or 30 per cent. Is there to be a roll-back, or is that to remain? Is everybody else to be limited to 6 per cent in the second year, and are these contracts going to continue? This is the question that has most often been asked of me in the two weeks since these proposed guidelines were announced. What happens in those cases?

Also, what happens in the case of people who want to follow and support the guidelines, and who can go out tomorrow and negotiate a three-year contract providing for 8 per cent the first year, 6 per cent in the second year and 4 per cent in the third year? What happens to those contracts if the government decides after one year that the problem has been solved, and cancels the guidelines, and everybody else goes back to getting 12, 15, 18 or 20 per cent? What happens to those people who are locked into such contracts?

We have an interesting case pending before the British Columbia Labour Relations Board right now. It was the key issue that prompted the legislation in British Columbia, and it involved the propane dispute. Some months ago, long before the guidelines were announced, the employers made an offer, and the employees of four of the companies accepted. Under the law, you must conclude a collective agreement. The employers' association said, "No. We will not sign." There was then an application under the labour code of British Columbia for an order directing that those contracts be executed. I believe the board will issue such an order, and so those contracts will be executed retroactive to a date in August. That may be done next week, and the rates involved will be higher than the guidelines. What will apply in those circumstances? Will they be rolled back? Will they be cut back? These are the kinds of questions that have to be answered, and I think perhaps you may have a constitutional problem if the British Columbia Legislature says, "Yes, it is a contract back to August." Is the federal legislation going to roll it back? These are the kinds of questions and concerns that have to be dealt with.

In addition to the probably more important question, the strike involved was a matter of cutting off fuel to homes in an area of Nanaimo that was dependent on that particular product—butane and propane. Not only do I not quarrel with the judgment of the government in legislating those striking workers back to work, but I think the government has a more serious question it has to ask of itself, and that is: What do you do with essential services? Does either labour or management have the right—and was a lockout at the outset—to deny fuel to homes? Is that an essential service? And if it is not, what is?

In those clearly defined essential services where a strike would cause injury to individuals, perhaps the right to strike has to be examined, in an effort to decide whether that right should be continued. I think we, labour or management, now have to decide whether we can continue to exercise our rights at the expense of injury to innocent people.

There has been some concern about the views expressed by the official body of labour, the Canadian Labour Congress, that Senator Forsey made reference to. It is interesting to note that when the Trades Union Congress in Britain was successful in achieving some amendments to their program they issued a statement, and I can think of nothing better than that it be delivered to the Canadian Labour Congress, and that they be asked to take these words and simply adopt them as a statement of policy, indicating their preparedness to assume their share of the sacrifice. Let me read this to you:

Britain is staring over the brink of a precipice. Inflation is running at 26 per cent and unemployment is at the highest level since the last war.

The TUC's anti-inflation policies, agreed with the Government and overwhelmingly endorsed at the Blackpool Congress, are designed to deal with very real dangers.

We have been hit by international problems—soaring import costs, a world recession hitting export markets—and our industry suffers from decades of low investment.

It's no good just complaining about the rest of the world. The TUC and its member unions recognize that all of us, right here in Britain, have a vital part to play in solving the crisis. No one can afford to contract out of the battle against inflation. It's everyone's future at stake.

The crisis cannot be solved, and our future assured without real sacrifices. Some people's living standards are bound to fall in the coming year.

That is necessary because the Government cannot just spend its way out of this recession, at a time when our inflation rate is so much higher than our competitors'.

It is estimated that by the end of the year our prices will be rising twice as fast as those of our main competitors.

Our goods are in danger of being priced out of export markets—and with them the jobs of workers in the export industries.

Too-rapid reflation would only force up prices faster, before inflation has been got under control.

That would also threaten the credit on which our economy survives. Already, before the Governmeand the TUC acted, there were threats from those who lent Britain money to pull out. That would hit thousands more jobs.

The alternative to the '£6' policy, then, is not less unemployment, it is longer dole queues—much longer. The '£6' policy makes it easier, not harder, to defend living standards in the long run.

So the TUC 'bit the bullet' and put its '£6' proposals to the Government. The new wage targets are tough, but they're rough justice. And they're simple enough to be understood by all.

They favour the lower-paid, while some of those with very high incomes will get no increase at all.

For its part, the Government must do its best to continue the social and industrial progress made during the first year of the Social Contract, and to hold down prices.

The TUC and the Government have never seen the close working relationship known as the Social Contract as merely a way of avoiding the worst. The aims are positive—a more prosperous, successful and compassionate society.

The £6 limit on its own will not solve Britain's problems. It can only create the conditions for tackling them. The year's hard slog must be more than a short-term crisis measure. It must be the start of a plan for economic revival.

• (1540)

That's why the TUC is now pressing the Government to work on a national plan, agreed with unions and employers, for the years up to 1980. An ivory tower approach would be useless. Planning must be brought to company level, and there must be union involvement.

There is plenty more to be done to crack the immediate crisis too. There must be government action to curb unemployment among the hardest-hit groups of workers, involving increased training, employment subsidies, and some selective import controls.

The trade union movement will be watching employment, prices, indeed all the important economic indicators, with an eagle eye, to see that its members' sacrifices are gaining their just reward.

A particular concern at the moment is that there should not be savage public expenditure cuts, which would harm everyone, especially the most vulnerable members of society, and would fuel the fires of unemployment at the worst possible time.

And what about our side of the bargain? I believe that there is a new mood in the country. The offensive against inflation has not been dictated from above.

It stems from the fears of ordinary trade unionists for their living standards, their jobs, their country.

That's why, in the midst of the present grim atmosphere, I remain optimistic for Britain's future.

But of course, hopes are not the same thing as achievements. Success depends on the free decisions of millions of people—including the readers of this paper.

Fortunately, the signs are that the mass of trade unionists are very well aware of the reasons why we all have to face a year of tough justice on wages.

They are saying 'fair enough' if it means we can battle our way out of our present problem.

That seems to me to be a very positive and intelligent statement from the official Trades Union Congress of Britain, and one which our neighbours across the way might be well advised to accept as a policy and as their share of the sacrifice to solve the problem here in Canada. There is a statement by Prime Minister Wilson that is worth repeating, "One man's pay rise is not only another man's price rise; it might also cost him his own job—or his neighbour's job."

The other comment I should like to make has reference to the American controls. I cannot tell you how many times I have read that they were a total and abject failure, and did not serve the purpose they were supposed to achieve. Well, I have had the opportunity on a regular basis to be involved with those controls and to observe their imposition, because of our international union involvement. I know that they were imposed at 5½ per cent, and they were enforced at 5½ per cent, and when the controls came off the standard statement was made that with the end of controls we would go to 15, 20, 25 or 30 per cent to recover everything immediately. But I sat in on many meetings where it was said, "Now, we will run the risk of going to perhaps 2 or 2½ per cent higher than the 5½ per cent control figure, but we are not going to take any chances on the controls coming back." So, in the first year after the controls came off they were around 7½ or 8 per cent. It is my case that the controls had a beneficial effect, because now in 1975—and the report is just out—the average wage increase generally in the United States is running at 7.9 per cent. The average wage increase in construction, which has always led the pack, was 7.4 per cent while in this country we "spill" that much in construction negotiations, and many settlements are made at around 40 or 50 per cent.

I am not arguing in favour of controls; I am simply trying to make an objective appraisal of what has happened, and stripping it of all its myths. I think the only conclusion one can reach is that the controls in the United States were effective when they were practised and in operation, and they continue to have that beneficial effect up until this day. The reason for part of my concern, and the Honourable Leader of the Government was present when I expressed it in Vancouver some months ago, is that we now have companies in British Columbia in particular, and in Canada generally, whose rates of pay are higher than their American competition, and our productivity is less. You do not need to be an economic genius to figure out that if you continue that practice you simply put those companies out of business, and put your own members in the unemployed ranks. To me that is the height of stupidity and is not serving the welfare of the members of trade unions.

There is some considerable talk about the loopholes that exist in the program. I do not doubt that Mr. Pepin is quite correct when he says that there are many loopholes in the program. I think it is going to be imperative that the government take into consideration that they have competent people from labour as well as the other groups represented on those various panels, whether it is the national panel or the regional panel, so that you have people expert in finding loopholes. Indicating a willingness to work with and under the controls is not any indication that in any of the organizations I am associated with we do not have the skill or the imagination to find the loopholes as well, but I do not think that that negative case should be made. I think there should be a positive case made that we are not going to be looking and searching for loopholes, but that we are going to be looking for the courage and concern to assume our share of the sacrifice and relieve those who have already carried too big a load.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Is he in favour of strict adherence to the guidelines?

Senator Lawson: I am in favour of observing the law. If they become the law, then I am in favour of adhering to them.

Senator Walker: I am glad to hear that, and, of course, I am always glad to hear my friend express answers from other people in advance. This time he hit the nail on the head. That is the first time I have ever heard of his being right.

May I ask another question? The Post Office dispute is a serious one. Does the honourable senator believe that the guidelines should be followed in settling the Post Office strike?

Senator Lawson: I don't want it to sound as though I am taking up everything, but I think it would be unwise and untimely to attempt to answer that question when the matter is apparently at a very critical balance of negotiation now. I can only say that when the guidelines become law they should apply with equal force to everybody covered by them.

Senator Forsey: I wonder if I might ask Senator Lawson one question? He spoke of the desirability of having unions declare that they would abide by the guidelines; to come forward and take their share of the sacrifice. Would he express the same hope about the corporations involved in this also, and which so far have been singularly lacking as far as I can see, in making any statement of the sort?

Senator Lawson: Without any hesitation, Senator Forsey. I think it has to be applied equally and with equal force on the corporations and everybody else. If it is not, then the program is self-defeating.

Senator Burchill: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Lawson a question? Does he favour long-term controls, or short-term controls such as they had in the United States of 60 days or 90 days?

Senator Lawson: I do not believe that they were considered short-term controls in the United States. They had the various phases, but they really lasted for two or three years. I do not believe that anything could be achieved—and I do not want to make this a political statement—by 90-day controls. I think they have to be for a longer term than that. If they are to be effective it must be for the lifetime of a collective agreement and the average would be one year—not less than one year—or two years.

Senator Goldenberg: As a trade union leader, Senator Lawson, which do you prefer—the maximum percentage increase which is provided for in the proposed controls, or the flat £6 maximum increase to which you referred and which applied under the United Kingdom policy?

● (1550)

Senator Flynn: Incentives.

Senator Lawson: If the object is a kind of redistribution of the wealth to give the lower-income people a fair share then the £6 provision, or the fixed dollar increase, is the fairest way to do it.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1317.)

RULES OF THE SENATE

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

Wednesday, 29th October, 1975.

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, having examined the Rules of the Senate pursuant to Rule 67(1)(e), recommends that the said Rules be amended as follows:

RECOMMENDED AMENDMENTS

1. In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either house of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

3. Notwithstanding anything in these rules, any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended, and the reason for the proposed suspension, being distinctly stated.

3. These rules shall come into force on a day to be fixed by order of the Senate.

14. When the Senate adjourns, senators shall stand until the Speaker has left the chamber.

4A. (1) If, during any adjournment of the Senate, the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting by sending a notice to each senator at the latest address of the senator filed with the Clerk of the Senate, informing the senator of the time of the meeting.

(2) Non-receipt by a senator of the notice referred to in subsection (1) does not affect the validity of the notice.

(3) In the absence of the Speaker, or where the office of Speaker is vacant, the Clerk of the Senate may act for the purposes of this rule.

5. The Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide points of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate. In explaining a point of order or practice the Speaker shall state the rule or authority applicable to the case. When the Speaker rises, all other Senators shall remain seated or shall resume their seats.

6. A Senator shall not speak more than once to a question before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter.

7. A Senator who has moved the second reading of a bill made a substantive motion or an inquiry, shall have the right of final reply.

PRESENT RULES

1. In all cases not provided for hereinafter, or by sessional or other orders, the standing orders, the rules, usages, forms and proceedings of the Parliament of Canada, in force up to the day on which the present rules go into operation, shall be followed so far as they can be applied to the proceedings of the Senate or any committee thereof.

3. Any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended, and the reason for the proposed suspension, being distinctly stated.

6. These rules shall go into operation on a day to be fixed by order of the Senate.

14. When the Senate adjourns, senators shall keep their places until the Speaker has left the chamber.

NEW RULE

15. The Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide points of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate. In explaining a point of order or practice he shall state the rule or authority applicable to the case.

28. A senator shall not speak twice to a question before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter.

29. A senator who has moved the second reading of a bill or made a substantive motion shall have a right of final reply, but not otherwise.

32. A debate shall not be in order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the interrogation and by the senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer shall not be allowed.

34A. The content of a speech made in the House of Commons in the current session may be summarized, but it is out of order to quote from such a speech unless it be a speech of a Minister of the Crown in relation to government policy. A Senator may always quote from a speech made in a previous session.

36. (1) When a question is under debate, a motion shall not be received unless it is a motion to amend the question, to refer the question to a committee, to adjourn the debate, to postpone the debate to a certain day, for the previous question, or for the adjournment of the Senate.

(3) The previous question refers to a motion "that the original question be now put." Such a motion may be made on a main motion, or on a main motion as amended, but not on a motion for an amendment. When such a motion is put by the Speaker no motion to amend it is in order. It is debatable and senators who have spoken on the main motion or on the main motion as amended may speak again to the previous question but may not move or second it. If the motion for the previous question carries, the Speaker must immediately put the original question without further debate. If the motion for the previous question is defeated, the main motion is dropped from the orders of the day. The previous question may not be moved in committee of the whole or in any select committee.

37. A senator called to order by the Speaker shall discontinue his remarks and may not speak further, except on the point of order, until the point of order has been decided.

42. The Speaker shall stand head uncovered when speaking to the Senate, and shall leave the chair when participating in a debate on any question before the House but not when addressing the House on a point of order or a question of privilege.

45. (1)

(f) for the adoption of a report from any standing committee;

46. (f) for the adjournment of the Senate, while a matter is under discussion;

(g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the orders of the day;

French version only—

(g) l'ajournement du Sénat afin de permettre que soit étudiée, avant que la Chambre passe à l'ordre du jour, une affaire urgente d'intérêt public (dont l'auteur de la motion doit exposer la nature dès qu'il se lève pour prendre la parole);

French version only—

(s) d'autres motions purement courantes ou non contentieuses.

32. A debate shall not be in order on a mere interrogation, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the interrogation and by the senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer shall not be allowed.

NEW RULE

36. (1) When a question is under debate a motion shall not be received unless to amend it, to refer it to a committee, to postpone it to a certain day, for the previous question, or for the adjournment of the Senate.

(3) The previous question refers to a motion "that the original question be now put." Such a motion may be made on a main motion, or on a main motion as amended, but not on a motion for an amendment. When such a motion is put by the Speaker no motion to amend it is in order. It is debatable and senators who have spoken on the main motion or on the main motion as amended may speak again to the previous question but may not move or second it. If the motion for the previous question carries, the Speaker must immediately put the original question without further debate. If it is defeated, the main motion is dropped from the orders of the day. The previous question may not be moved in committee of the whole or in any select committee.

37. A senator called to order shall sit down and shall not proceed until the point of order has been decided.

42. The Speaker shall stand uncovered when speaking to the Senate, and shall leave the chair when he proposes to address the House on any question other than a point of order or question of privilege.

45. (1)

(f) for the adoption of a report, not merely formal in its character, from any standing committee;

46. (f) for the adjournment of the senate, while a question is under discussion;

(g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a question of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the orders of the day;

French version only—

(g) l'ajournement de la séance afin de permettre que soit étudiée, avant que la Chambre passe à l'ordre du jour, une question urgente d'intérêt public (dont l'auteur de la motion doit exposer la nature dès qu'il se lève pour prendre la parole);

French version only—

(s) d'autres questions purement courantes ou non contentieuses.

54. (1) In any bill originating in the Senate amending any statute or part thereof, the amendments shall be made by clauses that re-enact the section, subsection or other minor division as it is amended and shall not ordinarily be made by clauses that add or leave out words or substitute words for others.

(2) The text of any such bill shall indicate a comparative print of that part of the bill making the amendment and of the statute or part thereof proposed to be amended, showing by italics, parallel columns or other appropriate typographical devices the omissions and insertions that would be made by the bill if enacted as proposed.

(3) An explanatory note outlining briefly the reasons for each amendment shall accompany the bill. Whenever practicable an explanatory note shall be printed on the right-hand page of the bill in paragraphs opposite the amendments referred to and numbered correspondingly.

(4) This rule shall as far as practicable apply to the reprinting of any such bill.

56. The principle of a bill is usually debated at its second reading.

66. (1) At the commencement of each session a committee of selection consisting of nine senators named by the Senate shall be appointed whose duty it shall be to nominate the senators to serve on the several select committees.

67. (1)

(f) The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

English version only—

67. (k)

(i) banking, insurance, trust and loan companies, credit societies, caisses populaires and small loans companies;

67. (1)

(g) The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to foreign and commonwealth relations generally, including:

- (i) treaties and international agreements;
- (ii) external trade;
- (iii) foreign aid;
- (iv) defence;
- (v) immigration;
- (vi) territorial and offshore matters.

54. (1) All bills introduced in the Senate shall be in the English and French languages.

(2) In a bill amending any statute or part thereof, the amendments shall be made by clauses which re-enact the section, subsection or other minor division as it is amended and shall not ordinarily be made by clauses which add or leave out words or substitute words for others.

(3) The text of the bill shall indicate a comparative print of that part of the bill making the amendment and of the statute or part thereof proposed to be amended, showing by stricken-through type and italics, parallel columns or other appropriate typographical devices the omissions and insertions which would be made by the bill if enacted as proposed.

(4) A memorandum by the draftsman explaining briefly the reasons for each amendment shall accompany the bill. Whenever practicable the memorandum shall be printed on the right-hand page of the bill in paragraphs opposite the amendments referred to and numbered correspondingly.

(5) This rule shall as far as practicable apply to the reprinting of bills.

56. The principle of a bill is debated at its second reading.

66. (1) At the commencement of each session a committee of selection consisting of nine senators named by the Senate shall be appointed whose duty it shall be to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees.

67. (1)

(f) The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to internal economy, budgetary matters and administration generally.

67. (k)

(i) banking, insurance, trust and loan companies, credit societies, caisses populaires and small loans;

67. (1)

(g) The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to foreign and commonwealth relations generally, including:

- (i) treaties and international agreements;
- (ii) external trade;
- (iii) foreign aid;
- (iv) defence;
- (v) immigration;
- (vi) territorial and offshore matters.

67. (1)

(h) The Senate Committee on National Finance, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to federal estimates generally, including:

- (i) national accounts and the report of the Auditor General;
- (ii) government finance.

67. (1)

(i) The Senate Committee on Transport and Communications composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to transport and communications generally, including:

- (i) transport and communications by land, air, water, and space, whether by radio, telephone, telegraph, wire, cable, microwave, wireless, television, satellite, broadcasting, postal communications or any other form, method or means of communications or transport;
- (ii) tourist traffic;
- (iii) common carriers;
- (iv) pipelines, transmission lines and energy transmission;
- (v) navigation, shipping and navigable waters.

67. (1)

(j) The Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to legal and constitutional matters generally, including:

- (i) federal-provincial relations;
- (ii) administration of justice, law reform and all matters related thereto;
- (iii) the judiciary;
- (iv) all essentially juridical matters;
- (v) private bills not otherwise specifically assigned to another committee, including those related to marriage and divorce.

67. (1)

(k) The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to banking, trade and commerce generally, including:

- (i) banking, insurance, trust and loan companies, credit societies, caisses populaires and small loans companies;
- (ii) customs and excise;
- (iii) taxation legislation;
- (iv) patents and royalties;
- (v) corporate and consumer affairs;
- (vi) bankruptcy;
- (vii) natural resources and mines.

67. (1)

(h) The Senate Committee on National Finance, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to federal estimates generally, including:

- (i) national accounts and the report of the Auditor General;
- (ii) government finance.

67. (1)

(i) The Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to transport and communications generally, including:

- (i) transport and communications by land, air, water, and space, whether by radio, telephone, telegraph, wire, cable, microwave, wireless, television, satellite, broadcasting, postal communications or any other form, method or means of communications or transport;
- (ii) tourist traffic;
- (iii) common carriers;
- (iv) pipelines, transmission lines and energy transmission;
- (v) navigation, shipping and navigable waters.

67. (1)

(j) The Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to legal and constitutional matters generally, including:

- (i) federal-provincial relations;
- (ii) administration of justice, law reform and all matters related thereto;
- (iii) the judiciary;
- (iv) all essentially juridical matters;
- (v) private bills not otherwise specifically assigned to another committee, including those related to marriage and divorce.

67. (1)

(k) The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to banking, trade and commerce generally, including:

- (i) banking, insurance, trust and loan companies, credit societies, caisses populaires and small loans;
- (ii) customs and excise;
- (iii) taxation legislation;
- (iv) patents and royalties;
- (v) corporate and consumer affairs;
- (vi) bankruptcy;
- (vii) natural resources and mines.

67. (1)

(1) The Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to health, welfare and science generally, including:

- (i) veterans affairs;
- (ii) Indian and Eskimo affairs;
- (iii) health and welfare;
- (iv) social and cultural matters;
- (v) pensions;
- (vi) labour legislation;
- (vii) aging.

67. (1)

(m) The Senate Committee on Agriculture, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to agriculture.

68. The senators occupying the recognized positions of Leader of the Government and Leader of the Opposition in the Senate shall be ex officio members, in addition to the number of appointed senators, of all standing committees of the Senate and of the Committee of Selection.

69. The Clerk of the Senate shall, as soon as practicable after a committee has been appointed, call an organization meeting of the committee, and the committee shall at that meeting choose a chairman.

70A. A quorum is required whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken by a select committee, but any such committee, by resolution thereof, may authorize the chairman to hold meetings to receive and authorize the printing of evidence when a quorum is not present.

74. (2) Deleted.

77. (6) Except as provided in these rules, a select committee shall not, without the approval of the Senate, adopt any special procedure or practice that is inconsistent with the practices and usages of the Senate itself.

78. (5) When the report recommends amendments to a bill, or makes proposals that require implementation by the Senate, consideration of the report shall not be moved unless notice has been given pursuant to rule 44(1)(e) or 45(1)(f), as the case may be.

67. (1)

(1) The Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to health, welfare and science generally, including:

- (i) veterans affairs;
- (ii) Indian and Eskimo affairs;
- (iii) health and welfare;
- (iv) social and cultural matters;
- (v) pensions;
- (vi) labour legislation;
- (vii) aging.

67. (1)

(m) The Senate Committee on Agriculture, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to agriculture.

68. The senators occupying the recognized positions of Leader of the Government and Leader of the Opposition in the Senate shall be ex officio members, in addition to the number of appointed senators, of all standing committees of the Senate.

69. A select committee shall meet, if practicable, on the next sitting day after appointment and shall choose a chairman.

NEW RULE

74. (2) The mover of a motion which established a special committee shall have the right to nominate the senators to serve on such committee: Provided that at the request of three senators nominations shall be as follows. Each senator shall vote openly for one senator to serve as a member of such committee, and those senators for whom the largest number of votes are given shall constitute the committee.

NEW RULE

78. (5) When the report recommends amendments to a bill, or makes proposals which require legislative implementation by the Senate, a motion to adopt the report shall be in order: Provided that where the recommended amendments or proposals which require legislative implementation are substantial, consideration of the report shall be postponed to a future day.

90. Any person seeking to obtain a private bill shall deposit with the Clerk of the Senate, if it is intended that the Bill shall originate in the Senate, a copy of such Bill in the English or French language, with a sum sufficient to pay for its translation and printing. The applicants shall also pay the Clerk of the Senate before introduction of the Bill in the Senate a sum of $200.00 together with the cost of printing the Act in the Statutes.

100. A substantial amendment may not be proposed to any private bill in a committee of the whole or on the motion for third reading of the bill unless notice of the same shall have been given on a previous day.

113. If for two consecutive sessions of Parliament a senator has failed to give his attendance in the Senate, the Clerk shall report the same to the Senate, and the matter of such vacancy shall be heard and determined by the Senate with all convenient speed.

French version only—

113. Lorsque durant deux sessions consécutives un sénateur n'a pas fait acte de présence au Sénat, le greffier est tenu à en faire rapport au Sénat et le Sénat doit, avec toute la diligence possible examiner et régler cette affaire de vacance de siège.

114. Within the first twenty sitting days of the first session of each Parliament, every senator shall make and file with the Clerk a renewed Declaration of Property Qualification, in the form prescribed in the Fifth Schedule annexed to the British North America Act, 1867, and immediately after the expiration of such period the Clerk shall lay upon the table of the Senate a list of the senators who have complied with this rule.

90. Any person seeking to obtain a private bill shall deposit with the Clerk of the Senate, if it is intended that the bill shall originate in the Senate, a copy of such bill in the English or French language, with a sum sufficient to pay for the translation of the same by the officers of the Senate and for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 in French. The applicants shall also pay the Clerk of the Senate, immediately after the second reading and before the consideration of the bill by the committee to which it is referred, a sum of $200.00 with the cost of printing the Act in the Statutes, and lodge the receipt for the same with the clerk of such committee.

100. An important amendment may not be proposed to any private bill in a committee of the whole or on the motion for third reading of the bill unless notice of the same shall have been given on a previous day.

113. If for two consecutive sessions of Parliament a senator has failed to give his attendance in the Senate, the Clerk shall report the same to the Senate, and the question of such vacancy shall be heard and determined by the Senate with all convenient speed.

French version only—

113. Lorsque durant deux sessions consécutives un sénateur n'a pas fait acte de présence au Sénat, le greffier est tenu à en faire rapport au Sénat et, la question de vacance de siège étant ainsi posée, le Sénat doit, avec toute la diligence possible, l'examiner et la régler.

114. Within the first twenty days of the first session of each Parliament, every senator shall make and file with the Clerk a renewed Declaration of Property Qualification, in the form prescribed in the Fifth Schedule annexed to the British North America Act, 1867, and immediately after the expiration of such period the Clerk shall lay upon the table of the Senate a list of the senators who have complied with this rule.

Respectfully submitted,

HARTLAND de M. MOLSON,

Chairman.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 30, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Communiqué issued following the Federal-Provincial Conference of Attorneys General held at Halifax, October 23-24, 1975.

Copies of contracts between the Government of Canada and the Municipalities of Neguac, New Brunswick, and Steinbach, Manitoba, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TABLED

Senator Langlois, on behalf of Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee on National Finance with regard to its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it, authorized by the Senate on December 5, 1974.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 4, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give the customary brief summary of the work we can expect in the Senate and its committees for the next week.

First, the schedule of committee meetings: The Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region will meet Monday at 3.30 p.m. A meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service has been set down for 11 a.m. on Tuesday. On the same day, at 2.30 p.m., there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to consider the Green Paper on Conflict of Interest. It is expected that the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy and the Special Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will also meet on Tuesday, but the times have not yet been fixed.

On Wednesday, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. It will deal first with Bill S-29, and then commence its study of Bill C-2, the Combines Investigation Act. The committee will meet again when the Senate rises on Wednesday and will continue its study of Bill C-2. Also on Wednesday, the Special Committee on Science Policy will meet at 10.30 a.m.

On Thursday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to proceed with its study of the Bankruptcy Act. A meeting is scheduled of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, but no time has yet been set.

In the Senate we will continue with the debate on the White Paper and other items on the Order Paper, and I have been advised that one and perhaps two bills will be coming to us from the House of Commons late in the week.

Motion agreed to.

● (1410)

LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS SUPERANNUATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Maurice Bourget moved the second reading of Bill C-23, to provide for the payment of superannuation benefits to Lieutenant Governors.

[Translation]

He said: Bill C-23 that is now before us aims at giving a pension to Canadians who serve their country as lieutenant governors in the various provinces in acknowledgement of their services in that office. The bill is relatively simple, and I do not doubt that honourable senators will support the proposed measures it contains.

This bill is the last of a series of legislative measures providing for payment of a pension to persons appointed to very high representative positions in the civil service in Canada. Ambassadors and high commissioners of Canada abroad have already been entitled to superannuation benefits under the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act for over 25 years.

In 1967, Parliament adopted the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act. In addition, since 1868, federal judges have been covered by provisions allowing for a pension in the Judges Act and senators themselves have been subject to a pension act since 1965.

Therefore, although measures have been taken over the years to ensure that those appointed to those offices by the Queen or by the Governor in Council receive a pension, nothing has been done in this respect for lieutenant governors, in spite of a number of similarities in their terms of appointment. This bill will correct that deficiency in the present pension legislation.

After having studied the other pension plans, it became obvious that a plan resembling the one established under the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act would be more appropriate for the lieutenant governors.

Consequently, this legislative measure will give a lieutenant governor a pension upon his reaching 65 years of age, or earlier if he becomes disabled, who has contributed to the plan during five years of service, the normal duration of his appointment.

A deferred pension will be paid at 65 to whoever is eligible and retires before having reached that age. The pension then will be equal to 30 per cent of the average remuneration over the last five years of service. Persons who are not eligible will be reimbursed their contributions, plus the interest that applies. The pension paid the surviving spouse will equal 50 per cent of the pension the lieutenant governor received until his death, or that he would have received upon retiring at 65.

Contributions will amount to 6½ per cent of the salary, of which ½ per cent will apply to the indexation; this corresponds to our own contributions. Lieutenant governors in office at the time this bill is given royal assent can choose to contribute for prior service to a maximum of five years, and be entitled to the pension. On the other hand, the lieutenant governor who chooses not to participate in the pension plan can do so within six months of this act coming into effect, in which case his contributions will be reimbursed.

These are, honourable senators, the most important points of this legislation. I shall, however, venture to advise you that when this bill was studied in the other place, several members made representations—not only members on the government side but also on the Opposition side—in favour of the two lieutenant governors who took on these positions in very particular circumstances, and who also had to make very big personal sacrifices. The suggestion made by these members having been rejected, the bill comes to us in its present form. I think there is nothing we can do now, except perhaps urge the government or the minister responsible to review the recommendations made by members in favour of the two lieutenant governors concerned.

Thus I am pleased, honourable senators, to recommend this bill to your kind attention. I do not doubt at all that it will receive your unanimous support, as was the case in the House of Commons.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I entirely support this bill, but before going further I should admit that I have a personal interest because I know two lieutenant governors whom I find quite likeable. I would not like it if it were said that I supported this bill on account of this friendship. In these days when conflicts of interest take all shapes and forms, though I do not hesitate to take part in the debate, nevertheless, in the present case as in others I have some personal convictions perhaps as a result of a friendship, of experience or my special knowledge of certain cases!

[English]

Since Senator Bourget spoke in French I might as well continue in English. I have said that I support this bill. It is something our statutes lack, since we have provided for annuities to diplomats and especially to the Governor General in recent years.

[Senator Bourget]

The position of lieutenant governor is one the importance of which everyone should realize. But because that has not always been the case, it has, at times, been difficult to find people to accept the position. Often people have accepted this onerous honour out of a sheer sense of duty to the public.

I think this bill fills a gap in the system of pensions provided by the federal government to civil servants, the armed forces and everyone in receipt of a salary or honorarium.

● (1420)

I do not like to call the amount paid to the lieutenant governor a salary. We have allowed it for too long to remain very low and very inadequate. Honourable senators will remember that some years ago it was only $10,000, then it was increased to $20,000 and only recently was it brought up to $35,000.

Senator Bourget: For some of them it will be $18,000.

Senator Flynn: Some of them, yes. Therefore, at present it is obvious, and I do not feel I have to dwell on the fact, that the payments made to lieutenant governors are certainly inadequate. This bill proposes to remedy that situation, but I am not sure that the provisions contained in this bill are really adequate because the bill fails to take into consideration the special status, circumstances of appointment, and terms of office of the lieutenant governors.

The best solution would have been to provide lieutenant governors with a pension similar to that provided the Governor General. The comparison between lieutenant governors and the Governor General is, to my mind, more appropriate and proper than that between lieutenant governors and civil servants in the diplomatic corps, as was mentioned by Senator Bourget. I do not think they belong to the same category.

If the government had chosen to provide the lieutenant governors with a pension similar to that provided to the Governor General, they would have provided a one-third annuity without contribution—this bill imposes contributions—and that to be in no way influenced by any other pension he or she may receive from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I would have preferred to see a bill incorporating such a provision. That, to my mind, would have more adequately expressed the importance and prestige we attach, or should attach, to the position of lieutenant governor and the respect we have, or we should have, for those who occupy the post. However, this is not what the present bill provides, and I very much regret this deficiency.

As was mentioned by Senator Bourget, it would be impossible for the Senate to amend this bill in order to provide a better pension or better conditions for lieutenant governors. Such amendments would be amendments to a money bill and, therefore, beyond our competence. I feel it would be a good thing to have this bill referred to a committee in order to obtain explanations on certain matters and perhaps have the committee recommend to the government that it amend this legislation in the proximate future. Of course, it is most important that we not delay the coming into force of this bill because problems might result and those we seek to help may end up with nothing at all.

Now, I want to put a question to Senator Bourget. This bill will come into force on the day of its assent. It was tabled in the House of Commons on October 11, 1974. I do not know if any lieutenant governor has been replaced since then, but if one has he would be denied the benefit of this bill. Likewise, if one were to die suddenly today, he or she would also be denied the benefit of this bill. I was wondering if something could be done to provide for such cases. I doubt it because of the monetary overtones, but somehow I can't convince myself that an amendment making the bill retroactive to October 11, 1974, would be one of monetary significance. If this doesn't present a problem, possibly it is something which could be done.

The next problem is one we cannot remedy but, nevertheless, I think we should look into it in committee. I am referring to the apparent fact that any lieutenant governor entitled to a pension as a former member of the House of Commons or of this house would be denied that pension while receiving the pension he had become entitled to as lieutenant governor. We are informed that Bill C-52, which is before the House of Commons now, as you know, and is likely to come before us in this session, would take care of that problem. But I have gone through Bill C-52 carefully and I have found nothing there to indicate that when a lieutenant governor draws a pension he will still be entitled to a pension payable under the other acts providing pensions to, for example, former members of the House of Commons or civil servants or diplomats or otherwise. And if that protection is not there, then that means that the pension provided here might end up being substantially reduced. In other words, a retired lieutenant governor would, as a former member of the House of Commons or of the civil service entitled to a pension, see that pension stopped or, in the alternative, would see his pension as former lieutenant governor reduced proportionately.

You may wonder what this bill means exactly in terms of dollars. Clause 3(2) limits the pension to three-tenths of the average salary received by the lieutenant governor in the last five years of his service. Well, in practical terms, at the present time the "last five years" means $35,000 for the last year or two—not more than two years, I think—and the remainder of the five years at $20,000. The average of the last five years, then, is not that high. In most cases it would be something like $6,000.

I cannot see why this bill should have made the lieutenant governor's position in that respect different from the Governor General's. In other words, the basis for the calculation of this pension should be three-tenths of the present salary rather than three-tenths of the average salary received over the last five years. However, that is another problem we cannot deal with here or in committee owing to the fact that we cannot amend this bill in that respect. But it seems to me that the bill should have been more generous and, as I say, more in line with the treatment provided for the Governor General, whose pension is based on his salary at the time he retires, or at the time of his death so far as the pension to his widow is concerned.

In any event, apparently the maximum payable under this bill is only about $10,500 a year, which is not much.

Further to that, as Senator Bourget mentioned, there is the fact that he is entitled to his pension only when he reaches the age of 65, which again is not the case for the Governor General. Nor do I think that you can really compare the position of the lieutenant governor with that of the diplomats. If he accepts the appointment of lieutenant governor at the age, let us say, of 56, by the age of 61 he has, in practice, sacrificed five productive years, in most cases, and it seems to me that there should be adequate compensation immediately upon his retiring.

● (1430)

These are the criticisms I have about the practical results of the bill, rather than of the bill itself. But as I said before, lest any long dispute about the bill or delay in its passage prejudice lieutenant governors, I do not think we should try to do anything about these matters at this time, especially since I do not think, constitutionally, we can do so.

There is another point that I would like to mention, although it may be less important than the matters I have just referred to, and that is the fact that we have former lieutenant governors who will not benefit from this legislation and who probably should be entitled to receive the benefits provided by it. I have not been able to ascertain the exact situation as far as various persons are concerned, but it seems to me that at least some of those who have served in this capacity of lieutenant governor might be in need. Certainly, all of them deserve to be considered, but this bill fails to take such persons into account. I do not think Senator Bourget is objecting to this bill's going to committee so that these problems can be brought before it and perhaps lead to the committee's making certain worthwhile recommendations.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word in support of what Senator Flynn has just said. He has pointed out that this legislation does not solve all the problems that might have been solved with respect to lieutenant governors. He has pointed out that certain lieutenant governors will not benefit from it at all. I do not know what he had in mind by this, but I think he might have meant that this legislation in its present form will have a discriminatory effect on at least two present lieutenant governors.

I think it is unfortunate, when we bring legislation before the house, that we do not make every effort to eliminate or cure as many problems as we can. As Senator Flynn has pointed out, we cannot do much with this bill except to expedite its passage. However, I do want to strongly support his plea that this bill go before a committee, where these problems can be put on record and not lost sight of, so that we can do something at a later date to remedy situations which I think the bill ought to have remedied already.

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Bourget speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Flynn and Senator Carter for their remarks in connection with this bill. I must say that I entirely agree with what Senator Flynn has said, because even though I am sponsoring the bill I am not entirely in agreement with its contents. I believe it is unfair to two lieutenant governors in particular who are now in office, because I know, as do many other senators, the particular circumstances in which they accepted their positions. The fact is that their acceptance involved great personal sacrifice. I say again, therefore, that I do agree entirely with the suggestion made by Senator Flynn and Senator Carter, and my wish is that this bill go to a committee and that the committee have the opportunity to make a recommendation in their report so that in the near future the cabinet, or the minister responsible for the bill, will have a chance to review it and render justice to the two lieutenant governors that we have mentioned.

Senator Flynn asked me two questions. The first was if there were any lieutenant governors who had retired after October 1974. I do not know the answer, but I do not recall that any lieutenant governor has retired since that date. However, this is information which we can obtain when the bill is in committee.

As far as the second question is concerned, relating to the pensions to which they are entitled, I think the answer was given when this bill was in committee stage in the House of Commons. Mr. Béchard, a member, asked the following question:

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask another question. In the two cases discussed earlier; that is, the case of Quebec and New Brunswick, the two persons involved were former members of Parliament. Mr. Chairman, when the present Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick retires, he will no doubt have the right to the Lieutenant Governor's pension benefits, yet that will not prevent him from receiving pension benefits accorded to members of Parliament.

The minister, who was Mr. Chrétien at that time, said: "Absolutely not." He went on to say that the lieutenant governors would be eligible for both pensions. Another member said that Bill C-52 would have to be passed first.

So, honourable senators, I am not in a position now to give a complete answer to Senator Flynn's question, but again this is a question that could be asked in committee.

Honourable senators, there is nothing that I should like to add at this stage. As we all know, half a loaf is better than no bread, and I hope that every one of us will accept this bill and send it to committee where recommendations can be made in accordance with the circumstances. I hope that the bill will be unanimously accepted in this house.

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, if the bill goes to committee we should try to find out the true pronunciation of the word "lieutenant". I understand that "loo-tenant" is American while "left-tenant" is Canadian and English. Perhaps we could straighten that out in committee.

Senator Bourget: We can probably ask Mr. Spicer about it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Bourget.]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Bourget: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which is the committee which deals with pensions.

Motion agreed to.

● (1440)

PRIVATE BILL

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S-30, to incorporate the Continental Bank of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill has really three purposes: first, to establish a bank under the provisions of the Bank Act; second, to provide for the amalgamation of that new bank with an established sales finance company in Canada; and, third, to provide the rules for this amalgamation. The new bank is to be known as the Continental Bank of Canada, and the established finance company is IAC Limited.

Honourable senators know very well that an application to Parliament for the incorporation of a bank is made according to the prescriptions of Schedule B to the Bank Act, and such bills are essentially committee bills. In such a case the committee looks at the bona fides and the financial capacity of the applicant. This bill is certainly a committee bill.

I believe that it will emerge very quickly that the bona fides of IAC are established adequately, and that it has good financial capacity. However, we shall have to deal also with the other provisions of the bill, which govern the processes whereby the assets and properties which IAC now owns can be disposed of—either by passing them over to the new bank, or by disposing of them in some other fashion. Therefore, for the assistance of the chamber I shall divide my remarks into two branches, and deal first with IAC Limited, its history and its operations, and, secondly, with specific clauses of the bill.

At first IAC Limited was known as Industrial Acceptance Corporation Limited. It was incorporated federally in 1925, 50 years ago. The name was changed to IAC Limited by supplementary letters patent in 1970. The company originally was American-owned, and the American owners decided 50 years ago to abandon their project in Canada. At that time it was taken over by a group of young Canadians who had had rather remarkable careers in the business and financial world through this company. They were Mr. J. P. A. Smyth of Ormstown, Quebec; Mr. G. E. Wemp of Bath, Ontario—both farmers' sons—Mr. J. H. Rannahan, of Stratford; and Mr. J. B. Pennefather, of Hamilton. They were all in their twenties, and thought they had an opportunity with Industrial Acceptance Corporation. So, with the help of Greenshields Incorporated, they started to operate the company as a Canadian-owned company.

Honourable senators may be interested to know that the Honourable Norman McLarty, who was a member of the wartime government of Mr. King, was the first solicitor for the company. It is also interesting to note that the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent was a director of IAC before he joined the government and became Prime Minister of Canada, and he returned to the board after he retired from public life.

Perhaps I should put on record that the present officers of the company are Mr. K. H. MacDonald, chairman of the board, and Mr. J. S. Land, president, with Mr. S. F. Melloy, Mr. D. W. Maloney, Mr. F. P. Paradis, Mr. A. P. Bolin, and Mr. R. E. Campbell as senior vice-presidents.

The company started in Windsor, Ontario—or, as the suburb was then known, Walkerville. Its headquarters now are in Toronto. IAC Limited is essentially a Canadian company. It has some 12,000 shareholders, who own 13.5 million shares. Ninety-six per cent of these shares are owned by Canadians, and no single group of shareholders has control of the company. There are 16 directors, all of whom are Canadian. The company employs over 2,800 people, and has over 750 offices in 270 locations in all of the provinces of Canada.

With respect to its assets and liabilities, IAC Limited is the largest sales finance and consumer loan company in Canada. Among Canadian financial institutions, apart from insurance companies, from the point of view of assets it ranks eleventh, and from the point of view of equity it ranks sixth. In 1974 it managed assets of $2.04 billion. In 1974 the company's gross income was $221 million; its gross expenditures, $176 million; and its net earnings, approximately $23 million. It has retained earnings of $135 million, and it paid dividends on its preferred and common shares in 1974 to a total of $13.9 million.

The aggregate of the company's debt is $1.474 billion. This is divided as follows—and I list these items only because of some later remarks I want to make—according to the 1974 financial statement: bank loans outstanding, $24 million; secured short-term notes, over $606 million; secured long-term notes, $637.8 million; outstanding debentures, approximately $103 million; and subordinate debentures, $35.7 million.

When those four young Canadians began to manage and operate the company, they were most concerned with the financing of Studebaker motorcars—financing for the dealers in Windsor and for the consumers, the purchasers. However, I see that for many years now the company has offered to the Canadian public a complete range of financial services. It carries on wholesale and retail sales financing, inventory financing, and it makes dealer loans and business loans. It deals in mortgages, for both homes and businesses. It is in the business—and it is an extensive business—of leasing capital equipment, and, of course, it is in the business of consumer loans. The company's commercial activities extend into the fields of transportation, construction, logging, and of machinery particularly in the resource industries.

The company's services are supplied, first, by the parent company, and by seven subsidiaries. The first of these is Niagara Finance Company Limited, which is a wholly-owned subsidiary dealing in consumer loans. Niagara happens to be the largest Canadian-owned consumer loan company. It has 260 branches across Canada.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, a bank cannot deal through a finance company or a consumer loan company like Niagara. Banks are, however, very active in the field of consumer loans, and the new bank will be able to step in and take over the kind of business done by Niagara. Niagara, in 1974, had over 230,000 customers, and receivables of over $305 million.

There are two other subsidiary companies wholly-owned by IAC, which I can group together. They are Capital Funds IAC Limited and Capital Funds (IAC Ontario) Limited. They deal largely in commercial loans. Their functions can be performed by a chartered bank, but not through the agency of a subsidiary company. This work is done directly by a bank, and this is part of the portfolio to be amalgamated with the bank.

These companies deal to a great extent with the purchase and lease of capital equipment. That cannot be done by a bank at the present time under the provisions of the Bank Act. There may be a change coming, and I will refer to that a little later. The outstanding portfolio for these two capital fund companies in 1974 amounted to $432 million.

IAC also owns two realty companies—Niagara Realty of Canada Limited, which deals in mortgages outside of Ontario, and Niagara Realty Limited, which deals with a mortgage portfolio within Ontario. Those companies operate from 268 locations across Canada, and in 1974 had receivables of $176 million.

A bank, of course, can only do this business subject to the restrictions of the Bank Act in respect of a mortgage portfolio, and that will have to be trimmed down and accommodated to the requirements of the Bank Act as the amalgamation process proceeds.

The company wholly owns two insurance companies, of which it must divest itself. One is called Sovereign General Insurance Company, incorporated in 1953. It has assets of $18 million, and in 1974 had outstanding some 77,000 policies. It owns also the Sovereign Life Assurance Company of Canada, incorporated in 1962 with assets of $78 million. The work of those companies dovetails with the work of sales finance and other subsidiary companies through which IAC deals.

I should say also that IAC, in company with others such as The Royal Trust Company and the Canada Permanent Trust Company, has a 40 per cent interest in the Sovereign Mortgage Insurance Company, which insures, as honourable senators know, first mortgage lenders against loss. This business will also have to be divested by IAC.

Honourable senators may be interested to know about the distribution of IAC's business in the various areas of the economy. Sixty-five per cent of their business is done in the field of business financing, 16 per cent in sales financing, 10 per cent in consumer loans, and 9 per cent in residential mortgages.

In 1960 IAC had its charter amended by supplementary letters patent to enable it to deal in business financing and leasing of capital equipment to customers. In 1974, 14 years later, it had outstanding receivables on its books in this field of $432 million.

I am told that in Canada over the last several years there has been very extensive development in this field, particularly of investment by banks from the United States that are able to get into the field of leasing. I have figures which indicate the extent to which American banks are invading this particular field through Canadian subsidiaries. Perhaps the word "invading" has a sinister meaning, but American banks, apparently, have been in the field of financing in the United States through leasing for a number of years and have developed quite a technique. The field was open in Canada, but our banks could not do this. American banks were able to incorporate Canadian subsidiaries in the provinces, and then to go to work. It has all worked quite well. For example, in the field of leasing, in June 1975, subsidiaries of 100 American banks had business on their books of $310 million. This represented an increase of 40 per cent over the volume of the year before.

They had business loans on their books of $1.147 billion at June 1975, an increase of 37 per cent over the previous 12 months. They had business in one-year notes on their books of over $1 billion, an increase of 65 per cent over the 12 previous months. So obviously these are areas of financing which have been developing in this country very extensively indeed.

May I now set out briefly some of the reasons advanced by the company for proposing the kind of change which the bill suggests. The company feels that its competitive position would be improved if it is incorporated as a chartered bank. I am told that in the past 10 years, in the consumer credit field alone, the banks grew at an average rate of 19.8 per cent per annum, and the credit unions at the rate of 14.6 per cent, but that the sales finance companies, of which IAC is one, grew only at the rate of 4.5 per cent. So, obviously there is room for growth.

IAC, as a bank, will be able to borrow more cheaply than can the chartered banks, and therefore will be able to service its customers better and presumably more cheaply and more competitively.

I am informed also that the demand for capital in the next 10 years, for the resource industries chiefly and for industry generally, will be a great strain on the capital market in Canada. Traditionally IAC customers have been small and medium size businesses. They are the people who will be squeezed if demands for great gobs of capital should develop within the next decade. IAC feels that this is an area which they can service if they have better access to capital funds.

In my opinion, there is a legitimate desire on the part of a company such as this, which has grown from such small origins into the kind of institution it is today, to occupy more of those fields which are now invaded by foreigners, by banks and other competitors within Canada. I have said nothing about the fact that they have also to compete with fairly substantial finance companies which are subsidiaries of the large American manufacturers. The covenant of the large American manufacturers, when these subsidiaries go to sources of capital, makes it easier for them to obtain money at lower rates.

Honourable senators, in speaking at length, I have tried to present a picture—perhaps a rather inadequate one—of the background of the institution which now proposes to merge itself into a new chartered bank in Canada.

• (1500)

I come now to the bill which, first of all, provides for the incorporation of a bank to be known as Continental Bank of Canada and, in the French language, Banque Continentale du Canada. Like all other banks to be incorporated by act of Parliament, it will have provisional directors. Its provisional directors will be the 16 directors of IAC Limited at the time this bill is enacted. In other words, the bank and IAC, for a period, will have a common board. In order to qualify to be a director, one has to own 500 shares of IAC, which are currently selling for about $18 per share, for a total investment of about $9,000.

None of these directors is to own shares of Continental Bank of Canada in the first instance. All the stock that is to be issued by Continental Bank of Canada will be issued to IAC. The Continental Bank, in other words, will be a subsidiary of IAC. It is rather an anomaly among Canadian banking institutions that another company should own a bank. That is not to be forever, but only until the amalgamation takes place.

The capital stock provided by the bill for the new bank is $100 million divided into 10 million shares with a value of $10 each. IAC will subscribe for $50 million of that capital, and will own all of the issued shares in the first instance.

The headquarters of the bank will be in the city of Toronto. After the bank is incorporated, the processes leading to amalgamation will begin. The balance of the bill, really, prescribes the rules which will govern those processes.

I should point out to honourable senators that this is the first time in the history of Canadian banking institutions that a large Canadian financial institution has sought permission to convert itself into a chartered bank.

To bring IAC Limited into conformity with the Bank Act, the bill provides for a transition period. This transition period will start on the date royal assent is given to this bill, and will end when the two companies and the subsidiaries of IAC Limited are amalgamated into one legal entity. That period can be up to, but no longer than, 10 years, as provided in the bill. After the amalgamation, Continental Bank of Canada will emerge, and IAC Limited and its seven subsidiaries, and its other properties, will disappear. IAC Limited shareholders, after the amalgamation, will become shareholders of Continental Bank of Canada.

During the transition period, both the new bank, Continental Bank of Canada, and IAC Limited will be in existence. Continental Bank of Canada, in that transition period, will be wholly owned by IAC Limited. It will be subject to the Bank Act, with certain exceptions that are set out in the bill.

IAC Limited will also be in existence, owning a new subsidiary, namely, Continental Bank of Canada, and it will be disposing of its other subsidiaries and other assets to Continental Bank of Canada, and elsewhere when it has to. IAC Limited, although it is not a bank, will be subject in that interim period to the Bank Act in certain areas of its activities.

During the transition period it is proposed to exempt Continental Bank of Canada from certain sections of the Bank Act, and I am going to pick out a few that are listed in the bill before us.

It is provided, first of all, that the directors of IAC Limited will be the directors of Continental Bank of Canada. Some of these directors of IAC Limited—a goodly number of them, as a matter of fact—are now directors of other deposit-taking institutions, such as banks, trust companies, and the like. The Bank Act, as honourable senators are aware, does not allow a director of one bank or trust company to be a director of another. For that reason, this overlap must be eliminated. The bill provides that this must be done within a period of two years from the date of this bill's receiving royal assent.

The Bank Act also requires public notices to be issued when a new bank opens its stock books and when it holds its shareholders' meetings. However, during this interim period there will be only one shareholder of Continental Bank of Canada, and that will be IAC Limited. It will own $50 million worth of the shares of the new bank, and because there is only one legal entity to be advised of meetings, and so on, compliance with that section of the Bank Act does not seem necessary.

IAC Limited, under the bill, is given the right to subscribe for, and vote, all of the shares of Continental Bank of Canada that it picks up in the course of this 10-year transition period. The directors of IAC Limited need not own shares of Continental Bank of Canada in order to qualify as directors of the bank.

I point out that this type of provision is frequently repeated in the bill, the reason being that what is provided for the board of directors of Continental Bank of Canada has also to be provided for the board of directors of IAC Limited, so that all of the legal requirements are covered on both sides.

With reference to the mortgage portfolio controlled by IAC Limited or its subsidiaries, I should point out that a new bank is entitled to reach a maximum size for its mortgage portfolio over the period of its first eight years of existence, and the maximum prescribed is 10 per cent of its deposit liabilities and its outstanding debentures at the time. This new bank, of course, is going to start with a very substantial mortgage portfolio which will be obtained from the IAC organization. Therefore, Continental Bank of Canada is to be treated as though it had been in business for some time, and not as a new bank, in respect of the mortgage portfolio, because a new bank would only develop such a portfolio gradually.

Clauses 8 to 11 of the bill treat of the relationship between Continental Bank of Canada and IAC Limited during the transition period. Again, honourable senators, Continental Bank of Canada and IAC Limited will both be in existence during this transition period. Continental is being built up by the infusion of assets from IAC Limited and its subsidiaries, and IAC Limited, in turn, is being run down.

This bill permits IAC Limited, or some alternative person approved by the minister, to own all of the shares of Continental in this period, and for Continental to be a wholly-owned subsidiary of IAC Limited. Again, the directors of IAC Limited in this period shall be the directors of Continental. Continental, in this period, is forbidden to make any loans, either to IAC or to any of its subsidiaries.

Clause 10 is, perhaps, the pivotal clause of the bill. It provides that within 10 years after the act comes into force Continental and IAC Limited shall amalgamate. The shareholders of IAC Limited shall become shareholders of Continental Bank of Canada. The amalgamation is to be carried out pursuant to the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act, the Canada Business Corporations Act and the Bank Act, mutatis mutandis—which means that if you can find sections that are applicable, then those are the ones that apply. Clause 10 goes on to provide that after the amalgamation has taken place, Continental shall be wholly subject to all of the provisions of the Bank Act and the special exempting provisions in this bill will no longer be applicable.

• (1510)

At the time of the amalgamation IAC will probably still have a substantial volume of debt. Some of this debt, of course, is long-term debt with maturities later than the date of amalgamation. The bill provides that the Continental Bank will become responsible for the payment of any of that debt where the maturities come after the date of amalgamation. Likewise, too, the holders of convertible debentures issued by IAC, which debentures have a right to convert into common shares of IAC, will have those rights preserved, and they will be able to convert either into common shares of IAC, if that is appropriate, or into shares of the bank. As a result of the amalgamation the Continental Bank will emerge as the sole surviving corporate entity, and IAC will have disappeared.

During this period of transition between the time of royal assent and the time of amalgamation, certain sections of the Bank Act will be applicable to IAC, although IAC is not a bank. For example, IAC will have on its shoulders the responsibility, as does the bank, to comply with the provisions of the Bank Act which require an order in council to be issued within a year of royal assent allowing the bank to start business. IAC must shoulder that onus as well.

Qualifications respecting the eligibility of directors, their election and their removal, the election of officers, the filling of vacancies on the board, the conduct of meetings, the transmission and transfer of shares, and things of that kind, provided for in the Bank Act to be observed by a bank must be observed by IAC in the transition period.

More specifically, the provisions of the Bank Act will apply to the shares of IAC which have not been issued but which perhaps it might be desired to issue before IAC goes out of existence. In other words, IAC will not be able to take shares out of its treasury and sell them to the public; it must comply with the provisions of the Bank Act requiring that shareholders of the bank shall be given rights on a pro rata basis, and any shares that are issued out of the treasury must be issued to all shareholders pro rata. If the shareholders do not take them up resort can be had to the public.

I am still talking about IAC and the Bank Act. I have mentioned the two insurance companies, Sovereign Life Assurance Company of Canada with assets of $78 million, and Sovereign General Insurance Company with assets of $18 million. Both are valued at over $5 million, which is important for the application of the provisions of the Bank Act. Both these companies are wholly owned by IAC. Under the Bank Act a bank cannot own insurance companies, or indeed more than 10 per cent of any kind of company. The Bank Act will be applicable to IAC, and under this bill it will have two years to reduce these holdings to 10 per cent.

I have perhaps said enough about the conversion rights attached to preferred shares and convertible debentures of IAC. The right to convert the IAC common shares of the holders of each of these types of security is to be honoured by IAC. The Bank Act provides that no individual shareholder is entitled to hold more than 10 per cent of the issued shares of the bank. IAC has one shareholder with more than 10 per cent of the issued shares of IAC. Under the provisions of this bill, this shareholder will be given four years to comply with the provisions of the Bank Act.

The four-year period is one for which there is a precedent. When the City Bank of New York owned more than 10 per cent of the Mercantile Bank when it was incorporated, the Bank Act provided that it would have four years within which to bring its investment down to the level permitted by the Bank Act. Likewise, when the Bank Act was amended the last time, trust companies were given four years within which to liquidate the more than 10 per cent holdings in chartered banks.

Section 15(1) of the Bank Act requires a new bank, within a year of its incorporation, to obtain an order in council permitting it to continue business. In this case IAC has a year to prepare Continental Bank to start business, and IAC will own the whole of it at that time. In that period of time there is obviously a great deal to do. It has to make arrangements with the Bank of Canada; it has to convert its branches to bank branches; it has to train its staff; it has to get supplies; and it has to establish deposit and other facilities that are required in branches of a bank.

The bill also provides that after the order in council issues allowing the Continental Bank to commence business, Continental Bank must do all the banking business, and none of the banking business that might be done by IAC thereafter can be done by IAC.

There are certain permitted activities for IAC during the transition period. Let me give a practical example of this. After the Continental Bank has its order in council permitting it to start business it will, of course, be making business loans and consumer loans, and it will be taking notes and other documents of security for these loans. IAC has, of course, a tremendous portfolio of receivables, including notes and contracts which it has from its customers, as evidence of the amounts that have been loaned to these people by IAC. I have mentioned two already.

IAC has a number of different types of debt, including secured term notes, which in 1974 had a value of over $637 million. These notes carry a covenant from IAC that 112 per cent of the outstanding balances on these notes will be secured by IAC receivables—in other words, by the conditional sales contracts and other notes that IAC has in its portfolio. During the interim period, of course, IAC will every day be receiving payments on these receivables, and some of them will be retired from time to time. Therefore, to replenish this volume of receivables which IAC must maintain as long as these notes are outstanding as security for its secured term notes, IAC is to be permitted to buy from the Continental Bank such of its receivables as IAC may need to honour its commitment to the holders of its secured term notes.

There is, however, a ceiling placed upon the amount of such business to be conducted by IAC. It is the amount of business that is in place at the time of the order in council permitting Continental Bank to start business.

● (1520)

There is very little more to be said. Perhaps I have said too much already, but I do want the Senate to understand as much as I understand of this rather complicated bill. As I said, it really is a committee bill.

During the transition period, which is no longer than 10 years, IAC and its subsidiaries will be permitted to carry on leasing activities which IAC has been engaged in for some years now. Its portfolio in this field is now worth $432 million. In 1974 it had a mortgage portfolio of $176 million.

Now, leasing is not allowed to banks under the Bank Act, and mortgage lending is restricted by the Bank Act, as I indicated earlier, but the bill does fix a limit for such business for IAC. The maximum is the total value of outstanding business, in both the mortgage field and the leasing field, at the date of royal assent, plus any commitment for new business which IAC had at that date.

Honourable senators, in the transition period, IAC and its subsidiaries are allowed to continue to hold the assets which they held at the time of royal assent, and to do whatever is necessary to deal with them, to husband them, to borrow, and to invest, subject to the terms of this bill.

The customers of IAC can deal with IAC without being fixed with the knowledge of the limitations imposed by this bill upon IAC.

The bill also provides some penalties and sanctions. If Continental Bank or IAC, or their directors, should, in the transition period, contravene the special provisions of the bill we have before us, the minister, after notice, may declare the benefits which are granted to IAC cancelled.

If the amalgamation does not occur within the ten years of royal assent, Continental Bank shall not carry on thereafter. Clauses 12 to 14 apply certain sections of the Bank Act to IAC. If IAC violates any of these provisions of the Bank Act, the penalties provided in the Bank Act may be invoked against IAC.

A failure to secure an order in council to begin business within one year of royal assent means that all the provisions of this bill will have no further force and effect, and all the power under the Bank Act, conferred upon IAC by this bill, will be lost.

Honourable senators, if the bill is given second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Senior officials of IAC will be available to the committee, and they will submit a brief which may be helpful to the members of the committee.

Although I do not speak for the committee, it will probably want to call officials from the Department of Finance and, more particularly, from the office of the Inspector General of Banks, with whom IAC and their representatives have had lengthy discussions over a long period of time about this complicated matter. I am sure that counsel for the Senate will be in attendance as well.

I commend this bill to the Senate.

Senator Deschatelets: Would Senator Connolly answer a question? Some of these provisions, at first glance, seem quite unusual, especially those having to do with the transition period when IAC disappears so as to permit Continental Bank to come into existence. I should like to know if these provisions have been examined by an official body, to make sure that they are in line with the Bank Act, for example.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Of course, I do not know from personal knowledge about the discussions that took place between the representatives of IAC and the officials of the Department of Finance and the office of the Inspector General of Banks. However, I am informed that that consultation has been going on for many months.

Being the sponsor of a private bill, one does not commit any official to a position on it, but, as I understand it, the provisions of this bill are those that emerged from discussions between those officials and representatives of IAC. That will be examined in committee, of course.

This is a carefully prepared bill. It is obviously a complicated bill, but it has to be complicated because of the complicated nature of the process that is proposed.

Senator Everett: Did I understand the honourable senator to say that the borrowing cost of the finance subsidiaries of the large automobile manufacturers is less than that of IAC?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I understand so, yes.

Senator Everett: I hate to raise this niggling point after such a superb presentation by the honourable senator, but I wonder if at a later time he could produce some data to substantiate that assertion?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Gladly; if not privately, I will get data for the committee.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

Senator Sparrow: Would the honourable senator permit a couple of questions? First of all, I would like to say how interested I was in listening to his presentation.

I may have misunderstood some of these points. First, did Senator Connolly say that the banks presently are prohibited from engaging in leasing arrangements? Perhaps he could say if that is what he said.

Secondly, will this act cease to exist at the end of ten years when the new bank comes under the Bank Act? I have not read the bill, but I would assume that there is something in it to that effect.

Senator Connolly mentioned that at present there is a shareholder of IAC who holds more than 10 per cent of the shares. What percentage of the shares does this shareholder have at present? Does this action of IAC require a vote of the present shareholders, and, if it requires a vote, has a vote of the shareholders been held?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, my understanding is that Canadian banks are not permitted, under the Bank Act, to engage in the business of leasing by way of financing. I also understand that, because the practice has grown so extensively in this country, there may be an amendment to the Bank Act to allow banks to do this business. I think it will be a logical development because American banks, which are not restricted, are coming in and establishing subsidiaries and getting into this field in a very large way, as I indicated earlier.

Senator Sparrow asked whether or not this act will be out of being after ten years. I suppose the interim provisions will no longer be applicable. I suppose they will be spent sections after the amalgamation takes place, whether that is in five years, eight years or ten years, and they would not be available to any other comparable situation. Another finance company would have to make its own arrangements about such a fusion.

● (1530)

However, the provisions incorporating the bank—that is, the standard provisions that are found in Schedule B to the Bank Act—would continue to be valid, because through them the bank would be incorporated, its capital established, its head office set up, and that kind of thing. But, certainly, after the amalgamation certain provisions of this bill will be spent.

Of the outstanding shares of IAC, I am not sure what percentage is owned by the shareholder which owns more than 10 per cent. It could be 15, 20 or perhaps even 25 per cent. I do not know, but no doubt that information will be available in committee.

I think from a legal point of view the decision to proceed with this bill was a step which could have been taken as part of the internal management of the company, but, in any event, there is a shareholders' meeting to be held some time before the committee meets to consider the bill.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is obvious, even from the lucid explanation given by the sponsor, that this is a most complicated bill. It seems to me that there are a number of instances where IAC is asking to be exempted from provisions of the Bank Act. That aspect of the matter will certainly need to be examined quite closely. We have no objection to the bill's going before a committee for examination, but I do stress one point that occurs to me, namely, that if we have a Bank Act we should expect its provisions to be complied with; if not, we certainly want to know why not.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I say to Senator Macdonald that I am pleased indeed to assure him that the exemptions from the provisions of the Bank Act to which he has referred will certainly be matters which will be looked at carefully by the committee. From the study I have been able to give the bill, I would say that most of those exemptions have to be provided if the machinery is to work at all. The situation is unusual, as I have said, in that this is the first time a major financial institution has attempted to coalesce or amalgamate with a bank.

I thank honourable senators for their help and their attention in this matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S YEAR

DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 8, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Quart calling the attention of the Senate to International Women's Year.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I would like at this time to say welcome to the recently appointed senators who have joined us in this chamber. They will, I know, contribute much to the work of the Senate.

Now that we are approaching the closing months of International Women's Year it is fitting to bring to account some of the circumstances which have led women to make themselves heard more loudly during this year. We must consider what has been accomplished—consider the improvement in women's position in our present society, and what future improvements we will see in the cultural and economic equality of a woman's world.

When did the idea of equality for women first begin? It might seem that the first effort at sex equality was when Eve appeared in the Garden of Eden and disturbed Adam's peaceful existence.

In the Mycenaean culture, about 2000 B.C., women were the more dominant sex. Men, of course, were needed to propagate the race. Their usefulness ended there. The goddess more than God was worshipped.

This civilization disappeared about 1000 B.C., and a reversal in the state of affairs took place. Male dominance came into being with the Dorian invaders, and for the last 3,000 years we have been conditioned to the idea of male dominance. At various times since then, women have come into prominence by making marked contributions to civilization in different fields.

At times down through the ages women became militant and decided to make themselves and their power felt. Those occasions did not last long, and women once again sank into a state of apathy and let the men do the ruling of the state—and also of women.

However, rapid changes are taking place today, and once again women are taking giant steps toward full equality in the political, business and social life of Canada. As a nation, our people, especially our women, have fresh memories of old traditions, and have dared to explore new frontiers.

The third world women no doubt will have different and perhaps radical theories on what women's concerns are regarding their social and economic lifestyle. It is something we must think about, and face in the future.

At this point I should like to refer to the 17th and 18th centuries and tell you of some women who, in those early years, led the way in industry, the professions, and the arts and sciences.

[Senator Connolly (Ottawa West).]

In 1702 a woman established and printed the first daily newspaper in the world. A woman wrote the first novel.

The reaping and harvesting machine was the brainchild of a woman who also invented paper tubs and pails. The gimlet screw for steamships, the cotton mill, the deep sea telescope, hydraulic engines, transmission of power cable cars, a spark arrester for trains, machinery used in building dams, combination locks and many more remarkable inventions I could name were thought out by women in those centuries. In the professions and arts many women of those times became equally well known.

In our own era there have been exceptional cases when women have become famous for their accomplishments. I will name Madame Curie for one. In the early part of this century, Nellie McClung, along with other dedicated women, worked to secure the right to vote. Perhaps that was the thin edge of the wedge in our time towards winning equality for women.

The purpose of International Women's Year is to change some of the time-worn ideas about women. The United Nations declared 1975 to be International Women's Year. Our government drafted cabinet documents outlining programs for the promotion of women in all spheres of our society. In fact, women are again emerging from the old traditions and are seeking equality.

We are pleased to know that the provincial governments have also taken steps to improve the status of women within the areas of provincial jurisdiction, such as property laws, civil rights and education.

● (1540)

Women comprise one-half the human race, and they are among the greatest contributors to a nation's growth, prosperity and development. Many people are coming around to the view that what we want to achieve is equal opportunity, and, at the same time, equal respect for the woman who chooses to follow the more traditional role of wife and mother.

Many women have successfully combined the duties of homemaking and motherhood with business or a profession, arranging their lives so that they can give care and attention to both. However, with few exceptions, where there are young children mothers are needed in the home. The little ones need the mother's presence, and the feeling of security that comes from knowing that mother is there.

It is true that changes have been made through legislation to improve the status of women. We know that during the past three decades women have come more and more out of the homes and into the business and professional life of the country. But it will take time and energy to attain full equality, and that only if women themselves have the patience and poise to make a concerted effort, and to accept a little progress at a time without fuss and contention. This is a challenge we must meet.

But if full equality comes, we may have to do without some of the courtesies which men have been in the habit of extending to the fair sex, and which we have learned to appreciate and expect. And why not?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 4, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 4, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

PRIVILEGE

PURCHASE AND SALE OF SHARES OF SKY SHOPS EXPORT LIMITED, DORVAL AIRPORT

Hon. Louis de G. Giguère: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday a member of the House of Commons asked the Minister of Transport to order an inquiry into a transaction I made in 1972. In his question, the member stated that I had purchased shares of Sky Shops Export Ltd., a company operating a duty-free shop at the Dorval Airport, for $1 in June 1972, and sold them for $20 in November of the same year, thus making a profit of $95,000; and that in the meantime the lease between Sky Shops and the Department of Transport had been extended for a period of five years, leaving the impression that I had something to do in the negotiations for an extended lease or that I knew of an eventual extension of the lease.

The story is quite different when one knows all the facts. In December 1969 or January 1970, the chairman of the board of the company, Sky Shops, who is a good friend of mine, offered me an option to buy 5,000 shares of the company at $1 per share, which was the price paid by all other shareholders.

About two years later—in December 1971 or January 1972—the matter was discussed between us again, and when he reiterated his offer I agreed to buy 5,000 shares at $1 per share. He told me then that when we returned to Montreal—we were in Florida at the time—he would make the necessary arrangements for the transfer of the shares. However, it was only at the beginning of June that we met again, at which time he told me to go to Ogilvy, Cope, attorneys for the company, where I could complete the transaction, which is what I did on June 12, 1972. I made out a cheque in the amount of $5,000 for 5,000 shares.

I then forgot the whole affair until I was told in November 1972 that a company, Lawson Travel Agency, had offered to purchase all 119,000 shares of Sky Shops at $20 per share. All the shareholders decided to accept this offer, as did I. I later reported the transaction in my income tax return and paid the required taxes.

The member of the other place, when he reported this transaction, mentioned that there could be a possible conflict of interest. I wish to state emphatically that I never at any time, directly or indirectly, intervened in any transaction between Sky Shops Export Ltd. and the Department of Transport, or any other department or agency of the federal government. Furthermore, I never asked any member of Parliament, senator, cabinet minister, or any official of the government, to favour any request by Sky Shops Export Ltd.

There was never any conflict of interest affecting me at any time. The purchase and sale by me of the shares of Sky Shops Export Ltd. were the purely private transactions which I have described. If, however, some honourable senators believe that there is, or was, any conflict of interest on my part, I would welcome an inquiry by an appropriate committee of the Senate, and I would be pleased to appear before such committee.

● (2010)

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Brewin had been substituted for that of Mr. Orlikow, that the name of Mr. Rompkey had been substituted for that of Mr. Portelance, that the names of Messrs. Portelance and Guay (St. Boniface) and Miss Bégin had been substituted for those of Mr. Rompkey, Miss Bégin and Mr. Guay (St. Boniface), and that the name of Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska) had been substituted for that of Mr. Beaudoin on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of State Act, Chapter S-15, R.S.C., 1970.

PRESS GALLERY

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to welcome to the gallery of the chamber this evening so many representatives of the fourth estate. We hope they will continue this worthwhile habit and thus see the constructive work done in the Senate.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

THE PRIME MINISTER

ORDERS IN COUNCIL CONCERNING PREROGATIVES—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, once again I have a question of the Leader of the Government. This time it is a rather, shall I say, exotic question, of some constitutional significance, I think. I am afraid he will have to take it as notice because I doubt if he has this particular piece of information at his fingertips.

Has any order in council or minute of council similar to P.C. 3374 of 1935, dealing with the prerogatives of the Prime Minister been passed since that date?

If so, when was it passed, and what are its terms?

I may say the first order of this sort was passed on May 1, 1896, by the government of Sir Charles Tupper and successive orders of the same sort were passed by various governments down to 1935, at least. I am anxious to find out whether any similar orders have been passed since and, if so, what are the terms.

Senator Perrault: I regret, honourable senators, I do not have this information immediately available at my desk. I shall take it as notice and endeavour to obtain as complete an explanation as possible, as quickly as possible.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

QUESTION

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, by coincidence my question involves Senator Forsey. I listened with interest to a television program on Sunday evening. There was some discussion about a committee involved in government secrecy, a committee that is investigating secrecy in government.

I must admit I was not present last week because I was on government business. I wonder if Senator Forsey might clarify this, because I have been questioned on the matter.

Senator Flynn: Did Senator Buckwold say he was on government business?

Senator Buckwold: I was out representing the government on public business. That is what I meant.

Senator Forsey: I doubt if I am allowed to answer a question of that sort, under the rules. I think I can only answer with the leave of the Senate and I will be very glad to do so.

Senator Buckwold: I did not get your response.

Senator Forsey: I would simply say that this matter was referred some time ago. Mr. Baldwin's bill on the subject was referred some time ago to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. That is the committee concerned.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I wish to yield to Senator Manning.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Manning proceed instead of Senator Petten?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Petten for affording me the privilege of speaking tonight.

Stripped of all political verbiage, the subject of this inquiry is the government's proposal to introduce in Canada a comprehensive program of income and price controls. This is an unprecedented step in peacetime and, therefore, is a matter not only of national importance but of grave national concern.

I commend the government leader for affording the Senate an opportunity to debate this matter without waiting for the legislation which is now being considered in the other place.

● (2020)

Certainly, this is a debate which extends far beyond the halls of Parliament. From one end of Canada to the other concerned citizens in all walks of life are arguing the consequences for good or evil which they believe the government's program will produce. In thousands of homes, in public forums, in professional offices, in the headquarters of labour unions, in the board rooms of corporations, concerned people are trying to find out precisely what the implications of this program are for them.

Needless to say, the opinions differ widely: some are voicing guarded approval; others are vehement in their denunciation; but the vast majority are hopelessly confused at this stage, and most are uncertain as to precisely what the government's proposals are and whether they will work or not.

Of one thing the people of Canada are certain: our economy in this country is in serious trouble, and inflation is our number one public enemy. For two years the government has drifted aimlessly without doing anything effective to resolve the great national problems which confront us. Have they at last come up with a solution, or is their belated attempt to curb inflation by imposing arbitrary income and price controls merely another example of governmental ineptitude?

To be fair, those who ask such questions also have a responsibility to answer them. May I, therefore, make clear at the outset that my assessment of this program is based on three convictions. In the first place, I believe the Government of Canada is sincerely anxious to come to grips effectively with the serious economic problems confronting us, especially the problem of inflation. It is superficial and unfair to dismiss what the government has proposed as a mere political gesture in response to mounting public demand that something concrete be done.

In the second place, I believe it is wrong and irresponsible to reject the government's proposals as being unfair to any group or groups in Canada, unless and until it is proven that such is the case. The government has emphatically stated its determination that the restraints proposed will be applied with equal fairness to incomes, to profits, and to prices. There is no valid reason to assume at this stage that this will not be done. Surely, the constructive and responsible thing is to accept the government's assurances, and defer further judgment on this point for at least three or four months, until actual experience proves or disproves the government's position.

Having regard to the gravity of the economic problems facing Canada today, every citizen has a responsibility to assess the government's proposals objectively. A wholly negative attitude at such a time as this is not the hallmark of statesmanship or leadership on the part of either management or labour. Most Canadians will deplore the negative responses of those who have condemned the proposals out of hand before even knowing precisely what they are, and without waiting until there is some evidence that they are not being applied with equal fairness to all segments of society.

In attempting to assess the proposals, we should remind ourselves, first of all, that income and price controls are not, and should never be regarded as, a solution to the problem of inflation. They bolt the lid on the kettle, but they can do little to cool the fires of inflation. As long as the fires are there, pressures within the economy will continue to build up, and they can be restrained by controls only for so long before the lid blows off. This is why countries which have tried controls have always faced a major problem when those controls finally broke down or were removed. At that time there is usually a rapid and large increase in prices, which may well trigger the whole cycle of inflation over again. Furthermore, it is usually harder for consumers to adjust to a deferred large and rapid price increase than to a series of smaller increases spread over a longer period of time.

The most we can reasonably hope for from a program of controls is, first, that they will provide, for those on fixed incomes and for the working poor, a temporary respite from further immediate large increases in the cost of living beyond what such people are able to absorb.

[Senator Manning.]

The second possible result, and perhaps even more important, is that controls may be effective in breaking the dangerous inflation psychology that has become entrenched in this and other countries in the last two or three years. Undoubtedly, this is one of the government's hopes. It is obvious that people have come to assume that prices will continue to rise, and as a result they do the very things which ensure that prices will be pushed still higher. Everyone is trying to protect himself and his interests by demanding more now to protect himself against even higher prices in the future. Most people have little trouble convincing themselves that they are entitled to more, and that they can get more if they are sufficiently vocal and militant in their demands. In the stampede to protect their self-interests, business leaders, labour unions, professional people and just about everybody else, are all trying to get more out of the national economy than they are putting in. As our aggregate demand exceeds our aggregate production the inevitable result is an upward pressure on prices.

This situation is aggravated by the current attitude towards work which has developed, with considerable help from governments, in recent years. In too many cases the philosophy seems to be, "Do less, but demand more, and no matter how much more you get, let the quality of your work continue to decline."

Statistics published recently show that wage and salary levels are about 13 per cent above the levels of a year ago, and that production per person is down 3.8 per cent. The average Canadian worker is being paid more, and is producing less, today than a year ago.

● (2030)

Governments have aided and abetted this trend by constantly promising more and more to the electorate in return for their votes, but seldom have they pointed out that every new service or facility provided has to be paid for by somebody, and now, in Canada at least, the bills are coming in. The popular fallacious concept that as a matter of right everybody should produce less and receive more has robbed this country of a level of productivity that could have averted many of the problems which have now moved the government to desperation measures as a last hope of averting a threatened economic collapse.

If the government's program succeeds, even in part, in ending the expectation philosophy and inflation psychology which presently prevails, it will be a major achievement, and the government will be deserving of and entitled to full credit.

It is obvious that to be successful the government's program must receive widespread public support, and the mobilization of such support is the major problem the government now faces. In trying to mobilize the necessary support the government will have to overcome four formidable obstacles, three of which are of the government's own making.

The first obstacle is the problem of credibility. For 18 months the government has adopted the attitude that there was no great urgency to do anything, certainly not anything drastic, to cope with worsening economic conditions. As far as income and price controls were concerned, the government repeatedly declared that these were unworkable, that they were not acceptable to the government and it was not the government's intention to employ wage and price controls in coping with the country's economic problems. It is no secret that the government won the last national election largely on this issue. We have to give the government credit for being more successful in selling to the Canadian people the idea that income and price controls was an undesirable policy than their opposition was in selling the idea that there was some merit in wage and price controls.

But having successfully convinced the Canadian people that there was no urgency to take any drastic action to cope with the worsening economic conditions, and that if any action was necessary it certainly was not income and price controls, the government now completely reverses its stand and puts itself in the unenviable position of having to convince the public that what six months ago was wrong and undesirable is now right and necessary, and the thing to which the Canadian people should give enthusiastic endorsement and support. That is why one of the greatest problems the Government of Canada will have in mobilizing the necessary support for its program is the credibility gap that has been created by that reversal of position.

It is completely inadequate for the government to say, "Well, conditions suddenly changed so dramatically that what was unacceptable six months ago is now the sound and desirable thing to have." For the past 18 months, leading economists, labour leaders, business people and a host of others have been stating repeatedly that we were headed for trouble. The storm signals were flying on every side and anyone, certainly anyone in government if he had his finger on the pulse of the country, could have predicted a year ago at least that we would shortly face a national economic crisis.

The second obstacle the government has to surmount—and this one is not of the government's making—is the fact that income and price controls have not worked successfully in other jurisdictions where they have been tried. This has been particularly noticeable on this continent in the recent experiment in the United States. Some senators may be acquainted with a book published recently by Charles Jackson Grayson, Jr., who was Chairman of United States Prices Commission, recruited by former President Nixon to head up the commission responsible for administering the United States program of income and price controls. Mr. Grayson acknowledges that he accepted the position with considerable enthusiasm because he felt that the program proposed was sound and necessary. However, in his book he lists some seven reasons why he has concluded from his experience that wage and price controls are unworkable and foredoomed to failure in a peacetime free society. This is in line with the experience in most other places where this kind of program has been tried.

In recent years we have heard many nationalists telling us that we should maintain our own identity and under no circumstances imitate or copy the United States, and it is a little ironic that, a year after that country abolished controls because they were not accomplishing what they had hoped, we are doing the same thing they tried and abandoned.

The government of this country has a rather poor track record when it comes to managerial expertise and it is asking quite a bit of the Canadian people to expect them to accept the proposition that the government will be able to make a success of a program which has not been successful in any other jurisdiction where it has been tried.

The third obstacle is the vagueness of the proposals themselves. Legislation for a program of this kind must of necessity be very broad in its provisions. Certainly the government cannot be faulted for not spelling out in detail exactly how the proposals will apply in each case and what the impact will be in each of the numerous areas affected; but the proposals, as presented to the public, are so vague that hundreds of questions remain unanswered. All across this country people are asking questions and are unable to obtain answers because the answers simply have not yet been formulated.

● (2040)

We all know that people tend to put the most unfavourable interpretation on proposals that are unduly vague and indefinite. The government would have been well advised to have taken a little longer to develop its proposals in considerably more detail than was done, to have thought through questions which the proposals were likely to invite, and to have had answers ready to meet inquiries from the public and allay the fears which have arisen. The very fact that the proposals are so vague, and that answers have not yet been formulated, implants in the public mind the impression that the program was hastily put together and without due attention to what the implications would be when it was put into operation.

There is a fourth obstacle which the government will have to overcome, and which was touched on by Senator Forsey in his address the other day. I refer to the incredibly poor psychology that the government used when it first presented its proposals to the public. Whether or not it is justified, the fact is the majority of Canadians are convinced that the government itself is the worst offender when it comes to lack of restraint. Public expenditures by the Government of Canada have increased from approximately $6 billion in 1966 to approximately $35 billion today. That is not the kind of track record which makes the public feel that the government attaches any real importance to exercising restraint.

All over this country people are saying, "Why is the government asking us to impose restraint on ourselves when governments, not only federal but provincial, are themselves showing no leadership in exercising restraint?"

Expenditures by the Province of Ontario have jumped from $2 billion ten years ago to approximately $11 billion today. Expenditures in my own province and in British Columbia have increased about the same. Right across Canada, almost without exception, the story is the same. The cold, hard, simple fact is that governments will not be successful in persuading citizens to exercise restraint until they themselves provide leadership in practising what they preach.

It is all very well to say that a large part of federal government expenditure is directed to the redistribution of the nation's wealth to the pensioners, the poor, the sick, the afflicted, and so on. No one suggests that the government should make cuts in those areas. That is not what Canadians are talking about. They are talking about the failure of the government to exercise restraint in areas that are well within its power to restrain without in any way adversely affecting the public interest. If, when announcing the government's program, the Prime Minister had zeroed in on half a dozen specific areas and given Canadians the assurance that in those areas the government was going to make immediate reductions, even though the total in dollars may have been only a few hundred million, the psychological impact would have been tremendous.

If honourable senators followed the press reports which appeared in the same week that the Prime Minister announced his program, they will agree that some of the newspaper articles the public was reading along with the Prime Minister's announcement certainly did not help the government's case.

Here is one headed: "Two million on public payroll," House told." It goes on to say that 19 per cent of Canada's work force is now on government payrolls. That represents 9 per cent of the Canadian population, or 88 people out of every 1,000. Governments could eliminate 10,000, 20,000, 50,000 people from the two million they now employ, and the public would never know the difference unless someone advertised in the media that the reduction had taken place.

Here is another article which appeared the same week: "Olympic entertainment to cost $8 million." The article goes on to say that to the cost of the Olympics to be held in Montreal, which has jumped from an initial estimate of $310 million to over $1 billion, is to be added another $8 million for entertainment when the show goes on the road.

Here is another: "$250 million tab possible for translation." The article goes on to say that the government is going to have translated some two million pages of technical papers—everything from plans for planes to manufacturer's manuals on guns for the armed forces. I know that bilingualism is official in Canada, but it is hard to get people to understand, when they have got along for a hundred years without these documents being translated into French, that now when everyone is asked to tighten his belt we have to spend $250 million to translate hundreds of manuals to conform with the government's policy of bilingualism.

Since I have mentioned the subject of bilingualism, I remind honourable senators that the government is now spending $350 million a year on this program. I suggest that we could cut those expenditures by $100 million and the public would never know the difference unless someone drew it to their attention.

Here is a gem: "$79,000 toilet study." The article says:

Government researchers will be skulking about in more of the nation's washrooms in a search for the ideal toilet.

Cost of the program so far is $79,000 and a written answer tabled in the Commons... indicated the program is only 40 per cent complete.

So that means there will be an expenditure of $200,000 before this proposed research is complete. The article goes on:

The government also surveyed a shopping plaza and three grandstands, and plans future studies of offices, industrial plants, schools, theatres and restaurants.

[Senator Manning.]

That appeared in the press the same week the public was being asked to accept a program of restraint to curb inflation.

I recall that the Prime Minister made a couple of memorable speeches some time ago in which he said they were going to keep the government out of the nation's bedrooms. I suggest he should make another speech on keeping the government out of the nation's bathrooms. We could save $200,000 of the taxpayers' money by that one simple decision alone.

• (2050)

Senator Buckwold: Put a lid on that program.

Senator Manning: Here is another news item: "Senior civil servants bitter over Ottawa's wage example." This is a Canadian Press dispatch out of Ottawa. Let me read a brief excerpt:

While Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau and his cabinet ministers stomp the country selling the government's anti-inflation program, there are gloomy predictions from many senior public servants that the program will never be a success until there is a top-level, we-mean-business example from Ottawa.

"So far neither the politicians nor the senior public servants have been asked to make a sacrifice," said one official who recently received a $4,000 annual increase. "Until we make that gesture, I don't see how we can ask everyone else to make sacrifices."

It goes on to mention that there were 1,150 top-level officials who were granted increases from $2,000 to $6,000. Senator Forsey referred to this. I understand that the increases were approved, as he said, some months ago, but it came out in the media at the the same time as the Prime Minister's appeal to the Canadian people to exercise restraint.

The article continues:

One senior public servant, obviously bitter at the government's approach, said the increase he and others received recently should have been rolled back within the guides and MPs should be asked to make the same sacrifice being asked of other working Canadians.

I agree with that wholeheartedly.

I mentioned in this house when opposing the members' indemnity increase last year that it was not a matter of the dollars involved—the amount is but a drop in the bucket of total federal government expenditures—but the adverse psychological impact on the Canadian people. The 33½ per cent raise granted at that time has become a factor in almost every labour-management wage negotiation that has taken place since.

Honourable senators will have noticed from the press that when the Minister of Labour has tried to sell the government's program to representatives of organized labour he has repeatedly been asked, "Why are you talking to us about restricting our wage increases to 10 per cent when you gave yourself 33½ per cent?"

You can argue until you are black in the face that the circumstances are not the same. The psychological impact is there and, in my judgment at least, it was incredibly poor psychology for the Prime Minister of Canada to appeal to the public for restraint without at the same time saying, "We are going to cut $50 million from the budget of the CBC; we are going to cut $50 million out of the bilingualism program; we are going to stop these stupid programs that are not doing anyone any good; we are going to cut back on the public service. We are not merely going to stop buying a few pens and paper clips; we are going to make some real meaningful reductions in government spending. We are even prepared to roll back our own indemnities and those of the senior public servants, and apply to ourselves and to them the same guidelines we are asking everyone else in Canada to accept."

In conclusion, let me stress that I sincerely hope the government's program will be given a fair trial, and I hope it will prove successful. It is the course that the government of this country, acting on behalf of the Canadian people, has decided to pursue. I hope every Canadian citizen, every corporation, every labour union, every profession, every organization, every level of government, and every member of Parliament, will recognize and accept the responsibility each has to help make the program work.

But I repeat, income and price controls are not the long range answer to the problem of inflation in this or any other country. Inflation can be successfully brought under control only if and when at least three things happen. First, a lessening of the external inflationary pressures as the economies of other nations improve, particularly those nations with which we are trading partners; secondly, a significant increase in Canadian productivity, and this will happen only if the government stops stifling initiative and enterprise by unnecessary bureaucratic interference, and by excessive taxation that destroys the incentive of the Canadian people to invest in the development of the economy of their own country; and thirdly, a recognition by management and labour that they are integral parts of the same team, and that they must work together to make maximum production their goal for the good of all.

Finally, for inflation to be kept under control, after these other requirements are met, we as a people must recognize that self-discipline is a necessary virtue, because self-discipline moves people to impose on themselves, without government laws or regulations, whatever restraints are needed, not only for their own good but for the good of others. Therein may well lie the key to the future well-being of our nation.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 5, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Jacob Austin, Esquire, has been summoned to the Senate.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons, which was read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and was seated:

Hon. Jacob Austin of the City of Vancouver, British Columbia, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. George van Roggen.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, on a personal note may I say that I have had the pleasure of knowing our new senator for many years and I am certain that he will make an able, conscientious and hard-working senator. I know you will join with me in welcoming him to our ranks.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I join with pleasure the Leader of the Government in welcoming our new senator. I am sure we can use some of the expert knowledge that he possesses in many fields.

Senator Austin came to Ottawa in, I think, 1963, as executive assistant to our late colleague Senator Laing when he was appointed Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. He later became Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and, I am told, is the father of Petro-Can. But I can't bring myself to believe he will want to claim that paternity for very long. I think it is worth mentioning that after his stage as a deputy minister, Senator Austin went to the Prime Minister's Office. I am sure he will agree that that is a great place to be from. Furthermore, for anyone out of the Prime Minister's Office, an appointment to this place cannot be looked upon as anything but a promotion.

Senator Austin is invited to lend his voice to the many other voices of wisdom one hears in this place. I'm sure his contribution will be worthwhile. I would add that it is interesting to note that the Prime Minister, having appointed a Tory to reinforce the Opposition, did not lose any time in reinforcing the Government ranks.

• (1410)

Hon. J. J. Greene: Honourable senators, if I might be permitted a word in joining other senators in welcoming Senator Austin. I might say that I have had a very special relationship with him. I was once his minister in Energy, Mines and Resources, when he was my deputy minister and, as such, under our system, obviously my boss. Therefore, it is nice to have him here now where we can be equals.

Senator Flynn: He is going to be helpful to you, I am quite sure.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, it is unusual that when a new senator is introduced in the Senate he is from the same province as the Leader of the Government and the second senator who escorts him into the chamber. Senator Perrault has already spoken, not only as the Leader of the Government but also as representative of British Columbia in the Senate. I will not speak in that capacity. However, I wish to say that as a person who has worked in many areas with Senator Austin over the last 15 years, he brings to this chamber an exceedingly keen intellect and a hard-driving and hard-working approach to anything he undertakes. I am sure that this will greatly benefit the Senate in years to come.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of expenditures and administration in connection with the Family Allowances Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 14 of the said Act, Chapter F-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of expenditures and administration in connection with the Old Age Security Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 26 of the said Act, Chapter O-6, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a Statement of the effect of placing endangered species of wild fauna and flora on the import control list, issued by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce pursuant to section 5 of the Export and Import Permits Act, Chapter E-17, as amended by section 3 of Chapter 29 (2nd Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Agreement, dated October 17, 1975, between the Government of Canada and the Province of Quebec concerning information, recruitment and selection of foreign nationals residing outside of Canada for permanent residence or temporary employment in the Province of Quebec.

Statutory Declaration of Ann Elizabeth Haddon Bell, of the City of Nanaimo, British Columbia, formerly Ann Elizabeth Haddon Heath, a member of the Senate of Canada, declaring that her name is now Ann Elizabeth Haddon Bell.

PRIVATE BILL

EASTERN CANADA SAVINGS AND LOAN COMPANY AND CENTRAL & NOVA SCOTIA TRUST COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill S-29, to enable the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company and Central & Nova Scotia Trust Company to amalgamate, presented the following report:

Wednesday, November 5, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill S-29, intituled: "An Act to enable The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company and Central & Nova Scotia Trust Company to amalgamate", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, October 28, 1975, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments in the French text only:

1. Page 1: In the Preamble strike out the words "la Compagnie d'épargne et de prêt du Canada-Est et la" and substitute therefor the following:
"la compagnie The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company et la compagnie"
2. Page 2: Strike out lines 13 and 14 and substitute therefor the following:
"compagnie The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company et"
3. Page 2: Strike out lines 34 and 35 and substitute therefor the following:
"compagnie The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company et la compagnie Trust Central et Nouvelle-Écosse"
4. Page 3: Strike out lines 6 and 7 and substitute therefor the following:
"compagnie The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company était une compagnie fiduciaire au sens de"
5. Page 3: Strike out line 25 and substitute therefor the following:
"compagnie Trust Central et Nouvelle-Écosse avait reçu,"
6. In the Title: Strike out the words "la Compagnie d'épargne et de prêt du Canada-Est et la", and substitute therefor the following:
"la compagnie The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company et la compagnie"

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hayden moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

SCIENCE POLICY

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Senator Lamontagne, Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, presented the second report of the committee as follows:

Your committee recommends that its quorum be five (5) members.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Yes. It is a very grave matter.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE PRIME MINISTER

ORDERS IN COUNCIL CONCERNING PREROGATIVES— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon Honourable Senator Forsey asked the following question:

Has any order in council or minute of council similar to P.C. 3374 of 1935, dealing with the prerogatives of the Prime Minister been passed since that date?

If so, when was it passed, and what are its terms?

In response to the question, I can report that no order in council or minute of council similar to P.C. 3374 has been passed since 1935.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to your attention the latest information about the postal dispute. Unfortunately, I can report no striking breakthroughs or successes from this morning. However, the government remains hopeful about the possibility of an early settlement, and should one occur this afternoon or while we are deliberating it will be duly reported.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was presented Wednesday, October 29, 1975.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, in presenting the report of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders last week I indicated that I would try to give an explanation today of the changes to the rules which your committee recommends. I asked that the report be printed as an appendix in the Debates of the Senate and in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, so that all senators would have an opportunity to see what is proposed. I will deal with the matter as quickly as I can because I realize that rules are not a very thrilling subject. They are important, however. One might say that they are a little like money: rather difficult to keep, but it is exceedingly awkward if you don't have any.

● (1420)

I would like to add one other gratuitous, if perhaps contentious, comment on this subject. I believe that rules are an extension of the democratic process because they make conditions the same for all. They reduce the advantages of the selfish who disregard the interests of the whole.

The changes were suggested by members of this chamber and by the Clerk of the Senate and his staff. While many are just small changes, with the object of clarifying wording, they were brought up because of ambiguities which were discovered and which in some cases led to debate in the chamber. An illustration of this latter situation was our lack of clear understanding as to what authority the forms and proceedings of the Senate, as set forth in appendix II, wielded. You may remember that there was a debate as to whether or not they had the same weight as rules.

If I may I will now run down the proposed changes with a word of explanation in each case.

Rule 1. This is a very minor change which merely tidies up the wording of the rule, eliminating the phrase, "... the forms and proceedings of the Parliament of Canada..." which do not exist, and substituting, "... the usages, forms and proceedings of either house of the Parliament of Canada..."

Rule 3. The only change here is in the preamble to the rule which says, "Notwithstanding anything in these rules..." It was pointed out by a senator that this rule was in conflict with some others. It is a simple change.

Rule 6. This rule states: "These rules shall come into force on a day to be fixed by order of the Senate."

Again, this is a minor change. The previous wording was, "go into operation," which was rather unsuitable.

Rule 14. The change you will see there is simply to clarify the procedure. The new rule says: "14. When the Senate adjourns, senators shall stand until the Speaker has left the chamber."

The present rule provides that senators shall keep their places until the Speaker has left the chamber, and as we know senators frequently are not in their places.

Rule 14A. This is a new rule and it regularizes a procedure that we follow by way of motion or resolution in each session. It simplifies a mechanism by which the Speaker recalls the Senate at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for adjournment, if the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier.

[Senator Moison.]

The other two subclauses of 14A are simply the normal addition to such a clause:

14A. (2) Non-receipt by a senator of the notice referred to in subsection (1) does not affect the validity of the notice.

(3) In the absence of the Speaker, or where the office of Speaker is vacant, the Clerk of the Senate may act for the purposes of this rule.

This is to make sure that the Senate can be called if necessity dictates.

Rule 15. The present rule reads:

15. The Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide points of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate. In explaining a point of order or practice he shall state the rule or authority applicable to the case.

We are simply adding this clarifying sentence: "When the Speaker rises, all other Senators shall remain seated or shall resume their seats." This is the case, for example, when the Speaker calls the Senate to order. The addition clarifies the procedure we adopt to help the Speaker maintain order.

Rule 28. This rule commences with the words:

A Senator shall not speak twice to a question before the Senate...

This is now changed to read: "A Senator shall not speak more than once," which is obviously the intention underlying the rule.

Rule 29. There we are adding inquiries to the list of items with respect to which a senator shall have the right of final reply. At present, a senator who has moved second reading of a bill or who has made a substantive motion, shall have the right of final reply. It was felt that inquiries should be included. The new rule will read:

A Senator who has moved the second reading of a bill or made a substantive motion or an inquiry, shall have the right of final reply.

Rule 32, honourable senators, involves a minor change in wording. The existing rule says:

A debate shall not be in order on a mere interrogatory—

That is now changed to:

A debate shall not be in order on an oral question—

We felt this change was necessary because we have run into some misunderstandings on this point.

Rule 34A is new. It is the result of increased discussion in this chamber and in committees as to whether tradition permits us to quote from speeches made in the other place. As a result, based on precedent and practice and in order to clarify our procedure, this new rule 34A has been added:

The content of a speech made in the House of Commons in the current session may be summarized, but it is out of order to quote from such a speech unless it be a speech of a Minister of the Crown in relation to government policy. A Senator may always quote from a speech made in a previous session.

Rule 36.(1) involves a change in wording by adding thereto the words "to adjourn the debate.". This new rule reads:

When a question is under debate, a motion shall not be received "unless it is a motion to amend the question, to refer the question to a committee, to adjourn the debate, to postpone the debate to a certain day, for the previous question, or for the adjournment of the Senate."

This minor change has been made to clarify the wording.

Rule 36.(3) has also been amended by the insertion of these words in the latter part of the rule: "If the motion for the previous question is defeated,". At present this part of the rule simply reads: "If it is defeated,".

Again, this is a minor change purely for purposes of clarification.

Rule 37. This rule has been considered rather ambiguous and it has been tidied up to conform to an acceptable procedure. It will read:

A Senator called to order by the Speaker shall discontinue his remarks and may not speak further, except on the point of order, until the point of order has been decided.

● (1430)

Rule 42. Again, this is a clarification. The rule reads: "The Speaker shall stand uncovered..." and the committee thought it would be better if it read: "The Speaker shall stand head uncovered...". This rule at present also provides that the Speaker shall leave the Chair when he or she proposes to address the House, and it has been reworded to read "when participating in a debate". That is, again, a very minor change.

Rule 45.(1)(f). This amendment eliminates the words "not merely formal in its character", referring to the adoption of a report from any standing committee. Those words were confusing and added nothing. The committee proposes that rule 45.(1)(f) should read: "for the adoption of a report from any standing committee".

Rule 46.(f). The word "question," which is used in many different senses in parliamentary language, has been changed to "matter." This clause now reads: "for the adjournment of the Senate, while a matter is under discussion".

Rule 46.(g) is amended in the same way, the word "question" being changed for the word "matter." In the French version there are two minor changes. Again the words "une question" have been changed to "une affaire." In the French version only in clause (s) we find "d'autres questions purement courantes ou non contentieuses." That has been amended by substituting the more appropriate word "motions."

Rule 54.(1). At present this rule provides: "All bills introduced in the Senate shall be in the English and French languages." As we know, many or most bills come from the House of Commons, and we do not have the opportunity to put them in the form we consider best. It is now a statutory requirement that all bills be printed in both languages. We have therefore changed this rule to read: "In any bill originating in the Senate ..." again, a minor change. Clauses (1) and (2) have been combined, and in the proposed clause (2) we have substituted "The text of any such bill" for "The text of the bill." It is a minor rewording. Clause (4), which now becomes clause (3), provides that a memorandum by the draftsman shall be provided. The amended clause commences: "An explanatory note outlining briefly the reasons for each amendment..." Clause (5), now clause (4), is changed in a minor way. As amended, it reads:

This rule shall as far as practicable apply to the reprinting of any such bill.

That, again, refers to bills originating in the Senate.

Rule 56. In the past we have had discussions as to whether this is a hard and fast rule. It now reads: "The principle of a bill is debated at its second reading." The committee has amended the rule to read: "The principle of a bill is usually debated at its second reading."

Rule 66.(1). The amendment to this rule is that the words "select committees" have been substituted for the words "standing committees." This rule refers to the committee of selection appointed at the commencement of each session. The rule at present provides:

At the commencement of each session a committee of selection consisting of nine senators named by the Senate shall be appointed whose duty it shall be to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees.

It goes further than that, and provides that the committee of selection shall nominate the senators to serve on all select committees.

Rule 67.(1)(f) gives the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration the power to carry on the administration of the Senate without the necessity of having a matter referred to it by the chamber.

As we all know, this committee is actually the management committee for the Senate, and it should be in a position to consider matters and take action on any matters—domestic, housekeeping, administration or finance—without the necessity of a motion being passed in the House. The change in the wording makes that possible.

The clause now reads:

The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum—

And here is the change:

—which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

So, while the committee does not have to have matters referred on motion, it does have to report back to the House if it takes some action.

Rule 67.(1)(k)(i). For some time there has been a mistake in this clause, which reads:

(i) banking, insurance, trust and loan companies, credit societies, caisses populaires and small loans;

The last group of words should be "small loans companies". Therefore, the word "companies" has been added.

Rules 67.(1)(g) to 67.(1)(m) establish the committees, and in each we have added the phrase "if there is a motion to that effect." For example, rule 67.(1)(g) reads:

The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to foreign and commonwealth relations generally, including—

And it will now read:

The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to foreign and commonwealth relations generally, including—

At the moment we have some difficulty because the instruction that a matter "shall be referred" does not always follow, because a matter is referred only if there is a motion in the chamber referring the matter to committee. I wonder if that is clear?

Senator Langlois: No, it is not clear.

Senator Molson: At the moment the wording is "to which shall be referred all matters". That is not necessarily true, because we do not refer every matter. It does not mean that because a matter exists it has to be referred. It is referred only if there is a motion in the house referring it to committee. The wording is not very clear.

Senator Flynn: Why not say "may"?

Senator Molson: The house decides, if a motion is put, whether a matter may be referred. If there is no motion, the matter does not go before the committee.

Senator Langlois: Are you merely changing the word "shall" for "may"?

Senator Molson: At the moment the rule says "to which shall be referred". We are adding "if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred".

Senator Argue: Can any senator make that motion?

Senator Molson: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Then we are not forced to refer an appropriation bill to the National Finance Committee!

Senator Deschatelets: Does it mean that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs would not be able to study a certain matter unless it is empowered to do so by the Senate?

Senator Molson: That is my understanding, Senator Deschatelets. If the committee itself wanted to study a certain aspect of foreign affairs, it would come to the chamber and have the matter referred to it, and there would be a motion to that effect. But that does not happen automatically.

● (1440)

As you will see from the wording, these rules refer to not only bills, but to "all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating". At the moment, you might describe it as being a bit furry. It is not very clear. This amendment means that if the Senate wishes the action, there is a motion agreed to; if it does not wish the action, there is no motion. I hope that is just as clear as it was before I started.

In rule 68 we have added words to provide that the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate shall be ex officio members of the Committee of Selection. This was not spelled out in the old rule. The Committee of Selection, as I mentioned earlier, meets at the beginning of each session to nominate honourable senators to the various committees, and this change makes it clear that the two leaders are ex officio members of that committee, which they were in fact, but not by any rule previously.

[Senator Molson.]

Rule 69 has been changed. This comes about as a result of certain misunderstandings over the last two or three sessions. The new rule provides a very simple way of getting the committees to work once the members have been nominated by the Committee of Selection, and they have been properly constituted. This rule will enable them to get down to their tasks right away. It reads as follows:

The Clerk of the Senate shall, as soon as practicable after a committee has been appointed, call an organization meeting of the committee, and the committee shall at that meeting choose a chairman.

It is merely a way of instigating the first action.

Rule 70. This was a matter of considerable discussion by the committee. As most honourable senators are well aware, we have had a great deal of difficulty with respect to the matter of quorums and attendances of committees, and with spreading our membership too thinly. It was suggested that non-members of committees might attend and form part of the quorum, but this was discarded as being impossible. The new rule will enable the committees to carry on with the hearing of evidence and their normal procedures, but not to take a vote without a quorum. In other words, a committee will be able to hear witnesses and take evidence without having a quorum.

As I said, this matter was discussed at great length by the committee, which felt this to be a very sensible rule, and one which does not, in any sense, weaken the powers of the committees because, when it comes to a vote on some matter, there must be a quorum present.

The committee would delete rule 74.(2). I do not recall by whom this deletion was suggested, but the rule does seem to be a bit anachronistic in this modern age. It provides that the mover of a motion to establish a special committee shall have the right to nominate the senators to serve on that committee. That seemed quite unnecessary and out of place in our procedures today. It has not been followed, to the knowledge of any member of the committee, for a very long time, so we deleted it.

Rule 77.(6) is new. It is suggested in an effort to get around the somewhat lengthy discussion we had last year as to how the conduct of affairs in the Senate or in committees is to be governed. The new rule 77.(6) reads:

Except as provided in these rules, a select committee shall not, without the approval of the Senate, adopt any special procedure or practice that is inconsistent with the practices and usages of the Senate itself.

It merely gives force to the idea that the child of the parent conforms to the actions and practices of the parent. I think it is innocuous, but it does clarify the functions and procedures of committees.

The wording of rule 78.(5) is changed to conform to our practice. The adjective "legislative" is eliminated, and the amended phrase is "that require implementation by the Senate". The word "legislative" was considered to be redundant in that case. Any implementation by the Senate requires action, and this is what we are discussing. The proviso at the end of the existing rule is deleted. Those words are underlined, and are as follows:

Provided that where the recommended amendments or proposals which require legislative implementation are substantial, consideration of the report shall be postponed to a future day.

So, the new rule is clearer, tidier and shorter.

Rule 90. This, again, is merely a tidying up of an old rule which has to change with the times. It deals with the deposit of money to cover the cost of translation and printing of a private bill. The major change is the removal of the requirement for the printing of 800 copies in English and 300 copies in French. That now is left up to the committee. The rule also states that the money has to be paid before the introduction of the bill, rather than immediately after second reading.

Rule 100. In this case, it is a matter of semantics. In the present version the wording is "An important amendment", and the recommended wording is "A substantial amendment". That, again, is a minor tidying up.

In rule 113, the word "question" is changed to "matter"—again, because it is ambiguous.

The new French version of rule 113 eliminates a phrase in the middle, which was perhaps redundant and the meaning not altogether clear. The eliminated phrase is "la question de vacance de siège étant ainsi posée", and the rule now reads: "... examiner et régler cette affaire de vacance de siège." This, again, is just a clarification of the wording.

Rule 114. This rule is amended to read: "Within the first twenty sitting days..." as opposed to: "Within the first twenty days..."

Honourable senators, as I said when I presented the report of the committee, other changes are being made to the rule book to improve it. These are first, and perhaps most important, a new index which, I hope, will make it much easier for us to find an applicable rule quickly; secondly, the marginal notes in the rule book are being brought up to date—it is obvious that they have to be, and they will be brought up to date in accordance with the many amendments and changes which have occurred; thirdly, Appendix I, which is a table of related statutes, will be brought up to date; and, lastly, Appendix II, which I mentioned previously, the Forms and Proceedings of the Senate, has been clarified so as to provide us with background information on the customs, usages, forms and practices of the Senate, and ensure that they are not confused with and taken as rules.

I now call your attention to rule 6, which states:

These rules shall come into force on a day to be fixed by order of the Senate.

It is suggested that this day be January 5, 1976, if the printing can be completed by that date.

● (1450)

I should like to add one further note. A communication has been received from the House of Commons saying that in their view the three joint committees of the two houses on the Library, the Restaurant and the Printing, should be replaced by one new joint committee to be named the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament and Other Shared Services. This matter was referred to our committee by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, and has been approved in principle by that committee. It is probable, therefore, that there will be a further amendment to our rules in the near future, and that will be brought forward by the Rules Committee when we feel we are in agreement with the House of Commons on these changes.

Honourable senators, I have taken up enough of your time, and I resume my seat in the hope that I have given you an adequate explanation of this report.

Senator Goldenberg: I wonder if the honourable senator would explain the origin of and reason for the new rule 34A. It is the rule that it is out of order to quote remarks made in the other place in the current session.

Senator Molson: I should have suspected that Senator Goldenberg would ask that question. It is probably the most difficult matter to reply to.

This rule is really based only on precedent and practice in the relationship between the two houses. As far as I know, from time immemorial it has been considered inappropriate to quote from the current Hansard of the other house, I think probably to avoid contentious issues or the picking of arguments between the two houses. I know that in the years I have been here I have frequently been told by senators of longer standing, by the previous Clerk of the Senate and the present Clerk of the Senate, that there is a certain delicacy in dealing with current matters, which should never be a source of unnecessary friction between the two houses. For that reason, in an effort to devise an appropriate rule covering the situation and to set some standard on the matter, your committee finally evolved this one. Whether it is adequate or not I cannot say, but your committee felt that it summarized the relationship and covered the situation.

Senator Rowe: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Could Senator Molson tell us whether what he says has been a tradition in this house is applicable in the other house?

Senator Molson: I have had no experience in the other house, but from what I have been told over the years I understand that this rule is very much respected in the House of Commons. I have never read of our proceedings being quoted there. It may have happened, but I have never seen it in Hansard, and I have never heard our proceedings discussed in the other house, so I think the rule is respected there.

Senator Laird: Perhaps I might be permitted to point out that some few months ago I introduced a simple bill here.

Senator Flynn: We all remember.

Senator Laird: The debate lasted ten days. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration graciously informed me one day that that bill had passed first, second and third readings in one day in the House of Commons. I wondered how that had happened, and I took the trouble to read the House of Commons Hansard. I found that there had been perhaps half a dozen speakers in the debate there, and that our proceedings were quoted verbatim. Everything I had said here in introducing the bill was quoted there.

Senator Argue: With no objection to it.

Senator Laird: No one objected.

Senator Molson: I thank my honourable friend for giving me one of the exceptions. I am afraid there is nothing we can do about it.

Senator Forsey: In connection with rule 54.(1) I should like to ask about what appears to be an omission. The present rule 54.(1), judging by the document I have before me, says that all bills introduced in the Senate shall be in the English and French languages, but in the revised rules I do not see anything about that. Is there some explanation of that apparent omission?

Senator Molson: The reason sub-rule (1) is omitted is because it is now a statutory requirement that all bills be in French and English.

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators, it is with some hesitation that I rise to take part in this debate. I find myself impelled to do so because of my concern with a process that I think is going on in the Senate, which may be very dangerous for the Senate. I have some trepidation about this, because I recognize the extensive work done by the committee in bringing forward this report. However, I find myself in some difficulty in discussing what I want to raise because of the procedure now being adopted, which is the approval of a report.

The question before the Senate is whether or not we approve or adopt the report. I would have liked a procedure that would have permitted us to examine the amendments item by item and then get detailed explanations, and indeed amend them, if we saw fit to do so, item by item. In other words, I am expressing the hope that when proposed amendments to the rules of the Senate come before us another time we consider first another method of using the procedures available to this chamber for considering the matter.

It seems to me that this procedure is not wholly acceptable, because I find myself in the predicament of feeling considerable gratitude to the committee for the work they have done and, therefore, not wanting to block their report in any way, but at the same time feeling quite unsatisfied about some of the reasons for certain amendments. I frankly admit that I have not had an opportunity of making the examination I would like to have made of them between the time the report was tabled and now, when concurrence in the report is moved.

I hope the Senate will not continue what seems to me the practice it has fallen into in recent years of spelling out all its practices in the form of Rules of the Senate rather than what would seem, to me at least, the more acceptable practice of following the broad lines of the practice of the Senate over the years and making such changes as are required and adapting them to modern times.

In my view, as part of questions which I regard as very pressing and important is the larger question of parliamentary reform. There should be an opportunity to discuss in committee—my own view would be in Committee of the Whole—the extent to which we should be considering reform of the practices of the Senate, and possibly the rules of the Senate as well. Instead of that, we are now engaged in a discussion of whether or not we will concur in a report amending certain rules of the Senate, and at the same time we are precluded from discussing the extent to which changes in our practices might or might not be adopted.

● (1500)

As a former member of the other house, I am one who thinks that when a bill originating in the House of Commons is received here and read the first time, the sponsor here should be permitted, without notice, to make a statement, and that the present two-day notice should be applicable only to further debate on the bill. That is the kind of practice which should be discussed on some suitable occasion. The practice on adjournment motions should be discussed as well.

In any event, coming more particularly to the rules, may I trespass on the time of the Senate for a very few minutes to raise some questions. Rule 1 provides:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either house of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Does this mean that a committee in the Senate should follow the practice of the House of Commons instead of following the usages and practices of the Senate? That is the way it reads.

Senator Molson: Are you addressing the question to me, Senator McIlraith?

Senator McIlraith: I wish to develop that question, if I may. That is the way the clause reads. I am quite sure it was not intended that we should in committees of the Senate disregard the usages of the Senate, in favour of usages of the House of Commons. The practice in the Senate has always been to follow the usages and practices of the Senate; and in the House of Commons, of course, to follow the usages and practices of the House of Commons. However, here, in spelling out the rules, we do something a little different. I do not think it was intended. I hope in due course we can get an explanation of it.

I come then to rule 34A which is:

The content of a speech made in the House of Commons in the current session may be summarized, but it is out of order to quote from such a speech unless it be a speech of a Minister of the Crown in relation to government policy. A Senator may always quote from a speech made in a previous session.

In the other place bills are presented by parliamentary secretaries, of whom there are a great number nowadays. There are private members bills presented by private members. A minister of the Crown, when presenting a bill in the other place, may make a speech that has no relationship to government policy. It may be on some factual or evidentiary matter supporting the bill. Yet, we are to be restricted here in respect of making reference to, and quoting from, such a speech in those circumstances. I do not believe the new rule 34A expresses what the committee was trying to get at. I believe it is unduly restrictive, and would like to hear some comment on that.

[Senator Laird.]

By the way, I regret that the procedure we are now using does not put the rules we are discussing in Hansard beside today's debate. They will be found in another place, in another paper, instead of in immediate conjunction to this debate today, as they would be if we were in Committee of the Whole. However, that is an aside.

Senator Croll: Are they not printed as an appendix to the Debates of October 29 last?

Senator McIlraith: That is not my point. The point I am making is about the form of the printed record of today's debate. It will not contain the rules that we are now discussing in precise form at the head of the debate, as would have been the case had we followed another procedure. Some thought should be given to that.

Senator Croll: They are appended to the Debates of October 29.

Senator McIlraith: Another form of the record of the Debates is to have the new rules printed there as is the case in Committee of the Whole, when we would approve them clause by clause.

In rule 46.(f), the change, as was explained by Senator Molson, is that instead of the word "question" we now have the word "matter". This change has been made in several of the new rules, with what I think are very significant consequences.

The whole subject matter of what a "question" is and so forth is discussed in Beauchesne, Fourth Edition, Annotation 191, to be found at page 163. If I may, just for the purpose of making the point, I will read one or two sentences.

The question is the subject matter of the motion, and on the merits of that subject matter the House has to give a decision—

In another place it reads:

The judgment or will of the House of Commons is that which is evidenced by the consent or agreement of the majority. In order to ascertain this agreement, the adopted method of proceeding consists in the submission of a proposition upon which the members express their opinion by a simple affirmative or negative.

That explains the method. Then, coming to the head of the annotation:

Every matter is determined in the House of Commons upon a question put by the Speaker on a proposition submitted by a member and resolved either in the affirmative or negative as the case may be.

The "question" is the decision of the relevant house of Parliament. It is the "question" that is debated, and you can raise many matters when you are discussing a "question". When that is taken away other rights, such as the right to move a motion, and so on, are affected. "Matter" is a different term altogether. The removal of the word "question" interferes with the rights of senators. I would like some explanation, beyond what has been given, of the removal of the word "question", which describes the process, so far as I know, in all the textbooks and all the decided cases. It is the terminology used in the decision-making process—the determination of the "question."

I would like to hear more explanation of what the significance and consequences are of changing "question" to "matter" throughout the rules. I have not thought them all through yet, as I indicated at the opening part of my speech.

Senator Langlois: "Question" is defined in rule 5.(n).

• (1510)

Senator McIlraith: I think I had better put that on the record. Rule 5.(n) reads:

"question" means a proposal presented to the Senate or a committee thereof by the Speaker or chairman for consideration and disposal in some manner.

Honourable senators will see that the word "question" has a precise legal meaning within the context of our own rules, but the word "matter"—

Senator Flynn: It includes "question."

Senator Molson: That is our point.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, but it goes far beyond the things that would make a speech out of order, although it includes them. A senator is to be denied the right to move certain adjournment motions, for example, if the Senate is discussing a matter that is out of order. "Question" is a precise word that is capable of being understood.

There may be an explanation, and if so I would be most happy to receive it. As I say, I am not, at the moment, satisfied that there is an explanation.

The new rule 56 is:

The principle of a bill is usually debated at its second reading.

What is the significance of that? What is the reason for not making it mandatory, and saying that it shall be discussed at the second reading—not at its first or third reading, but at its second reading? It seems to me that the insertion of the word "usually" does not strengthen the practice but, rather, makes the practice uncertain, and dilutes it. In any event, I hope that will be explained further.

The whole of the new rule 67 troubles me, as does the existing rule 67, because it provides in all cases that, subject to a motion being made, certain matters shall be referred to certain committees. For example, so far as the rules go there is no way of referring a question relating to a narrow aspect of banking—certain financial implications with which we are concerned—to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce if it is a matter dealing overall with health. It would be mandatory for us to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. The new rule proposed is equally deficient on that point, and it seems to me that that is not in accord with our practice.

Senator Flynn: You could not refer a health matter to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce under the new rule.

Senator McIlraith: Well, let me use rule 67.(i) to illustrate the point. In the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce this morning reference was made to a shipping conference matter. If that had been all we were discussing, it could not have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce under these rules.

Senator Flynn: No, and not under the new rule either.

Senator McIlraith: That is what I say. It seems to me that those two rules, the new and the old, are defective for the same reason, and the point has not been dealt with in the proposed amendment.

Senator Molson: Why would you refer the matter to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce?

Senator McIlraith: Because it related incidentally and in a subsidiary way to the competition legislation, which I think all honourable senators will agree was properly referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. That is the kind of thing I am referring to. If the matter arose in the house it seems to me that, by way of motion, it would have had to be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for examination.

Senator Flynn: With unanimous consent you could do it.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, but, incidentally, the doctrine of unanimous consent is, in my opinion, foreign to the Canadian Parliament. I deplore the practice we use when we propose to waive a rule—usually for a time of debate. If it is something for which the rules require two days' notice, and we desire to proceed without giving the two days' notice, instead of asking, "Is there leave of the chamber?" we have fallen into the habit of asking for unanimous consent. They are quite different things. "Leave" merely means that all honourable senators are agreeable to proceeding now.

Senator Flynn: Yes, all honourable senators.

Senator McIlraith: It means all honourable senators present are agreeable to proceeding now, but it involves their doing nothing unless they object to proceeding now. If they do object, they say so. "Unanimous consent" involves quite a different thing. Unanimous consent involves their committing themselves to taking an active step, but parliamentary procedure is not based on the doctrine of unanimous consent. That doctrine of unanimous consent came from certain countries which have a different system of government from ours. It is really the Russian veto, and it arose through the United Nations. It is not a technique we should use. We are asking, "Is there leave?" or "Does any member object?" That is what we mean to ask. In any event, that is not germane to the rules before us today.

Honourable senators, I think that concludes the points I want to raise at this moment. I hope that when we come to deal with the rules again we give advance consideration to a form of usage and practice that will enable us to get at these kinds of questions in a more particular way. Although I have asked many questions, I do not want the honourable chairman of the committee to feel that I am criticizing the work of the committee.

Senator Molson: If it is not criticism, I do not know what it is.

Senator McIlraith: I am quite appreciative of the work of the committee, but I do feel the need for more and better explanation and for it to be provided in a better format.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for his participation in the debate on this report and the question of our rules. It is helpful, and we all realize that he has had as much experience in the House of Commons as anybody on the Hill. He has had years of experience, and so we listen to his words with great attention. It was my hope that he would come to some of our committee meetings in order to give us the benefit of his wisdom. It would have been more helpful then, perhaps, than now.

[Senator Flynn.]

I am sorry—in fact, I apologize—if the chamber feels I was wrong in dealing with this report in the way I have. We went into Committee of the Whole on the major revision of the rules in 1969. That is another way of dealing with the matter, but in this case the amendments are so minor that the committee felt the present method was a suitable way to deal with the subject.

I thought that by tabling the report, and having it printed in Hansard last Wednesday, every honourable senator would be given adequate time and opportunity to consider it. Certainly, there was no thought that by so doing we would be preventing any questions from being raised. I am sorry if Senator McIlraith feels that by adopting this procedure we have not given every honourable senator a fair chance to express his or her opinion, suggest further amendments, and so on. The whole purpose of tabling the report and having it printed for a week was to give honourable senators a chance to study the amendments, and to make their points of view known when the report was debated. Perhaps this motion for the adoption of the report should have been delayed for two or three weeks. In any event, that is what we were trying to do.

On behalf of the Rules Committee, I am certainly more than willing to agree to any procedure the Senate desires. After all, the Rules Committee does not suggest that it is running the Senate. It is simply making proposals. It has been given certain duties to carry out, and one of them is the reconsideration of some of the rules.

● (1520)

As I said earlier, not one of these suggestions came from within the committee. They have all been made since the last revision of the rules, during nearly three years of discussion, and many of the points in question were the subject of some debate in the chamber. In some cases, they caused considerable disagreement.

I should like to add that according to the rules, if any senator wishes a matter to be considered in Committee of the Whole, that requires no notice. Any senator is at liberty to move that the Senate resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole. We were not in any way preventing this course of action.

I would like now to deal more specifically with Senator McIlraith's points.

Rule 1. As it exists, rule 1, in dealing with rules and usages, has somehow acquired the words "forms and proceedings of the Parliament of Canada". These do not exist. Years ago we used to follow the practices of House of Lords, but we no longer conform to them.

I should like to point out that in all the proceedings of the committee we had the advice of the Clerk of the Senate, the Law Clerk of the Senate, the Acting Law Clerk of the Senate, and the Clerk Assistant of the Senate, so that, in addition to whatever committee members could contribute to the discussion, we had our experienced staff available for consultation. In fact, a good deal of the research was done during the summer by these gentlemen, acting as a sort of sub-committee or ad hoc committee, for the purpose of advising us in some of these matters.

With regard to the change I have referred to in rule 1, if there were a Senate precedent, obviously it would have been used. It would be a very unusual circumstance if, in either the chamber or a committee, a Senate precedent were ignored and a House of Commons form, usage or precedent adopted. That would be most extraordinary.

The form of rule 1 that we have recommended is as follows:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either house of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

This merely means that if there is no rule or precedent of the Senate that we can follow, we go to the nearest source. In other words, we would not go to the House of Lords or any other place, but to the House of Commons. That would be the normal way of reacting to such a situation.

I believe the next rule that Senator McIlraith mentioned is rule 34A. I am afraid I cannot argue with him as to what it should be. I only know that I have been here 20 years, and when I first came here many of the older senators often expressed themselves on the impropriety of quoting from House of Commons Debates. I will not argue with the fact that a bill may be introduced by the parliamentary assistant, or someone like that. That perhaps is an omission. But I have been told over the years—and I think it is the experience of many senators—that the reason for this attitude is to avoid a controversy between the two houses. For this reason, the committee, with the advice I have referred to, felt that this rule would cover the matter in the best possible way. However, I am entirely open to suggestions in this regard. I do not say that the wording is perfect.

Senator McIlraith then raised the distinction between "question" and "matter". In this case I guess he had not seen rule 5, which defines the word "question" clearly. Rule 5.(n) is as follows:

"question" means a proposal presented to the Senate or a committee thereof by the Speaker or chairman for consideration and disposal in some manner.

As Senator Flynn said, "matter" can include "question". A matter is broader than a question.

With regard to rule 46.(f), concerning a motion for the adjournment of the Senate while a matter is under discussion, this gives an opportunity for a motion for adjournment regardless of whether there is a question under discussion and regardless of anything else. The reference is to when a "matter" is under discussion. The proceedings may not have got to the stage where there is a question. A motion to adjourn, according to our understanding, can be made at any time. That is the reason why the word "matter" was substituted there. As a matter of fact, the word "question" has been changed to "matter" repeatedly where it did not conform to the definition in rule 5.

In rule 5 "question" is defined as being a proposal put by the Speaker or the chairman of a committee, and so everywhere, where the meaning did not conform to that definition, we changed it to "matter". That is the fundamental reason for this change. I do not know whether that explanation is understandable or not.

Senator McIlraith: That is the point I wanted clarified, namely, your intention in making that change.

Senator Molson: That was the reason. It was raised by different senators. They brought up the fact that we used this word in a variety of ways to mean completely different things, and so the rule was changed for that purpose.

Rule 56 concerns the principle of a bill. We have amended this rule by adding the word "usually", so that it now reads:

The principle of a bill is usually debated at its second reading.

Incidentally, this wording was in the old rules. The word was taken out on a previous occasion because the argument was put forward that the principle of a bill is always debated on second reading. It did exist in the old rules, and was removed. It was felt that the present rule is too confining in the sense that it means that the principle of a bill has to be debated on second reading; that there is the inference that it has to be debated on second reading only. The word "usually" has, therefore, been reinstated. It was included, I believe, until the time of the 1969 rule changes.

Senator McIlraith: May I ask for further clarification on that point? Was it intended, by reinstating the word "usually" in the rule, to change the practice and have the debate on the principle of the bill at another stage than that of second reading?

Senator Molson: The desire was to establish what the normal procedure of the Senate, historically, has been, what is considered preferable, what is considered best, and what is most practicable, so it was put back. The word "usually" also gives some leeway to a senator if he or she feels, for valid reasons, that the rule should be disregarded. The purpose, however, of reinstating the word is to establish the fact that in the normal course of events a bill gets first reading when it is presented, on second reading the principle of the bill is debated, and on third reading, as you know, it can be amended or further debated.

Rule 67 deals with the referral of questions to committees on motion. If my honourable friend will look at the rules he will see that those establishing the committees make it obligatory that all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters be referred. This has not been the practice in the past. It is not the practice to refer everything. It is the practice to refer a certain matter only if there is a motion to refer. Otherwise, when you get the papers, messages, petitions and so on, you can have further confusion. Therefore, this requires that these matters be referred, but only if the Senate so directs. It is entirely up to the Senate to decide whether the matter shall be referred or not, but it requires a motion. That is the change here. At the moment it says, "to which shall be referred on motion all bills", but the revised rule says, "if there is a motion to that effect".

● (1530)

Senator Langlois: I do not think we are changing very much there.

Senator Flynn: It is not compulsory.

Senator Langlois: But a motion is necessary under the present wording.

Senator Molson: I am afraid we spent a considerable amount of time on this question in committee, Senator Langlois, and in the end, as a result of our legal advice and so on, it emerged this way. I must say I agree with you that the change is small, but I think it does no harm in that it makes the situation very definite. I think I started my remarks by saying that most of these changes are small.

Senator Flynn: We did not want to force a senator to move the motion.

Senator Molson: I do not think it does any harm, but it does require a specific motion to refer any papers, petitions, messages, inquiries and so on, to a committee. I agree, it is a minor change.

Honourable senators, I do not know if there is any other matter that Senator McIlraith pointed out—

Senator Croll: If there wasn't any other, then I will help you out. I am, of course, concerned about the questions that have been raised, but I am more concerned about rule 67.(1)(f). Here is what I might call a self-starter, in that the committee is "empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate".

We have no way of knowing what the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is dealing with; whether they report to us and when they report to us is entirely out of our hands. If we pass a motion, then we know that something has been referred and we can follow it up and find out when it is coming back to us. But here the initiative comes from the committee itself, and there may not be any report for months on end. To me that is a new principle.

Senator Flynn: You can always put a question to the chairman of the Internal Economy Committee.

Senator Croll: Yes, I know I can do that. But I am also concerned about the rest of rule 67. Would the chairman of the committee who has just presented this report object very seriously if the matter were put over for a couple of days so that it can be given more thought?

I am also considerably troubled by the point raised on rule 56, because from time immemorial the tradition has been that the subject matter of a bill has always been debated in principle on second reading, and any movement away from that would seem to be something that we ought to avoid if at all possible. I would suggest that the matter be adjourned to give more consideration to these points.

Senator Molson: Are you referring to the inclusion of the word "usually"?

Senator Croll: Yes, "usually" should not be there. The old rule is more in line, I think, with what we have been doing here for years. Is there any urgency about this that precludes the adjournment of the debate for a couple of days?

Senator Molson: Senator Croll, there is absolutely no urgency at all. The question of timing comes into this if you want a new set of rules for the beginning of the next session, because in that case we must decide what those rules are to be not later than November 20. That is the only time constraint. In fact, if we go on for another few months with our present rules, it really will not matter.

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Croll: Then you really would not mind if I moved that the debate be adjourned until next Wednesday?

Senator Molson: No, but, if I may, I should like to answer one point about rule 67.(1)(f). As you know, a motion similar to that was adopted during the session previously, and all we are proposing is a specific rule to that effect.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I have just one or two questions. I anticipate that we are going to adjourn the debate, but I think it is all the more appropriate that I ask a question with respect to our present rule 7. Senator Molson will recall that we have had communications in writing and in other ways about this rule, which I shall read:

Unless otherwise previously ordered, the Senate shall meet for the transaction of business at two o'clock in the afternoon of each sitting day.

I want to ask whether the committee in its recent examination of the rules gave any consideration to this particular rule? Has it had representations about a change here and, if so, what was the consensus of the committee? I think it is appropriate, if we are going to discuss this matter on another day, that this situation be kept in mind. I feel that there is a division of opinion on this subject among the members of the Senate.

The second question I should like to ask Senator Molson is with respect to the proposed new rule 77.(6). That rule is to the effect that a committee should not have a "practice" that is dissimilar to the practice of the Senate itself. It comes to my mind that we had some discussion about the question as to whether a committee, on its own initiative, should permit the televising of its proceedings if the "practice" had not had formal approval in the house. Has that matter been considered by the committee, and has this new rule some relationship to that former discussion?

Senator Molson: That was what really raised the issue. The question was whether committees should conform in every way to the practice of the Senate itself. If the Senate thought that television was a good thing, then the committees could have television. During the discussion of the question in committee, as was the case during the discussion in the chamber itself, the feeling was that if the Senate changed direction, and if we wanted to do something different or to establish new precedents, then it should be the decision of the Senate, taken here in this chamber. There was no question whatever of doubting the responsibility or reliability of a committee chairman or anybody else, but if the Senate wanted to make a change, then it could do so here, in open discussion. That had a great bearing on finding a rule which would keep the actions and procedures of committees on the same general basis as that of the Senate itself.

Senator Croll: I move the adjournment of the debate to Wednesday next.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. J. J. Greene rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of permitting complete television and radio coverage of the proceedings of the Senate and of the public proceedings of all Senate committees.

He said: Honourable senators, I could not help but think, having heard the very learned discussion on the rules of the Senate today, that it was rather singular and perhaps indicative of the relevance of our proceedings in the Senate generally that the one question which is really relevant to the public at large, namely, whether the electronic media should be admitted to parliamentary proceedings, was mentioned only parenthetically, by way of a question from Senator Benidickson. We dotted all the "i's" and crossed all the "t's", but it seemed to me that we failed to consider that question which is most important to the public at large, namely, whether or not those galleries should be expanded so that all the people of Canada can sit in on our proceedings if they so desire.

● (1540)

It seems to me that the question of bringing in the electronic media is important from two standpoints: first, from that of the right of the public to have the galleries enlarged; and secondly, from that of the relevance of the Senate itself as one of the elements of our constitutional procedure.

On the former score I might point out that our forebears, in constitutional evolution at Westminster, determined, when they were setting up the Houses of Parliament, that there should be a visitors' gallery. In other words, there should be the right of the public to view the proceedings, and participate in them to that degree. We adopted most of the parliamentary procedures in setting up the Canadian Parliament, and instituted the visitors' gallery as part of our paraphernalia of Parliament. There is, of course, a basic difference between the tight little island which evolved our parliamentary procedures and this very large country of ours. Probably Parliament is physically more accessible in the United Kingdom to the vast majority of people than it is in Canada, with our very large land mass. So it may be that our galleries, when we have the technology available, should be enlarged so that they are not only available to those who happen to be physically present in Ottawa, but to all those Canadians who have an interest in our proceedings and wish to view them. We have at our beck and call the technology to make those galleries stretch, as the song says, from Bonavista to Vancouver Island. I suggest that we have possibly been remiss in not extending them when we have the technology to do so.

It might be singular that such an advance was made in what is generally regarded as being the reactionary half of our Parliament. In my opinion, this is one area in which we, who are so often stigmatized as the reactionary half of our Parliament by those who fail to even realize that the Senate is one half of Parliament, should proceed, and, in my opinion, it would be most beneficial for this advance to be made by the Senate. If they in the other place cannot resolve their differences in this area, it might be well for the Senate to give leadership.

Secondly, from the standpoint of the benefit to the Senate itself, many have suggested rule changes as the way to improve the Senate. I think Stanley Baldwin, when he was Prime Minister of England, once said that the barons of the press—and, if memory serves me correctly, they were then Lords North, Rothermere and Beaverbrook—seek power without responsibility, "which has been the prerogative of harlots throughout the ages." With respect, honourable senators, the Senate suffers from the opposite disease: it has responsibility without power. I do not think it is likely that our Constitution will ever be amended to give any form of separation of powers, as exists in most bicameral federal states, so that we will be constitutionally given more power. I think that the only way we can really make the Senate a more meaningful participant in our constitutional processes is by achieving more power. We will achieve more power, not by constitutional amendment and not by the government's limiting its own powers where it controls the popular half of the assembly and distributing some to the Senate, but, in my opinion, by demonstrating to the public at large the quality of the contribution that can be made by an appointive body and the calibre of men who are appointed to that body.

Obviously, we will not accomplish this by way of the reporting press who, from the inception of Canada, have been more inclined to denigrate senatorial contributions and to diminish the Senate than to enhance the contribution it might make. I suggest that we can demonstrate, by enlarging those galleries to the Canadian public, that the Senate is an essential and important aspect of our Constitution. We have that opportunity, if we wish to seize ourselves of it.

I might say that the thought was brought to my mind first by two citizens who take an interest in parliamentary affairs, neither of whom is involved in politics. In referring to two senators, who I am going to take the liberty of naming—Senator Forsey and Senator Grattan O'Leary—on two separate occasions two people said to me, "I saw those men on television and they certainly must make a great contribution." My only regret was that they saw them on television rather than performing their function in the Senate. They would then have known, as we all know, that they do make a great contribution to the parliamentary process. The thought occurred to me then that if the public could see the work that is done here, and the calibre of those who are appointed to the Senate, the Senate might indeed have a very useful power directly by the fact that the public appreciated their contribution.

So I do not think we will achieve a new role and a more meaningful role for the Senate by changing its rules. However, I do believe that we can make a very real new step forward by demonstrating to the public at large the quality and necessity of our contribution.

Apparently, the reprehensible thing in the minds of the press about the Senate is that it is an appointed body. However, in my opinion, the Canadian public at large accept enthusiastically the fact that the judges of our courts are appointed. I do not think the public would want our judges to be elected, I do not think they would want our judges to be appointed for a term, and only re-appointed if they had agreed with the executive policies of the time. In my opinion, the public wants an independent Bench, one that is independent by reason of its appointive and life-long tenure. By the same token, a contribution can be made to the public weal by an appointed half of the legislative arm, if we can only demonstrate to the public that such is the case.

● (1550)

The public, through the reporting press, have the idea that some of our committees exist to protect the privileged and vested interests. Those of us who sit on those committees know that that is furthest from the truth, that the Canadian public is well served by the committees, in the capacity and experience of the members, which deal with the business of the public and not that of any private interests. If the public could see this as we see it we would have an understanding with the public, who would realize the importance of and the necessity for continuing a body such as the Senate in the legislative process.

I do not have all the answers, or the hows and wherefors. I realize there are technical problems in installing electronic equipment and of disseminating the proceedings. But I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators, by means of this inquiry, the very important thing that we can do, both for the public and for the Senate, by enlarging those galleries which are electronically equipped for coast to coast broadcasting, by letting the public judge us for themselves rather than by way of someone else's opinion, as is now the case.

I would suggest, honourable senators, that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders consider very seriously the question of permitting wide-open television coverage of our proceedings, both in the Senate chamber and in committee. If it is not prepared to do so, I hope that other honourable senators will participate in the debate, in order that I might hear their views.

I did not learn very much in my brief and undistinguished career in the Armed Forces, except never to volunteer, but I am prepared to volunteer as a member of any committee that will seriously consider what is, in my opinion, a vitally important subject concerning the rules of Senate proceedings.

On motion of Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I would draw your attention to the fact that as soon as the house rises the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will meet in room 356-S to consider Bill C-23, to provide for the payment of superannuation benefits to Lieutenant Governors.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 6, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS
MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages has been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Guay (St. Boniface) and Beaudoin had been substituted for those of Messrs. Stollery and Dionne (Kamouraska), that the names of Messrs. Stollery and Lachance had been substituted for those of Misses Nicholson and Bégin, and that the names of Misses Nicholson and Bégin had been substituted for those of Messrs. Stollery and Lachance on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Immigration Policy.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS
MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Blais had been substituted for that of Mr. Anderson on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

PRIVATE BILL

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, November 6, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill S-30, intituled: "An Act to Incorporate Continental Bank of Canada" has, in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, October 30, 1975, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 3: Strike out lines 38 to 45, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"(a) IAC Limited may, notwithstanding sections 53 and 54 of the Bank Act,

(i) subscribe for shares of the capital stock of the Bank at not less than par value and cause to be registered in the name of IAC Limited the shares issued pursuant to such subscriptions, and

(ii) exercise, in person or by proxy, the voting rights pertaining to shares of the capital stock of the Bank registered in the name of IAC Limited;"

2. Pages 5 to 7: Strike out lines 17 to 49, inclusive, on page 5, all of page 6 and lines 1 to 31 on page 7 and substitute the following:

"10. (1) IAC Limited and the Bank shall, within ten years after the coming into force of this act,

(a) subject to subsection (2), amalgamate in accordance with the Canada Corporations Act or the Canada Business Corporations Act, whichever Act applies to IAC Limited at the time of the amalgamation, as if the Bank were a corporation subject to the Act that applies to IAC Limited, or

(b) amalgamate in accordance with sections 100 to 102 of the Bank Act, as if IAC Limited were a bank to which that Act applies, and, subject to subsections (4) to (6), the Bank after the amalgamation is subject in all respects to the Bank Act.

(2) If the Canada Business Corporations Act applies to IAC Limited at the time of the amalgamation and if, immediately prior to the amalgamation, IAC Limited owns all of the outstanding shares of the capital stock of the Bank,

(a) subsection 178(1) of that Act applies to an amalgamation under paragraph 1(a), and

(b) the resolutions referred to in paragraph 178(1)(b) of that Act may vary from the requirements set out in that paragraph to the extent necessary to give effect to section 11 of this Act.

(3) Prior to an amalgamation under paragraph (1)(b), the Governor in Council may, by order, prescribe that, notwithstanding subsection 101(2) of the Bank Act, the terms of the proposed amalgamation agreement need not be submitted to the shareholders of IAC Limited.

(4) Subject to subsection (6), if, when an amalgamation under subsection (1) takes effect, there is outstanding any indebtedness of IAC Limited, other than the debentures referred to in subsection (5), that is of a kind that the Bank is not permitted to incur under the Bank Act, then, notwithstanding the Bank Act, any such indebtedness incurred prior to October 28, 1975, remains outstanding after the amalgamation as indebtedness of the Bank and is binding upon and enforceable against the Bank in accordance with its terms, including any terms as to security.

(5) Subject to subsection (6), if

(a) an amalgamation under subsection (1) takes effect prior to July 15, 1984, and

(b) on the day when the amalgamation takes effect there are outstanding any debentures that carry rights of conversion into shares of IAC Limited to be issued on such conversion then, notwithstanding the Bank Act, during the period from the day the amalgamation takes effect until July 15, 1984, the rights of conversion under any of those debentures that were issued prior to October 28, 1975 remain outstanding as rights of conversion into shares of the Bank and shares of the Bank may be validly issued during that period upon the exercise of the rights of conversion except that shares of the Bank may not be so issued to a person from whom a subscription for a share of the capital stock of the Bank could not, by reason of paragraphs 53(4)(a) or (b) or subsection 56(2) of the Bank Act, be accepted by the Bank.

(6) Subsections (4) and (5) apply to any indebtedness and any debentures referred to therein only if

(a) the terms thereof do not permit the debtor, at its option, to discharge the indebtedness or the debentures prior to the amalgamation, whether or not the discharge would require payment by the debtor of a premium or bonus; and

(b) the Minister of Finance consents to the application of those subsections to that indebtedness or those debentures upon submission to the Minister made by IAC Limited that it has attempted to arrive at alternative arrangements that would avoid the necessity of relying upon those subsections as to that indebtedness or those debentures.

(7) The submission referred to in paragraph (6)(b) shall be accompanied by an undertaking to discharge the indebtedness at the first date upon which it may be discharged at the option of the debtor, whether or not upon payment of a premium or bonus.

(8) Any indebtedness referred to in subsection (4) and any debentures referred to in subsection (5) that have not met the conditions set out in subsection (6) shall be discharged prior to an amalgamation under subsection (1).

(9) For greater certainty, all of the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act, the Canada Business Corporations Act or the Bank Act, as the case may be, relating to the effects of an amalgamation apply to an amalgamation under subsection (1), except as provided in this section and in section 11.

(10) The Bank may enter into such agreements as may be reasonably necessary to confirm that any indebtedness to which subsection (4) applies remains outstanding after the amalgamation as indebtedness of the Bank, and that any debentures to which subsection (5) applies are convertible after the amalgamation into shares of the Bank to be issued on such conversion."

3. Page 7: Strike out lines 32 to 35, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

[Senator Hayden.]

"The Bank shall be the continuing corporation resulting from the amalgamation of the Bank and IAC Limited referred to in subsection 10(1) so that,"

4. Page 7: Strike out lines 41 and 42 and substitute therefor the following:

"mence business when the Bank was originally permitted under that section to commence business."

5. Page 8: Strike out lines 16 to 22, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"Act apply to IAC Limited and sections 38 to 56 of the Bank Act apply to the shares of IAC Limited, and"

6. Page 10: Strike out lines 20 to 27, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"15. (1) During the period commencing on the day this Act comes into force and ending on the expiration of two years next following that day or on the day on which an amalgamation under subsection 10(1) takes effect, whichever occurs first, a person referred to in subsection 2(1) is not ineligible, notwithstanding paragraph 18(5)(b) and subsection 18(6) of the Bank Act, to be elected or appointed a director of IAC Limited by reason of his being a director of a bank, or of a bank to which the Quebec Savings Banks Act applies or of any company referred to in subsection 18(6) of the Bank Act, but no person who, but for this subsection, would be ineligible for election or appointment as a director of IAC Limited may hold in IAC Limited any of the offices referred to in section 21 of the Bank Act or continue after the expiry of that period to be a director of IAC Limited."

7. Page 11: Strike out line 38 and substitute therefor the following:

"is a subsidiary of IAC Limited (any such corporation being hereinafter in this section and in sections 17 to 19 called a "restricted corporation"), to carry on"

8. Pages 12 and 13: Strike out lines 22 to 43, inclusive, on page 12 and lines 1 to 17, inclusive, on page 13 and substitute therefor the following:

(a) IAC Limited may acquire, and may permit any restricted corporation to acquire,

(i) assets from the Bank previously acquired by the Bank as permitted by the Bank Act (such assets and other assets which the Bank is permitted to acquire under the Bank Act being hereinafter in this section called "eligible assets"), and

(ii) eligible assets from IAC Limited or any restricted corporation, but the prior consent of the Inspector General of Banks shall be required for the acquisition of any eligible assets that consists of shares in the capital stock of a corporation, other than a corporation that is a subsidiary of IAC Limited when this Act comes into force;

(b) IAC Limited may acquire, and may permit any restricted corporation to acquire, assets for the purpose of leasing such assets to its customers, and IAC Limited may enter into leases of any such assets and may permit any restricted corporation to enter into leases of any such assets, and

(c) IAC Limited may lend money or make advances, and may permit any restricted corporation to lend money or make advances, upon the security of real or immovable property in Canada or of an equity of redemption therein or of an assignment of or mortgage on the interest of a lessee thereof where such loans or advances would not be permissible for the Bank by reason of the restrictions contained in subsections 75(3) or 75(4) of the Bank Act (the said loans and advances, and leases of assets referred to in paragraph (b), being hereinafter in this section referred to as "non-eligible assets"); and

(d) IAC Limited may acquire, and may permit any restricted corporation to acquire, non-eligible assets from any other of those corporations.

9. Page 13: Strike out lines 22 to 25, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"assets held by IAC Limited and every restricted corporation be in excess of the aggregate value,"

10. Page 13: Strike out lines 33 to 36, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"gible assets held by IAC Limited and every restricted corporation, excluding those non-eli-"

11. Page 14: Strike out lines 23 to 25, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"by IAC Limited or any restricted corporation, in any other of those"

12. Page 14: Strike out lines 35 to 37, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"IAC Limited or any restricted corporation is under no obligation to"

13. Page 14: Strike out lines 42 to 45, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"If the Bank or IAC Limited or a director of the Bank or IAC Limited is, in the opinion of the Minister of Finance, in contravention of any requirement of section 8, 9, 12"

14. Page 15: Strike out lines 27 to 29, inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"tion 15(1) of the Bank Act, the provisions of this Act that affect or restrict IAC Limited, the subsidiaries of IAC Limited or the shares of IAC Limited shall cease to have effect, except that subparagraph 7(4)(a)(ii) and paragraphs 7(4)(b) and (c) shall remain in effect for purposes of giving effect to subsections 15(2) to (9) of the Bank Act."

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration now.

Senator Benidickson: Is there leave requested to bridge the rules?

Senator Hayden: I so move with leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion, which cannot be put without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Benidickson: No.

Senator Hayden moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS SUPERANNUATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Senator Carter, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Wednesday, November 5, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which was referred Bill C-23 intituled: "An Act to provide for the payment of superannuation benefits to Lieutenant Governors" has, in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, October 30, 1975, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee, however, considers it important that the following observations be made:

The bill models the pensions for Lieutenant Governors on the pattern selected for term appointments in the diplomatic service. The committee felt that in view of the similarity of office and duties, legislation providing pensions for Lieutenant Governors should be patterned on the legislation providing a pension for the Governor General.

The committee felt that the bill should be made applicable to former Lieutenant Governors or at least to those in office when Bill C-23 was tabled in October 1974. Since then one Lieutenant Governor has died and his widow is not provided for.

Lieutenant Governors, who formerly were Members of Parliament, would not receive their pensions as such until Bill C-52 becomes law. This creates an unfair situation.

Your committee was of the opinion that it would have been more just and equitable to base the pensions of Lieutenant Governors on their present salaries rather than on the five-year average.

Your committee considered that it did not have authority to amend the Bill being reported on. However, your committee considered that these matters should be called to the attention of the Senate.

Your committee therefore recommends that the Government or the appropriate ministry consider the advisability of reviewing this legislation in order to remedy these defects at the earliest possible date.

Respectfully submitted.

Chesley W. Carter,
Chairman

• (1410)

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Bourget: With leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: It is so far as we are concerned, because no amendment is being made to the bill. The report simply makes certain recommendations for amendments in the future, and we find no difficulty in giving leave under those circumstances.

Senator Bourget: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday next, November 12, 1975, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to make the usual statement in regard to our work for the next week. In moving that the Senate come back next week on Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock, I have taken into consideration that Bill C-2, the Combines Investigation Act, is still being studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and that Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2), is expected to pass the House of Commons on Friday of this week and come to the Senate. As there is some urgency about both those bills, it is felt that the Senate must be here next week.

In addition to the foregoing and the items now on the Order Paper, we may receive one or two other bills by Wednesday.

I should also mention at this time the committee meetings scheduled for next week. On Thursday, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. on Bill C-2, and again in the afternoon of that day. Also at 9.30 a.m. there will be meetings of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. The Special Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber has arranged a meeting for 10 a.m. on Thursday. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has scheduled a meeting on Friday morning at 9.30 to continue its consideration of Bill C-2.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I have been trying to follow the deputy leader, but I am not clear about one point. I am sure my honourable colleague will appreciate our concern in this matter. As the fall goes on, it becomes increasingly difficult to make plane reservations, and we have to plan ahead. Is it possible that the Senate will meet on Friday of next week?

Senator Langlois: No decision has been made, but it is a possibility. It will depend upon the workload which could come from the other place in the meantime.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS— QUESTION

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that the inside postal workers who are on strike have been paid for the last two weeks, would the government consider also paying the letter carriers and those who have been laid off in private industry for the last two weeks, or is it necessary for them to go on strike in order to be paid?

Secondly, were the inside postal workers paid at the existing rate, or were they paid at the rate recommended by the conciliator, Mr. Justice Jean Moisan?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I believe that the question posed by Senator Phillips has its basis in a news report which appeared in a well-known publication this morning. May I say that the fact that the inside workers have, in effect, been paid in advance for a short period of time during which they are not working is due to the technical conditions under which cheques are issued by the Department of Supply and Services; but there is no net imposition on the Canadian taxpayer in that ultimately, when a return to work is effected, they will not be paid for any work not done, and the next cheques will reflect the fact that they have, in effect, been paid in advance for a short period of time.

May I say, in connection with this labour dispute, that I must regretfully inform the Senate that the postal talks have now been broken off. We hope to have further information this afternoon with respect to the position of the government. I can report that the matter of wages was the sole outstanding issue on the table at the time of breaking off the talks, but no agreement could be achieved on that important economic matter.

There were reports just a few moments ago that although the union leaders apparently reject the wage offer put forward by the minister responsible for postal services, they have agreed to place the latest offer before the union membership for a vote. I hope to be able to report more fully later today on this subject.

Senator Flynn: When would the vote take place?

Senator Perrault: This is a relevant question. We have no information at this time, beyond what I have given, and we will certainly attempt to obtain the information the honourable senator has asked for.

Senator Flynn: If I understand the answer of the Leader of the Government correctly, the giving of these cheques to the inside postal workers was due to the system. But would he not agree that it was a mistake nevertheless, and would he not agree also that that kind of mistake is rather helpful to anyone who wants to go on strike?

Senator Perrault: I have been informed that the amount is really not large in relation to the totals in the cheques issued and, further, that it was not due to a mistake by the Department of Supply and Services. The computers are set up to issue cheques on a ten-day pay period basis, and in fact it would have cost the taxpayer a substantial amount to break out of that ten-day pay cheque the actual hours worked during the period in question. For reasons of economy, therefore, as much as anything else, the department, conscious of the guidelines which have been brought into effect to fight inflation, felt that this was the most common-sense approach to the problem.

• (1420)

Senator Flynn: It was deliberate.

Senator Phillips: If it is impossible, honourable senators, to break the computer system to avoid paying the strikers, what is the system being followed in paying the letter carriers and other postal employees who have been laid off as a result of this strike?

Senator Perrault: I can only take that question as notice. I do not have the information now. I shall attempt to get it in the course of this afternoon and report as quickly as I can, and if at all possible within the next hour. [Later:]

Honourable senators, I should like to bring to your attention the latest information with respect to the question posed earlier by Senator Phillips. I have been advised that the letter carriers have been paid everything owed to them to the day they were laid off. Of course, there has been no further work performed since that time, so no other payments have been forthcoming. A policy decision was made, that they should not be paid for work not done.

As far as the inside workers are concerned, as I said previously, any slight overpayment to them will be collected back at the end of the strike. The payment which they have received includes amounts representing payment for work done and also for work not done. However, the overpayments will be collected back at the end of the strike, and we hope that a settlement will come very shortly. Certainly, it is in the public interest to have this whole matter resolved.

The minister responsible for the Post Office, I understand, has stated in the other place that union leaders have been urged to take the complete package back to the members, to have them discuss it and vote on it. A later report, yet to be confirmed, is to the effect that a decision has been made to have a vote take place among the union membership. I hope, as do we all, that this issue will be resolved very very shortly.

PAROLE

CONSIDERATION OF CHANGES IN PRESENT SYSTEM— QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if the government has under way or in contemplation any steps to control the present use of parole? I am alluding, for example, to the latest shoot-out in Montreal where one man was killed by a policeman, and three others were subsequently arrested. They had just committed a kidnapping, a crime becoming all too common, as we know, and apparently all four men were on parole. I am going by what has been published in the press. Time and again in recent years criminals have committed crimes while on parole or on weekend leave or something of that nature. I know the matter is under consideration generally at the moment, but I wonder if anything concrete is being considered?

Senator Perrault: I want to assure the honourable senator that the government is very conscious of the need to fight crime all across this country, and the cost of fighting crime will not be brought within the economic guidelines announced by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister last Thanksgiving. Indeed, there will be an increase in government expenditures in this program. The particulars of what we believe will be a strong anti-crime program will be made known shortly.

I want to assure the house that the subject of parole is under detailed consideration by the government, and we hope to have legislation before both houses shortly. At that time the views of all senators will be earnestly sought to help correct any weaknesses in the present program.

Senator Forsey: May I ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government? Does his assurance about the parole system apply also to the system of temporary passes? I was informed not very long ago that when that system was originally set up, it was very much on a compassionate basis. If a man's mother was dying or his uncle was dying or something of that nature, then he was allowed out for two or three days to go to the funeral or to see the person who was about to expire, or whatever the case might be. But at a certain time a change was made in the system and these passes became virtually automatic and were handed out on a continuing basis. Now my informant ought to have known what he was talking about and perhaps I have been misinformed, but I should like to have some assurance in the matter of these passes to which the Honourable Senator Molson alluded as well as the parole question, because it seems to me that the passes are the worst part of the thing.

Senator Perrault: Day passes, parole, incarceration, perhaps capital punishment—all of these issues, I feel confident, will shortly be before Parliament and it is hoped that both houses will be given a full opportunity to discuss all of them.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved second reading of Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment.

He said: Honourable senators, the shortest and best description of this bill is contained in the title, which is "An Act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment." The bill in essence addresses itself to an urgent pollution problem, the contamination of the environment by chemical substances. The bill, to understand it easily, can be divided into five major parts: First, the gathering and the disclosure of information on hazardous and potentially hazardous chemicals, which is contained in clauses 3 to 5, inclusive, of the bill; second, the establishment of an Environmental Contaminants Board of Review, which is outlined in clause 6; third, the setting up of a schedule of substances affected by this legislation, to be found in clause 7; fourth, the specifying of offences and the enforcement procedures, contained in clauses 8 to 17 inclusive; and fifth, the making of regulations under the legislation, which is contained in clauses 18 and following.

Man and all other organisms exist in a milieu which consists of many chemical substances. Nature has provided each organism with the ability to adapt to a particular range of chemical compositions and conditions of its environment. All of these organisms are subject to slight variations in the conditions around them.

Prior to 1972, the government's environmental concerns were water, air and land pollution. For example, this included smokestack emissions, effluents from plants and collections of garbage. The industrial processes and the chemicals used in them came under scrutiny. Many advances in industry have enriched our lives, but the other side of the coin is the hard fact of chemical contamination. In today's world, many chemical substances are released, accidentally or deliberately, by man. These substances may contaminate the environment. The contamination may be due to the introduction of new substances, or to a perceptible change in the amount of some substances occurring in nature. The problem that arises is that the natural environment cannot always assimilate this extra burden. We may, then, have gross pollution, or what has been defined as an environmental insult. What is even more insidious, and may occur, is a delayed action effect that could cause serious dislocations in the balance of nature.

These foregoing considerations prompted the drafting of Bill C-25, which has two major thrusts. One is to empower the government to collect information on potentially harmful chemical substances in order to assess the danger they may represent. The second is to give the government the power to control the chemical substances by regulating a number of commercial activities where a threat to human health or environment is apprehended.

● (1430)

The bill was drafted after a series of consultations with representatives of provincial governments and industry, and does not place all the control burden on the federal government.

For example, clause 5 provides for federal consultation with a province or provinces affected by the danger of chemical contamination. Such consultation would be for the purpose of determining whether the perceived danger would be eliminated by action under other legislation. If it would not, the federal government has recourse to this, the environmental contaminants legislation. In effect, if a province can, and chooses to, eliminate a danger, the federal government will not need to act under this measure.

Honourable senators will note that clause 4 deals with a disclosure scheme whereby industry must report production information, test certain products for safety, and inform the government of any evidence of potential danger.

The schedule mentioned in clause 7 is a list of chemical substances, or classes of substances, that will be subject to regulations to be made under this bill.

[Senator Macnaughton.]

In effect, this legislation is another signal that we in Canada are moving out of the problem-solving phase into a continuing mode of problem prevention. Whether we look at it from the point of view of an ecologist or an accountant, this makes sense. It is less expensive to stop the use of contaminants than to catch them afterwards in either the effluent or the smokestack. The government solicits, and expects, one hundred per cent cooperation from industry. However, in the event of non-compliance, penalties are prescribed in the legislation, and they are to be found in clause 8.

The struggle against pollution has two major facets—preventing and rolling back, and cleaning up. Bill C-25 represents a strong move in the field of prevention and, as such, merits our earnest consideration.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on behalf of Senator Quart who, by the way, will celebrate her birthday next Saturday. I shall not say which birthday, because no one would believe me.

I shall leave to the one who will reply to Senator Macnaughton the opportunity to extend the usual praise for his presentation of the bill. I merely wish to note that he has spoken for the first time from his new place in the chamber, and that he is getting closer to the Chair.

Senator Macnaughton: Or to the exit.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Quart, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

EASTERN CANADA SAVINGS AND LOAN COMPANY AND CENTRAL & NOVA SCOTIA TRUST COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-29, to enable the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company and Central & Nova Scotia Trust Company to amalgamate, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the five amendments relate to the same subject matter, and the purpose of each is to state correctly the name of the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company in the French text.

Due to some oversight, when this act originally came into force—about 1887, I believe—there was both a French and an English name. In 1914 the French name was converted into what you might call an English name, so the same name existed in French and in English. When it came to the drafting of this bill, apparently the amendment of 1914 was overlooked and the name used in the French text of the bill was the original name of the company when incorporated.

These five amendments all deal with various clauses of the bill in the French text where the original name is stated, whereas it should be the name of the company at this time, and the purpose of these amendments is to make that correction.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barrow: With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no objection to third reading now. The amendments are purely of a technical nature. Had the report been without amendment, there is no doubt that unanimous consent would have been given for third reading today, and because the amendments are of a technical nature only I see no reason why unanimous consent cannot be given.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the Government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I wish to yield to Senator Stanbury.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Stanbury proceed instead of Senator Petten?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, let me, first of all, take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate Senator Smith (Colchester) and Senator Austin on their appointment to the Senate. I should really be congratulating the Senate on their appointment.

Senator Smith (Colchester) has had a distinguished career in the service of his province and of Canada, leading to his election as Premier of Nova Scotia, and now to his appointment to the Senate of Canada. He will add stature to this chamber.

Senator Austin is a man I have known for many years. He has great energy, and a vast knowledge of the natural resources of Canada and the workings of government. I have no doubt at all that his abilities will add greatly to the deliberations of this chamber on the matters which come before it.

I hasten to welcome each of these honourable gentlemen personally, although belatedly.

I also congratulate those who have preceded me in this debate. All of the speeches I have heard and read have been not only incisive but intriguing, although one or two things that have been said are a little hard to swallow. By that I do not mean they are unbelievable. I am referring to matters such as Senator Forsey's prescription of frozen salaries. That may be a difficult pill for us and for senior public servants to swallow. I suspect it results from a pretty accurate diagnosis of the nature of our society, because each of us wants someone else to take a good dose of anti-inflation medicine but we are not particularly anxious to take a dose ourselves.

● (1440)

As the Honourable Bryce Mackasey said to the Empire Club of Toronto:

Our system has given us all we need to solve our essential problems—organization, know-how, technology and materials—yet we can't get a consensus on such needs as saving energy, controlling pollution or licking inflation. It seems that fate put the materials of happiness into our hands just to see how miserable we can make ourselves.

It is time that each of us withdrew to a quiet corner to examine our own consciences, and try to remember the last time we gave up something we really wanted, and the last time we thought about how our actions would affect society.

I have no hesitation in supporting the anti-inflation program of the government. The secret of its success, however, will lie in the determination of Canadians to work together to deal with one of the most difficult economic dilemmas of our time.

Traditional economic policies are not just useless in the present circumstances; they are counter-productive. "To get rid of unemployment we need tax cuts, increased money supply, increased government spending and easy credit," say the old rules. But to pour that kind of purchasing power into a shortage-plagued economy just sends more dollars chasing after the same amount of goods, and the poor, the old, the disabled, the unorganized—all those who cannot look after themselves—are trampled in the chase. It does not even produce more jobs. The shortage of jobs exists partly because labour costs remain high, regardless of how much unemployment there is, and partly because of shortages of essential materials, and prices which are inflated by either demand or monopolistic control over supply.

All right, let's not worry about jobs if we can't fix them anyway. Let's fight inflation! Traditional economic policies again fail. The Keynesian economists say we should raise taxes, cut the money supply, restrain government spending and tighten up credit. "That," they say, "will knock inflation out of the economy." The trouble is that as shortages and high prices of essential materials and labour, unaffected by fiscal and monetary policy, continue, all you do is knock out of the economy everything except inflation. So, the whole economy comes to rest and stagnates at an even lower level than before, with higher unemployment, greater loss of productivity, and no way in the world of starting the upward cycle again.

Mind you, while I support the controls, I believe that these controls will only give us time within which we must make a concerted effort to overcome the shortages and monopolistic conditions which drove us into this terrible dilemma in the first place. Massive programs of energy development and energy savings must be promoted. We must seek out the means of overcoming other shortages which are stunting our industry, and both domestically and internationally we must work to break down or at least harness the monopolies which strangle us.

Much of business is so highly integrated now that it never has to contemplate a price reduction, except as a matter of self-serving policy. Much of labour is so highly organized now that it never has to contemplate reduced wages. Nothing ever comes down in response to what used to be called natural economic forces. The power of these two sectors has become so firmly established that only government can intervene through legislation to protect the rest of society from its rampages.

It should be possible to persuade labour that its present practice of continually demanding more and more dollars, which promptly become worth less and less, is a fool's errand. What they really seek is a bigger slice of the total economic pie. They should say so and bargain for it honestly, politically and democratically, instead of using the bludgeon of threatened economic disaster and social chaos. Through tax reform, the reform of social legislation and increased bargaining rights they have already made great gains. Governments should be responsive to their needs, but governments must also legislate against that kind of blackmail.

We have just begun our study of the impact of big business on society in Canada. We will soon have the competition bill, which will bring back into operation a little of what we used to call normal market forces, domestically at least. But there are great areas of the economy of Canada where bigness is essential, and government will have to legislate, in terms of social responsibility, the price to be paid for the privilege of bigness.

Where there are genuine shortages or inflated prices held up by forces beyond our control, we will have to be weaned away from those costly materials by government subsidization of the non-use of them and the development of alternatives to them, rather than subsidizing their use as we have been doing with wheat and oil.

If the problem lies outside our borders, we will have to develop trade strategies to protect us against exploitation, but at the same time we will have to work towards freer trade and toward a solution of Third World problems. We must find ways of relieving the tensions now building up in the world because of new types of restrictive trade practices and unilateral price fixing.

Domestic savings must be encouraged both to cool inflation and to provide a pool of domestic capital that will permit us to avoid shortages of capital for the huge expansion ahead of us. We must persuade others throughout the world that they can safely place large quantities of debt capital with us, and that we still need equity capital for joint ventures and other equity interests where significant benefits are bestowed on all parties. Canadian businessmen must get out into the world with the news that Canada is taking action to restrain inflation, is not pricing itself out of the market, and that the expertise of our labour, the quality of our technology, the entrepreneurial ability of our management and the availability of our materials are second to none in the world.

Of course, it is not just shortages and monopolistic action that cause our problems. We have been building up to this psychologically for 25 years. When I was chairman of the North York Library Board back in the fifties, there were annual demands from the unionized staff for a 6 per cent raise. In those days, the annual cost of living increase was about 2 per cent. I remember saying, "What justifies a raise? You're doing the same work as last year. You haven't saved the public any money by finding ways in which each of you will do more work or do it more effectively." The question was never answered directly. They simply said, "Well, the teachers are getting it," or "The staff at the municipal offices are getting it." And they were right. It had just sort of become the fashion for everybody to get a raise every year. There was no merit or accomplishment required. All you had to do was to survive, come to work reasonably regularly, and avoid being fired.

I do not want to tag labour with all the blame. At the same time real estate developers were doubling their money without even closing the purchase deal; someone was making a fortune selling hula hoops, and Bobby Hull was offered $1 million for three years' service by the Chicago Black Hawks.

We all thought we were dancing down a never-ending garden path to a pretty tune. It was unthinkable that we would ever have to pay the piper. But we were wrong. The piper is at the door waiting for his pay, and we can only pay him if each of us chips in. Of course, there are those who say: "Don't pay him. Let's run away, or shoot him, or tie him hand and foot and toss him in the river." But, honourable senators, the piper is democracy, and if we run away from him or destroy him each of us will rue the day.

• (1450)

We have developed the most peculiar view of democracy. The idea seems to be abroad that democracy means that each person or group can do his own thing, make his or its own decision as to whether or not to abide by the rules of society. A few posturing Napoleons of the labour business—and at that level it is a well-paid business—are even inciting their membership to break the law. That is not democracy; it is anarchy. We had better grow up and understand that if ever we are going to mould this great, sprawling giant of a Canada into a society of which we can be proud, and for which the world will have respect, we will have to be democrats—elect our representatives, freely discuss the issues, find a general consensus and then abide by the decision, like it or not, for the good of all. We have a great future awaiting, after we resolve our juvenile fractiousness.

All right then, what can we do? We can take the leadership that our government proffers us. Even if we do not like the idea of controls—the government obviously does not like it either—we have to summon up whatever concern we have for each other and for our society to work together to deal with a crisis for which the traditional economic tools hold no solution.

Surely, we can accept that our eleven democratically elected governments across the country, representing every organized political party, having endorsed the program and pledged their cooperation, have done so in good faith and in the belief that it is at least a partial answer to our problem. Surely, we can look at the outstanding Canadians, the members of the anti-inflation board, who have accepted the task of making the program work, and believe that to the best of their ability the rules will be applied without fear or favour. Surely, we can listen to the massive concern of the Canadian people and know that they intend to make this program work—that they know something has to be made to work.

If you of labour or you of business defy the rest of us, whether with loud voices or with silent cynicism, if you tell us you do not trust us to be fair, then you insult the Canadian people and can expect to be defied and distrusted by them in turn.

Honourable senators, there will always be a few who will abuse our freedom. I do not believe there will be many. Let us proceed with determination.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Desruisseaux, debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION POLICY

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Riel, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Immigration Policy, I table the committee's third and final report, and ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 1376.)

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, November 12, 1975, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1375)

IMMIGRATION POLICY

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

1. The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Immigration Policy has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

2. Pursuant to its Order of Reference of the House of Commons of Monday, March 3, 1975 and of the Senate of Wednesday, March 5, 1975, the Committee has heard evidence on and has considered Canadian immigration policy.

3. The Committee has interpreted its mandate as being to facilitate and give focus to a national debate on future immigration to Canada. Empowered by its terms of reference "to invite the views of the public" on the issues raised in the Green Paper on Immigration tabled by the Government in February, the Committee held public hearings in Ottawa and across Canada. Submissions of briefs and comments by individuals and organizations were received at the hearings and by mail.

4. In its 35 weeks of operation, the Committee held nearly 50 public hearings in 21 cities in each of Canada's five regions and in the Northwest Territories. More than 400 witnesses presented submissions at these meetings. In addition, the Committee received more than 1,200 letters and briefs from individuals and more than 200 briefs from organizations that did not appear at the hearings. In all, more than 1,800 individuals and organizations submitted their views. A detailed analysis of the views and concerns of the witnesses and the authors of briefs and letters has been prepared and is attached as Appendix A. Among those contributing to the debate were the Minister and officials of the Department of Manpower and Immigration; organizations with a special interest in immigration; academic and non-academic experts including many groups and individuals qualified to speak with authority on immigration law; and many members of the public concerned about issues bearing on immigration policy. The Committee also benefited from meetings and consultations with representatives of some provincial governments.

5. As a supplement to the hearings, groups of members of the Committee paid inspection visits to immigration reception and processing centres in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Fort Erie, Winnipeg, and London, England. Some members visited Washington, D.C., to consult with American officials and to examine United States policy at first hand.

6. The appointment of the Committee was greeted by a surge of public response. Many concerned organizations indicated their wish to participate in the hearings, while objecting that the initial deadline of 31 July set by Parliament for the Committee's report allowed too little time to prepare submissions. The Committee itself felt that, in view of the numbers wishing to present briefs, it needed more time properly to complete its task. At the Committee's request, Parliament granted a three-month extension to October 31 for presentation of the Committee's report.

This made it possible to extend to September 15 the deadline for submitting briefs. While most organizations found it possible to meet this date, briefs received subsequently have been examined. At the last moment, the Committee found it necessary to request a further extension of two weeks to allow for translation and printing of this Report.

7. How representative were the views gathered by the Committee? How effective was the Committee's method of probing public attitudes by holding public meetings across the country? True, some meetings were packed by noisy representatives of extremist organizations with small memberships who often tried to prevent the expression of opinions different from their own. But on no occasion did these groups fully succeed. Even at the rowdiest meetings, the Committee learned about new problems and heard fresh points of view. Moreover, every public meeting provoked a fresh flow of submissions by mail.

8. In view of the volume and comprehensiveness of the responses received, oral and written, the Committee feels confident that it has had ample opportunity to consider carefully the full range of national views on each aspect of immigration policy. Every view had an advocate. The great public concern, the news coverage of hearings and the Committee's paid advertising combined to ensure that many of the Committee's public meetings were well attended. Coping with too many, rather than too few, speakers for the time allowed was a major problem.

9. On balance, the Committee is satisfied with the method it used to sound out public opinion and believes it offered these important advantages:

—it made the Committee aware of the differing regional approaches to immigration across Canada;

—it permitted the Committee to move beyond the conceptual and geographic frameworks of Ottawa and to become exposed to views it might not otherwise have encountered; and —it provided Committee members and the Canadian public an opportunity for dialogue and open discussion of an important policy issue.

However, some members of the Committee felt that the method had the disadvantage that it elicited the views of unrepresentative and overly emotional individuals.

10. This report will indicate the Committee's reaction to the range of information and opinion it encountered in the course of this dialogue. As will be evident, the issues raised by the Government's Green Paper on Immigration Policy and the data it provided often formed the basis for the national debate in which the Committee engaged. The report, however, reflects much more than the Committee's consideration of the Green Paper. It seeks to identify the areas of broad concern that emerged from its interaction with the public and from other investigations; to express the Committee's views on most of these issues; to make recommendations regarding the retention or modification of specific immigration policies or procedures; and finally to suggest broad guidelines for a future immigration policy for Canada.

Canada Needs Immigrants

11. The Committee is of the opinion that Canada should continue to be a country of immigration. In reaching this central conclusion Committee members were particularly impressed by demographic and economic arguments, as well as by the need to take account of family and humanitarian considerations for reasons specified elsewhere.

Demographic factors

12. Owing to the spectacular decline in the Canadian fertility rate since 1960, immigration is becoming an increasingly important component of population growth. In 1974 Canada's population of 22.3 million grew by 348,000, of which one-half was due to immigration as illustrated in chart 1. (See Appendix B.) The situation of immigration accounting for a large part of population growth is one which Canadians have not experienced since the 1920's. This trend is likely to continue. The Committee was impressed by evidence that even if the decline in the fertility rate were to cease and the current fertility rate of 1.8 births per woman were to be projected into the future, Canada would require net immigration of more than 50,000 a year to prevent a decline in total population after the year 2000. Chart 2 illustrates the implications of various levels of net immigration. (See Appendix B.)

13. It should be noted, moreover, that these are net figures which take account of estimated emigration from Canada. Statistics on annual emigration do not exist and present procedures do not allow for the compilation of reliable figures. However, well-informed estimates suggest that emigration may amount to about one-third of the gross numbers of immigrants, so that it would be reasonable to add 50 per cent to the net figures in chart 2 to transfer them into gross immigration figures. On the basis of this calculation, an annual rate of 75,000 immigrants would be needed at current fertility rates to maintain a population level of 28 million during the first half of the 21st century. Even at this figure the population could be expected to decline by two million by the year 2071. If it were desired to have a stable population throughout the next century, it would be necessary to have a gross rate of immigration of 150,000 a year.

14. The Committee recognizes that these figures involve several assumptions and that the situation could vary considerably over time. But they do reveal the long lead time required if population trends are to be modified. Since the Committee believes that a country as large and thinly populated as Canada cannot afford a declining population, it concludes that Canada must continue to welcome a minimum of 100,000 immigrants a year as long as present fertility rates prevail. The Committee was divided on whether or not to suggest an upper limit either as a figure or as a percentage of the Canadian population. But there was agreement that the Government, when formulating a target each year as called for later in this report, should not treat the minimum figure of 100,000 as an upper limit.

15. The Committee rejected the view contained in some submissions that Canada should close its doors to immigrants. Equally, it concluded that in an age of vastly increased mobility Canada could not afford to have an "open door" policy, and would have to maintain controls over the total number of immigrants coming each year to Canada. The Committee's preference is for a policy of moderation between these two extremes.

16. In the exercise of such a policy the Committee agrees with the Government of Newfoundland which argued that "in this time of increasing world populations, rapidly depleting resources and economic uncertainty, ... (immigration) must be brought under control and rationally directed ... to best serve the interests of Canadians" (30:80). To do this properly, account should be taken of long term needs as well as short term pressures. The Committee is well aware that in a time of high unemployment new immigrants may be seen by the unemployed in particular as competing for too few jobs. Committee members are also aware that Canada continues to have an exceptionally high rate of new entrants into the labour force each year, higher indeed than any other industrialized country. In 1972, for example, 320,000 persons entered the labour force making a total of 9,086,000. But this situation will change significantly around 1980 when the annual rate of growth of the labour force will decline rather abruptly from approximately three percent to about two percent. André Raynauld, Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, stated that this decline to a lower and more normal rate of entrants into the labour force could mean that, without immigration, future economic development might actually be held back by labour shortages (15:14). The Committee accepted Dr. Harvey Lithwick's assertion that "it is disastrous" for a country to tie immigration policy to short-term economic developments. Immigration "is a long term investment in human resources" (48:22). Its conclusion from this body of evidence was that for population reasons it is important to maintain a moderately steady flow of immigration.

Economic factors

17. The Committee was exposed to much conflicting testimony regarding the economic costs and benefits of immigration. It recognized that the evidence for making specific judgments was far from adequate. As Louis Parai had observed in his background study for the Green Paper, The Economic Impact of Immigration,

"The results of previous research do not clearly indicate the economic impact of post-war immigration into Canada... in most instances the impact has not been large. The most significant effects... are to increase slightly per capita incomes and economic growth... and to provide for a more flexible labour force..." (p. 73)

18. Contradictory testimony was received regarding the significance of the contribution an expansionist immigration policy could make to economies of scale. In the main, members of the Committee went along with Dr. Raynauld's comment that this argument that immigration should be continued because it contributes to economies of scale was "a very weak one" (15:16). The Committee believes that the benefits of immigration are obvious providing there are reasonable employment opportunities. Of course, immigration causes some special direct costs, as the brief of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council pointed out, particularly in the fields of education, training and adjustment services. But these costs are balanced by the fact that immigrants arrive with training and experience acquired at no cost to Canada. All of this leads the Committee to the conclusion that Canada would contribute to its own economic well-being by continuing to welcome immigrants in moderate numbers.

19. For this combination of reasons the Committee recommends that immigration in future be treated as a central variable in a national population policy and that this objective be achieved through the establishment of an immigration target to be adjusted from time to time to achieve an even rate of population growth as well as to take account of changing economic conditions and needs. This implies a new commitment to policy planning in the formulation of immigration targets. It also involves recognition of a point strongly made by Dr. Raynauld, "there are very substantial economic consequences from an alteration in the pace of population growth, either from fast to slow or from slow to fast" (15:5). Subsequently under questioning, Dr. Raynauld expressed his views more explicitly:

"It would be desirable not to have too much fluctuation in immigration, no more so than it is desirable to have fluctuations in income and in investment because that generates cycles and instability in the economy that prove to be very costly to Canada" (15:29).

Prejudices Regarding Immigrants

20. A persistent theme of submissions hostile to immigration was the view that immigrants crowd into cities, exacerbating housing shortages, increasing the crime rate, bringing infectious diseases, taxing the welfare roles and government services, and causing unemployment by taking jobs from Canadians. The Mayor of Vancouver made the specific point that "... immigration [to Vancouver] has exerted great pressure on land and therefore on housing prices... Immigrants have brought talent, money and culture, but they have not brought land... This is primarily a spatial question, not a racial question" (26:6 & 7). The Committee recognizes that all these are problems faced by rapidly growing cities, but concluded that they are caused by the economic, social and cultural dynamism of cities and their attractiveness to Canadians and immigrants alike. In fact, Canadians migrating within Canada from the country to the cities and from province to province are the main impulse for city growth. Chart 3 graphically illustrates interprovincial migration from 1966 to 1971 and shows how mobile Canadians have become. (See Appendix B.) And this chart does not even display the significant movements within provinces, for instance, from the Cariboo country to Vancouver or from Labelle to Montreal.

21. The Committee is convinced that even without immigration Canada's larger cities would face problems inherent in growth. Immigrants are only a tributary flowing into a much larger river of Canadians who have been migrating to the cities in ever increasing numbers throughout the century. This does not mean that the Committee is not sympathetic to the planning needs of cities. It simply feels that immigrants should not be blamed for problems that they have done little to cause, although they may have compounded them. Canadians worried about the quality of life in our cities should look elsewhere than to sharply reduced immigration for a solution to the problems of city living.

22. Similar misconceptions also abound regarding the impact of immigration on social services and benefits and health care. None of the testimony supported with facts the popular notion that newcomers are using these services more than the native-born. If anything, the Committee has the impression that use of such services by immigrants falls below the national average for the obvious reason that many come from countries where such services are traditionally provided by the family. Indeed, it would appear that inter-provincial and rural-to-urban migrants make greater use of government support than persons from abroad.

23. Nor do immigrants participate less actively in the work force than long-term residents. Selection criteria are designed to ensure that newcomers are well equipped to secure employment. The Indo-Can Sikh Association of Prince Rupert spoke for many in saying,

"... East Indians have fared well in finding employment, achieving a high level of family income, purchasing their own homes, and feeling at home in Canada" (09).

Other persons offered explanations for the initial difficulty some immigrants experience in finding satisfactory employment. An economist, himself an immigrant, told the Committee that "... [occupational] mobility is built into the structure of the occupations themselves" (47:38). He was referring to the complex of factors such as job seniority within unions, different techniques for performing a trade which immigrants have learned in their countries, and the like. These factors may complicate the task of an immigrant seeking a steady job.

24. Some submissions contained allegations that immigrants, especially the non-white, contribute disproportionately to the crime rate. Expert testimony did not support this charge. Professor Frederick Zemans of Osgoode Hall said,

"... most immigrants who come to Canada have a strong fear of the legal system itself... and they are very concerned that they should not get into any difficulties or any trouble while in this country" (10:5).

And in a study prepared for the Ministry of the Solicitor General of Canada in 1974 statistics indicated that the crime rate for immigrants was approximately one-half that for native-born Canadians (Report 6/74).

General Objectives

25. The Committee agrees that Canadian immigration policy should meet certain humanitarian needs as well as promote Canada's economic, social and cultural interests. Accordingly, it favours a reaffirmation of the goals of reuniting families and of offering a home to refugees, and recommends that these two groups be treated differently from other immigrants: immediate family members should continue to be exempted from evaluation on the point system, and refugee movements should be given sympathetic consideration appropriate to the nature and circumstances of each case.

26. The Committee recognizes that it has been through the contributions and efforts of successive generations of immigrants that Canada has grown to be the relatively secure, prosperous, free, and satisfying place it is. About four million immigrants have come to Canada since World War II. Their skills, their energies, and their enthusiasm have added immeasurably to every facet of Canadian life, and have created a vibrant multicultural mosaic. The Committee firmly believes that the settlement of post-war immigrants alongside the founding cultures is one of the most positive chapters in Canada's post-war history. It looks to immigration to continue to contribute to the economic, cultural and social well-being of the country.

27. While these objectives remain unchanged, it has become apparent that the present immigration system needs modification and modernizing. It had been assumed that immigration was essentially self-regulating; that is, that fewer people would want to immigrate to Canada when unemployment was high or the economy bad, and so automatically a balance would always be achieved between the number of immigrants applying to come and Canada's economic capacity to absorb them. Experience has proved this assumption false. It is already evident that no matter what happens in Canada there will be substantially increased world migration motivated by a desire for personal betterment. With fewer countries ready to receive immigrants, the pressures on Canada will exceed its capacity to absorb new population.

28. Canadians' attitudes toward the value of growth per se have also changed drastically. No longer synonymous with progress, growth is seen as one of the contributors to urban congestion, environmental pollution and depletion of non-renewable natural resources, thereby threatening the quality of life generally.

29. For these reasons, the Committee recommends a shift from the present immigration system, which allows for the admission of everyone meeting certain criteria regardless of numbers, to a more managed system capable of regulating the total flow. However, the proposed system must do this in a fair and non-discriminatory, efficient, and manageable way.

Development assistance and the "brain drain"

30. The Committee considered the arguments contained in some submissions that Canada should regard immigration as one method of helping to alleviate the problems of over-population in other countries, or at least as a way of alleviating the human distress of some few of the world's needy.

31. While affirming Canada's obligation and commitment to working towards human betterment on an international scale, the Committee for a number of reasons agrees with the majority of submissions in rejecting the idea that immigration to Canada should be a factor of any significance in this endeavour. Canada could never take enough immigrants to have a noticeable effect on the poorer countries with exploding populations.

32. The Committee believes that Canada should help improve living conditions in poorer countries through development assistance and by working towards an improved international trading system. To the extent that Canada's efforts and those of other developed countries are successful, they will relieve any developing countries which look to emigration as a solution to their problems of the need to do so. The Committee agrees with the statement of the Interchurch Project on Population that "instead of merely offering an escape from poverty, it would be more realistic for Canada to help end poverty itself in the Third World" (33:98).

33. When considering the nature and extent of Canada's international responsibilities in formulating its immigration policy the Committee also discussed the often raised issue of the so-called "brain drain." Many submissions agreed with the National Union of Students in arguing that by accepting the skilled, educated, young and energetic from developing countries Canada is continuing a "rip-off of . . . people from countries where their skills and training are far more important" (0110). This was presented as an abdication of Canada's international responsibilities and as directly conflicting with our development aid policies. However, some submissions, notably from East Indian and Chinese immigrants, suggested that anxiety about the "brain drain" from developing countries is exaggerated because in some of these countries the number of people receiving advanced education surpasses the number of suitable employment opportunities (30:73-5).

34. The Committee appreciates that this is a complex issue and that there is truth in both sides of the argument. While some countries wish to protect themselves from the emigration of persons with talents and skills important to their development, Canada is committed to the free movement of peoples and ideas. The Committee considers it the responsibility of the country of emigration to take action to protect itself from the "brain drain", and in such situations Canada should refrain from active encouragement of immigrants. Canada's acceptance of immigrants should be without discrimination as to the country of origin.

Non-discrimination

35. The Committee received many submissions concerning the racial and ethnic composition of Canada's population and its rate of change. A number of these, from Canadians and immigrants alike, reflected anxiety about recent and fairly rapid increases in the immigration of non-whites, particularly to the larger cities. Some submissions advocated severe restrictions or a total embargo on immigrants from countries with coloured populations. The Committee also received evidence in testimony of intolerance towards non-whites in some Canadian communities.

36. The Committee sought to identify the sources of racial prejudice evident in these submissions, many of which advocated tight restrictions or a total embargo on non-white immigration. Some persons revealed that the customs and values of newcomers were disturbing to them; this anxiety tended to increase to the degree that the beliefs and lifestyles of immigrants vary from those found in traditional Canadian communities. Others showed an irrational aversion to colour and physical appearance different from their own.

37. The Committee also recognizes that with worldwide economic recession and high unemployment at home, many Canadians may be feeling less secure and more self-protective of a country to which many people across the world want to come. Racial discrimination and hostile attitudes towards minority groups are worldwide phenomena which tend to increase in times of economic stress. With expanding economic opportunities, intolerance should decrease.

38. One point of view put to the Committee was that any decision to restrict the numbers of any ethnic or racial groups would generate anxiety and instability among the members of these same groups who are now in Canada. In the words of an East Indian immigrant contemplating such a move, it would be tantamount to "being told that there are too many East Indians here already" (41:27). A spokesman from the Armenian Congress spoke for many immigrants when he said:

"[A restrictive policy would be] an insult to human dignity in general and to the thousands of people from Asia and Africa who have taken up Canadian citizenship and are working towards a better Canada and World.... The Canadians of Asian and African origin will feel more and more estranged from the other Canadians ..." (16:43 & 44).

39. There is a danger of creating second-class citizens of many foreign-born who have made their homes in Canada. It is evident that the ability of newcomers to adapt readily and successfully to Canadian life is in large part contingent on the esteem in which they are held by their chosen communities, and on the existence of non-discriminatory treatment in employment, housing, and services. The Committee makes this assertion in the confident belief that the majority of the Canadian people are tolerant and generous and not prepared to condone racial hostility and discrimination.

40. Canada has become to a large extent a multi-cultural and multi-racial society. The Committee stresses that Canadians must anticipate that many future immigrants will be coming from non-European countries and many will be non-white. This trend is clear from recent statistics. As late as 1967 almost 80 per cent of the immigration flow came from Europe, but by 1974 slightly less than 40 per cent of immigrants were European-born. This decline in European immigration reflected in large part the improvement in the European standard of living which makes Canada less attractive than it used to be. Significantly, in 1974, apart from the large-scale emigration from Britain caused by troubled economic conditions there, the highest number of immigrants came from the poorer countries of Europe: Portugal, followed by Italy, Greece, and Yugoslavia. These trends are unlikely to be reversed: Canadians must accept the facts that the country's capacity to attract European immigrants has diminished, and that if we desire immigrants, we must look to other parts of the world.

41. Accordingly, the Committee unanimously recommends that immigration policy continue to be fair and non-discriminatory on the basis of race, creed, nationality, ethnic origin and sex, and that this principle be formally set out in the new Act. It follows therefore that those parts of the present Section 57(g) that give a statutory basis for a discriminatory policy should be excluded from any future Act even though these powers have not been used for many years.

42. In order to promote inter-group understanding, the Committee further recommends public and school education and legislative action to protect Canadians and immigrants alike from racial and ethnic discrimination. As the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto said:

"we, as individual Canadian citizens must ... accommodate our own attitudes and understanding to facilitate the integrating process. Once an immigrant sets foot in this country, he or she is one of us. We, as a country, and the immigrants as individuals, have made a contract" (34:103).

Well-enforced human rights legislation, public education, and community action programs are helpful in inter-group adjustment. Britain, which in the 1960's, experienced serious racial tension, has had extremely favourable results from its human rights legislation and programs.

Managing Immigration Flows

43. The Committee recognizes that the present point system for assessing potential immigrants has had value as an equitable means for selecting among applicants. However, it was never designed as an instrument to regulate the numbers of qualified applicants accepted; rates of immigration were left to vary with the performance of the Canadian economy. The result has been severe fluctuations in rates, as chart 4 illustrates. (See Appendix B.) (One peak, however, was caused by the movement of Hungarian refugees.) Moreover, the Committee discovered that the apparent responsiveness of immigration flows to Canadian labour demand is partly illusory. The dramatic fluctuations do not indicate the effectiveness of "automatic regulators" such as the labour market so much as they show the effectiveness of administrative measures in turning the immigration tap on and off. Changing the weighting of selection criteria through regulations issued by the Department of Manpower and Immigration remains the most frequently employed regulating device, used recently in the new regulations of October 1974 strongly favouring applicants with either a job offer or a trade falling within one of the few "designated occupations".

44. In the Committee's opinion, such methods are clearly inadequate to meet Canada's present or anticipated needs. Figures show that interest in immigrating to Canada is increasing throughout the world. Canadian Immigration Officers received over 750,000 inquiries regarding the possibility of immigrating to Canada in 1974. If the expected volume of new applications is to be equitably handled, and if Canada is to derive the benefits of balanced population growth, Committee members believe the present system of immigration management must be significantly modified.

45. A principle objective of the new policy should be the regulation of immigration flow to achieve desired population growth. The Committee suggests this could be accomplished by setting an annual target and by developing processes for determining and keeping close to that target. The main indicators used in setting the target should be (1) demographic, such as fertility rate, size, rate of change in size, and age of population, and rate of entry into and exit from the job market; and (2) economic, such as the level of economic activity and rates of employment and unemployment, which have a tendency to move in shorter cycles.

46. Rational population and immigration planning depends on accurate immigration and emigration statistics. The absence of precise figures on emigration from Canada is a serious deficiency and the Committee hopes that a method of monitoring outflows can eventually be developed.

47. The Committee has discussed possible figures as targets for future annual immigration to Canada. (Because of a lack of emigration statistics, targets must be set in gross rather than net terms.) Bearing in mind its earlier proposal that under present conditions Canada must continue to welcome a minimum of 100,000 immigrants a year and that this figure should not be regarded as a maximum, the Committee recommends that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, after consultation with the provinces, propose an annual target figure.

48. The Government's proposal should be subject to parliamentary scrutiny. This could be accomplished by the Minister each year presenting to Parliament a resolution concerning the target. The Committee suggests that Parliament refer the resolution without debate to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration where the Minister could explain how the target figure was determined, give an account of the previous year's immigration experience, and offer a three-to-five-year rolling projection of proposed immigration rates.

49. The annual target having been established, the likely number of sponsored applicants for the period can be estimated (the Committee understands this can be done fairly accurately) and subtracted from the target. The resulting figure is the ceiling on the number of independent applicants to be accepted that year. In the Committee's view, because refugee flows are rarely predictable they cannot form part of such calculations.

50. The Committee considers that this combined target and ceiling system would prove flexible and manageable. Limiting the number of independent immigrants admitted each year would very probably give rise to a waiting list of acceptable applicants. Each would be assigned a place in the list and given an approximate date when he could be admitted. About one-quarter of the total number should be admitted each quarter of the year to smooth out the flow. Committee members who consulted with United States officials were told that a control system involving waiting lists can be highly satisfactory from the point of view both of the receiving country and of the immigrants concerned.

51. The annual target is envisaged as an order of magnitude to be aimed at, but because of some unpredictability in the exact number of immigrants sponsored in any one year the target might be overshoot or undershot. While a definite ceiling would be placed on the number of independent immigrants—and adhered to—there would be no limit on the number of sponsored immigrants; any such person admissible would have the right to immediate entry. Likewise, the number of refugees accepted in any year would be determined by the government of the day in the light of the situation in their home country and in Canada. Thus, the actual number of immigrants coming to Canada each year could vary somewhat from the target figure.

52. Introduction of this system of targets and ceilings would, in the Committee's opinion, have several advantages over the present system.

—It would reduce the erratic character of post-war immigration to Canada while leaving sufficient flexibility to adapt to changing economic conditions.

—It would provide the tools to manage immigration efficiently to serve Canada's priorities.

—It would help to ensure that the profoundly human problems of immigration control are handled fairly, and in accordance with criteria which are open to public scrutiny.

—It would assist in planning because the full number of independent immigrants approved for entry in any one year could all be expected to come forward.

53. The Committee also gave considerable attention to the selection of a system for allocating the places within the ceiling for independent immigrants. A number of suggestions were made:

—allocation on a first come, first served basis;

—regional ceilings (for example, one third for Europe, one third for the Americas, and one third for Africa and Australasia);

—one and the same ceiling for each country (as in the United States system);

—country by country ceilings based on the size of their populations;

—priority to applicants scoring higher on the point system.

54. Having reflected on these choices, the Committee recommends admitting immigrants on a first come, first served basis, it being left to the operation of the immigration system to ensure that undue preference is not accorded applicants from any one country. At the same time the Committee heard complaints that the distribution of offices around the world was uneven, and wishes to express its concern that the distribution not be such as to create de facto discrimination.

Selection Criteria

Sponsored relatives

55. The Committee reaffirms that the reunification of families should be a principle of Canada's immigration policy. The family provides ties of affection and emotional support, and meets the material needs of dependent members. For these reasons the Committee favours the maintenance of the present system under which close, dependent relatives are automatically admissible to Canada providing they meet health standards and do not fall within a list of prohibited classes.

56. At the same time, the Committee attaches importance to another objective of immigration policy—that the skills and talents of immigrants contribute to the Canadian economy—and recognizes that a great many immigrants see Canada primarily as a land of social and economic opportunity. The Committee believes that Canada is enriched by those persons who come as independent immigrants for the sole purpose of participating in the work force and community life, and who have the initiative to take this step even though they lack the support of a relative in Canada. The Committee is concerned that over time the present classes of sponsored and nominated immigrants, given substantial advantages because they have relatives in Canada, would absorb an increasingly larger share of the places available each year in Canada. To ensure that this does not happen and that "new seed" immigrants continue to find a way to enter Canada, all Committee members except one recommend that the present class of nominated immigrant be dropped, and that the ties between members of the non-dependent extended family be recognized in a different way. The nominated category was first introduced in 1967, and in the Committee's opinion has given undue preference to non-dependent relatives seeking to enter Canada. They have received from 15 to 30 points, a substantial part of the minimum of 50 points needed to be eligible for admission, solely through being related to someone in Canada. Of course, such persons could still come to Canada, but they would have to be assessed on a more equal basis with independent applicants.

57. However, the Committee recognizes that relatives can help newcomers in adjusting to their new environment. It therefore proposes that the five points now available to an independent immigrant having a relative in Canada be doubled to ten if that relative is a Canadian citizen. It also recommends that the categories of relatives admissible within the sponsored class be slightly extended.

58. At present, Canadians and landed immigrants may sponsor parents over the age of 60. The basis for this age specification is that such parents usually can be regarded as dependents, not likely to enter the labour force. The Committee suggests a modest extension of this category. Canadian citizens (but not landed immigrants) over the age of 21 should be able to sponsor parents of any age. While some parents undoubtedly would be young enough to enter the work force and therefore not be dependent, there should be a possibility of reuniting any such close relatives desirous of being together. The Committee recommends that this right be limited to Canadian citizens to avoid the possible abuse whereby one of the elder children of a large family could come to Canada and immediately sponsor his parents, who on their arrival could immediately sponsor their other children under the age of 21.

Independent immigrants

59. The Committee recommends that the point system be maintained for evaluating all independent immigrants. The system has shown itself to be generally objective and fair, and ensures that prospective immigrants are assessed according to their ability to integrate socially and economically.

60. The Committee recommends a number of modifications to the allocation of points within the system. However, it has not attempted to work out a comprehensive new point system, believing that this is better done by the Department of Manpower and Immigration when they prepare the new Act and regulations. There is no reason why the points available necessarily should equal 100 or the minimum number of points needed for entry necessarily should be 50, as is now the case. The Committee's comments are intended rather to indicate the specific objectives which it thinks the point system should be designed to meet and to suggest a relative order of magnitude.

(a) Education and training

61. The Committee considers that 20 points for education and training—one point for each year of study—places too much emphasis on educational qualifications. The Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada advised that "between 1961 and 1971 the general level of schooling of the labour force in Canada increased by more than one year on the average", from which he concluded that "we may need fewer skilled people in the future" (15:18). Moreover, the Committee gained the impression that the present allocation of points favours the wealthy and well-educated. It also learned that the ten points now allocated for "occupational skill" include an educational component so that there is a degree of double scoring.

62. For these reasons the Committee favours a reduction from 20 to 12 points for education, one point for each year of successful study. This would continue to give an advantage to applicants who had completed secondary schooling. The qualifications of persons with higher education could still be recognized under "occupational skill." But this proposed reduction would diminish the amount of the advantage now available to those with much formal education, but little practical experience, while assisting those with more modest educational qualifications and a highly desirable set of skills.

63. The Committee further advises that adequate measurement of educational achievement for the purpose of allocation of points can be assured only by ascertaining the equivalence between certificates and degrees received in Canada and the sending countries. Furthermore, because the present appraisal of education is not sensitive to qualitative differences, newcomers on arrival in Canada are frequently faced with difficulty in finding employment in their occupations or professions. Accordingly, consultation should be undertaken with a view to establishing Canadian equivalencies for foreign education and training. Immigration Officers abroad would then be better equipped to assess applicants realistically in this respect, and to advise them about the differences between educational and professional standards and requirements. A newcomer could then expect to enter the work force with a minimum of frustration and delay; and applicants from different parts of the world would receive more equitable treatment.

(b) Occupational skill

64. The Committee considers that practical experience in an occupation is very often no less important than formal educational and training qualifications. Under the present system an applicant receives up to 10 points for what is called "occupational skill"—the number of points allotted is calculated on a complex grid involving differing weights for the number of years of training needed to practice the profession or trade and the intrinsic skill required. The Immigration Officer may vary the total given on this criterion by one point above or below a prescribed norm depending on whether or not he considers the applicant has mastered the skills.

65. Because, for example, a welder with five years experience should be more capable than one just completing trade school, the Committee proposes that additional points—up to eight—be available for the assessment of experience and personal competence. Points allocated should depend on the number of years of practical experience and, if feasible, on the demonstrated quality of an applicant's competence. This means that the 10 points presently available for assessing the training and skill required in an occupation would be retained; but instead of allowing only one point to measure an individual's competence, eight points would be available to measure competence plus experience where that experience contributes to greater competence.

(c) Age

66. Demographic projections indicate a steady trend toward an aging Canadian population with increasing dependency ratios. Also, it is usually easier for younger people to adapt to a new country and find suitable employment. For both reasons the point system should continue to favour young applicants, and therefore the Committee recommends no change in the present practice of awarding points on this criterion.

(d) Language

67. The allocation of five points for competence in one or the other of Canada's official languages should be maintained. The ability to speak one of the official languages of Canada enables the newcomers to integrate more readily and successfully, and to enjoy greater occupational and social mobility.

68. The allocation of 10 points for an applicant speaking both official languages should be maintained, reinforcing the fact that Canada is a bilingual country.

(e) Relative in Canada

69. To compensate for its proposal to drop the nominated class, the Committee recommends that prospective immigrants who have a relative of a certain degree of kinship in Canada be given 10 points if the relative is a Canadian citizen, and five points if the relative is a landed immigrant. Relatives are usually helpful to new immigrants and support them both emotionally and materially in their initial period of settlement and integration into an unfamiliar culture. The additional five points given if the relative is a Canadian citizen recognizes that immigrants who have acquired Canadian citizenship have generally lived longer in Canada and can be more helpful to the new immigrant.

70. The Committee would allot five or 10 points (as the case may be) to an applicant with any of the following relatives in Canada: a son or daughter, a brother or sister, a parent or grandparent, a niece or nephew, an uncle or aunt, or a grandson or granddaughter.

(f) Occupational demand

71. The vast majority of independent immigrants, even those with a relative in Canada, come to this country to work and to improve their standard of living. Unless an immigrant has a reasonable chance of finding employment related to his training or abilities, neither he nor Canadians benefit from his settlement in Canada. In the Committee's judgment it is therefore essential that selection criteria reflect Canada's manpower needs. To that end, the Committee carefully studied the three criteria directly related to employment for which points are allocated.

72. It did not feel any change was needed in the points awarded for occupational demand. A very broad range of job classifications are rated from zero to 15 according to the national demand for the skills involved; this rating is based on the Job Vacancy Survey conducted by Statistics Canada. The figures are adjusted monthly and printed in the Department's occupational demand rating guide. The Committee considers that the Department's calculations might be somewhat improved if the statistical base could be extended to include other information on job vacancies, perhaps from provincial or private employment agency sources. But otherwise it believes this criterion is an important indicator of the employment picture in Canada.

73. Several members of the Committee were troubled by the implications of the fact that the occupational demand rating guide is available only to departmental officials; a number of persons are qualified in more than one occupation and might not be assessed to their best advantage if they are unaware of the varying needs for their different skills. Much of this information reaches the public domain anyway by the immigration grapevine, but often in garbled form. These members felt that because the occupational demand rating is derived from public data, it should therefore be made available to prospective immigrants.

74. Against this position it was argued that this practice would be open to abuse. Training schools which make a business of recruiting persons seeking to immigrate might offer diplomas in whichever occupations were allocated the highest points, or applicants might misrepresent their qualifications to score higher. The need to verify such qualifications would greatly increase the work load at immigration posts. These latter arguments persuaded a narrow majority of members of the Committee that the rating guide should be kept confidential.

75. The Committee, however, was agreed that, so long as the rating guide was not available publicly, the prospective immigrant should be given a description of how the Canadian point system works; the application form should contain an invitation to report each occupation the applicant is skilled in; and the Immigration Officer at the interview should be under instructions to seek full information on the applicant's occupational experience.

(g) Arranged employment and designated occupation

76. Because an arranged job is beneficial to both the immigrant and the employer, the Committee recommends that 10 points continue to be awarded to a person who has obtained a job before departure. To prevent abuse it is important that officials also continue to satisfy themselves that the job offer is valid, and that the prospective employer offers the prevailing salary for the position, and satisfactory working conditions and benefits. As an additional protection, the immigrant should be counselled on his rights before leaving for Canada and advised where to secure help on arrival if needed.

77. The Committee appreciates that awarding points for arranged employment favours those applicants who are close to the Canadian job market, and/or have relatives in Canada who can mediate a job offer. As a technique for assisting the independent immigrant who has no previous connections with Canada and for meeting the manpower needs of the economy, the Committee was impressed by the Department's experience with the recently introduced criterion of "designated occupation". This involves taking occupations in very high demand in specific localities which cannot be filled, and matching these fully documented requirements (which include details of wages, working conditions and the like) with the qualifications of applicants seeking entry to Canada. While neither party is obligated by the arrangement, there is a high probability of a mutually satisfactory match. The Committee encourages the Department to expand and improve this practice and to continue to award 10 points to applicants who so qualify.

78. The Committee further recommends that in times of high unemployment in Canada, it should automatically become mandatory that an independent immigrant have either an arranged job or the skills required in a designated occupation.

(h) Area demand

79. Under the point system as now administered, up to five points are offered depending on where an applicant intends to settle. The precise number of points is allotted on the basis of employment levels in different regions of the country, ignoring more specific local manpower needs as well as the need to encourage people to settle away from large centres of population.

80. Instead of giving points to immigrants for going to major cities like Toronto—in October, 1975, three points were given to any immigrant indicating Toronto as his destination—the Committee proposes that area demand be substantially modified and used experimentally to encourage prospective immigrants to settle in communities where population growth is desired and is compatible with regional development plans. It would be important to work closely with provincial authorities to ensure that they agreed that immigrants were desired and jobs were available in the designated communities, and that the services immigrants require would be provided.

81. Under these circumstances, the Committee thinks a successful applicant should be told about the designated communities and given the opportunity to emigrate immediately (in effect, jumping any queue which might have formed), on condition that he were prepared to take an available job and commit himself to a written contract to remain in the designated locality for at least two years.

82. If, during the contract period, he could not find work in the community, or there were other mitigating factors such as health needs, immigration officials could release him from his obligation. Otherwise, compliance with the contract should be encouraged by delaying the completion of formal landing until the immigrant has taken up employment in the designated locality and has reported to the local Canada Manpower Centre with proof he has done this. A person who failed to honour the terms of the contract in a way which indicated that he misrepresented his intentions when he agreed to it should be "required to depart" from Canada, a new procedure, less drastic than deportation, which is advocated later in this report.

83. The Committee considered offering perhaps as many as ten points as a further inducement to an applicant prepared to settle in a designated community. However, it decided against proposing that any points be awarded for area demand as now proposed out of a fear that this might lead to the entry of marginal immigrants who might fail to adapt successfully when placed in communities where conditions may be particularly difficult for a variety of reasons.

84. As now proposed, the only inducement offered to a prospective immigrant to settle in a designated community is the opportunity to emigrate immediately. This would be attractive only if a waiting list had developed. With a waiting list, an immigrant choosing to settle in a designated community would do so entirely voluntarily since he would be admissible in any event if he were prepared to wait. The Committee urges that this proposal be approached imaginatively, and that consultation with the provinces be undertaken about the various ways of applying the principle which the Committee wishes to promote—that one of the goals immigration can help to serve is regional development.

85. The Committee is under no illusion that its proposal would solve the problems of regional development or urban congestion. It recognizes that incentives must be available to attract Canadians as well as immigrants to areas where people are needed. However, a proposal along these lines could go a little way towards meeting these objectives, and the Committee urges that such a change be implemented on an experimental basis, and carefully monitored.

(i) Personal assessment and discretionary authority

86. Under the point system as now administered, an immigrant can gain up to 15 points for personal assessment. This is determined during an interview by the Immigration Officer following a detailed set of guidelines. In addition, the Officer has an overall discretionary authority to recommend that an applicant without sufficient points be admitted, or an applicant with sufficient points be refused, if there is reason to believe that the points awarded do not accurately reflect the person's chances of successfully establishing himself in Canada. Either recommendation is subject to review and final determination by the officer-in-charge in each immigration post.

87. The Committee feels that there is a degree of confusion between the two procedures, and realizes that there is a subjective element in making a personal assessment. Nonetheless, the officer must make a judgment as to how effectively an applicant would adjust to life in Canada. So, while the Committee accepts the need for giving some points for personal assessment, it suggests that the total be reduced by at least one third.

88. With regard to the overall discretionary authority, the Committee noted that in the vast majority of cases it has been used to admit persons not scoring sufficient points to be otherwise admissible. In 1974 the authority was used some 5,300 times; in about 500 cases applicants scoring sufficient points were rejected; in the remaining 4,800 cases applicants without sufficient points were admitted.

89. The Committee commends this practice and urges the Department to continue to encourage its officers to use their best judgment when it is a matter of admitting applicants showing adaptability, determination, and resourcefulness who might score low on education and training. It also recognizes that occasionally there may be evidence that an applicant is either unsuitable or undesirable in ways that cannot be reflected in specific and quantitative criteria.

90. The Committee believes that, in the end, it is unavoidable and proper that well-trained Immigration Officers and their superiors, familiar with the social and cultural milieu of the applicants they are assessing, should be entrusted with a discretionary authority to make judgments that are important, but of necessity cannot be encompassed within the mechanical administration of the point system.

Refugees

91. No specific provision is made in the Immigration Act and regulations for the admission of refugees. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration, by means of regular administrative directives and special programs which are approved by the government to handle unusual situations, has acted in accordance with the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (1951) and the subsequent Protocol (1967). He has often relaxed the terms of the U.N. definition. The lack of clearly stated guidelines led to the characterization of Canadian refugee policy by Freda Hawkins as "ad hoc, inconsistent, and undisclosed" (33:22).

92. The Committee feels that a clear statement of refugee policy is necessary to guarantee fair and equitable treatment of claimants to refugee status. At the same time, any statutory provisions must allow for the flexibility of response that has been, and will be, needed to handle the number and particularly the variety of refugee problems that arise.

93. The Committee regards the United Nations definition of "refugee" as too narrow and not adequate to accommodate the present-day variety of circumstances and emergencies confronting citizens of many countries. One difficulty is the stipulation that the person be outside his country to qualify as a refugee. Canada has eased this requirement to accommodate Chileans and Ugandans, but the Committee sees a need for firm criteria to reflect contemporary refugee situations in which persons must leave their home countries because they have been stripped of citizenship and denied the right to remain. The definition should also include persons living in their homeland who face persecution or punishment for political reasons, provided their governments allow them to leave.

94. In brief, the definition of refugee should not be so broad as to undermine the humanitarian principles to which Canada holds, nor so narrow that government cannot cope within the Act with the new emergencies that require a fast and efficient response.

95. The Committee studied the possibility of expanding the definition to include persons suffering from poverty and hunger as a result of natural disaster, famine, or war. Such a concept would be impractical since it could include over half the world's present population.

96. In fitting these conclusions into the broad policy proposals for an annual immigration target the Committee also recognizes that the number of refugees accepted from year to year may vary widely, depending on unpredictable world conditions, and on the economic situation within Canada. Accordingly it advises that an annual ceiling on the numbers of refugees permitted entry would introduce an unwelcome and arbitrary limit on the bounds of Canada's humanitarianism, and recommends that refugee flows should normally not be included in the government's annual target.

97. Because of the increasing number and variety of refugee situations, the Committee agreed that "well-founded fears of persecution" cannot always be easily documented. Accordingly, the Committee further recommends that the responsible Ministers should normally report to the appropriate Standing Committee of Parliament on international situations with refugee implications and the government's response.

98. Because refugee situations frequently require immediate action and the provision of safe haven with neither Canada nor the refugee (or claimant to refugee status) being sure of whether they would be willing or able to accept each other, the Committee carefully studied the recommendation of some witnesses that Canada institute a provisional or temporary reception program as Sweden has done.

99. The Committee learned that Swedish acceptance is limited to 1,000 persons per year and even these few cases are subject to individual approval. Canada is in a position to grant what amounts to first asylum by means of a Minister's Permit. The formal establishment of the rights of first asylum might cause problems in the longer term: while international practice permits the option of deporting an undesirable refugee, no country other than his country of origin may be prepared to receive him. The Committee therefore recommends against the establishment of a special category of first asylum.

Prohibited Classes

100. A person who is found to come within the prohibited classes of Section 5 of the Immigration Act is not admissible to Canada. The Committee received many submissions concerning the revision of this section of the Act.

101. It examined the classes which are prohibited and recommends that certain subsections of Section 5, identified below, be amended, and suggests that all subsections be carefully reviewed to ensure that the provisions are up to date. Since these prohibitions apply to anyone entering Canada—prospective immigrants, temporary workers, students, and visitors—the Act should clarify when the prohibitions apply mainly or solely to prospective immigrants and when they apply to everyone.

Retardation

102. Section 5(a)(i) prohibits the entry of "idiots, imbeciles or morons." The London Council of Women argued that, "A mentally retarded child should be permitted to immigrate with its parents, at any age" (37:10). The Committee agrees that immediate members of a family should not be separated because one member suffers from mental retardation and therefore recommends that sponsored dependents who are mentally retarded be admissible.

Mental illness and epilepsy

103. Section 5(a)(ii) and (iv) prohibit the entry of those who are insane or afflicted with epilepsy. An individual maintained that,

"persons suffering from mental disorders should not be prohibited if they can lead a normal life, particularly victims of nervous breakdowns which are only due to temporary circumstances and are experienced by many people" (1878).

Because many forms of mental illness and epilepsy can now successfully be treated and controlled, most Committee members agree that a person with a history of such a disease should be admissible providing he can lead a normal and useful life. A minority of the Committee would have eliminated mental illness and epilepsy altogether from the prohibited classes.

Contagious diseases

104. Section 5(b) excludes "persons afflicted with tuberculosis in any form, trachoma or any contagious or infectious disease," and was designed apparently to protect Canadians from dangerous illnesses, or the burden of costly medical treatment. The Committee agrees with several submissions that medical advances can make any such specific prohibitions obsolete, and therefore recommends that this subsection state the general principle to be observed without mentioning any specific diseases.

Crimes of moral turpitude

105. Section 5(d) prohibits the entry of persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a crime involving moral turpitude. While agreeing with the principle, the Committee believes that the term "moral turpitude" is vague and unsatisfactory. A more adequate definition would be achieved by listing serious offences such as murder, rape, assault, fraud, robbery, hijacking, kidnapping, perjury and smuggling, and by providing guidelines by which other serious crimes could be identified.

Homosexuals

106. Many organizations and individuals called for the removal of any reference to homosexuals and homosexuality in Section 5(e). They argued that homosexual acts between consenting adults are no longer an offence under the Criminal Code, and that the new immigration law should reflect the fact that Canadian attitudes towards homosexuality have changed significantly since the last Act was written. Although a few members of the Committee felt strongly that the prohibition against homosexuals should remain, the majority agrees that it should be removed.

Prostitutes

107. Section 5(e) also prohibits the entry of "prostitutes . . . or persons living on the avails of prostitution." The Committee wishes to retain this prohibition, but suggests the term "prostitute" be changed to read "male or female prostitute."

Beggars and Vagrants

108. Section 5(g) prohibits the entry of "professional beggars or vagrants." The Committee recommends that all reference to "vagrants" and "vagrancy" be removed from this prohibition.

Public charges

109. Section 5(h) prohibits the entry of those "who are public charges or who, in the opinion of a Special Inquiry Officer, are likely to become public charges." Although some members of the Committee advocated the removal of this prohibition because they think it is vague and confers unacceptable discretionary powers on the Special Inquiry Officer, the majority favours its retention on the grounds that Canada's social services should not be overtaxed.

Chronic alcoholics

110. Section 5(i) denies entry to persons who are "chronic alcoholics." The Canadian Bar Association recommended that the term be defined as it is in Section 4(1) (b) of the Canada Divorce Act. The Committee agrees, and thinks the definition should read as follows: "A person who is grossly addicted to alcohol and cannot reasonably be expected to be rehabilitated within a reasonably foreseeable period."

Drug addicts

111. Section 5(j) prohibits the entry of persons addicted to a narcotic within the meaning of the Narcotic Control Act, but barbiturates, amphetamines and hallucinogens are not included in this definition. The Committee recommends that this section be redrafted to take account of the latest developments in the field of drugs, and in particular to comprehend drugs that are addictive although they may not be narcotics.

Subversives

112. Subsections 5(l) to (r) of the Immigration Act prohibit the entry of subversives. The Committee believes there is a need for careful definition so as not to exclude law-abiding advocates of extreme views, and with this in mind commends the definition of subversive activity found in the Official Secrets Act which reads as follows:

- (a) Espionage or sabotage;
- (b) foreign intelligence activities directed toward gathering intelligence information relating to Canada;
- (c) activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means;
- (d) activities by a foreign power directed toward actual or potential attack or other hostile acts against Canada; or
- (e) activities of a foreign terrorist group directed toward the commission of terrorist acts in or against Canada.

The Committee suggests that international terrorism be added to this list.

Non-bona fide immigrants or non-immigrants

113. Section 5(p) prohibits the entry of "persons who are not, in the opinion of a Special Inquiry Officer, bona fide immigrants or non-immigrants." The Canadian Bar Association suggested that the section "should be either deleted in its entirety or amended so that it provides guidelines or criteria to be followed by Special Inquiry Officers as to the meaning of 'bona fide'" (067). The Committee recommends that the prohibition be retained, but that clear guidelines be followed by Special Inquiry Officers in applying it.

Controls and Enforcement Entry and exit controls

114. The Committee was impressed by the need to improve control over the entry into and stay in Canada of persons who come as visitors with the intention of residing and working illegally. The magnitude of the problem is unknown, but many Canadians expressed a fear that "illegal immigration" is out of control. It seems clear that this fear can foster negative attitudes towards immigrants in general. Moreover, the plight of many illegal aliens is a matter of concern as they are vulnerable to varied forms of intimidation, exploitation, and blackmail.

115. The Committee considered the present system for screening out non-bona fide visitors at ports of entry. A person suspected on certain specified grounds of intending not just to visit Canada but to remain can be refused entry. This can cause not only embarrassment, but genuine hardship to individuals who have come long distances on the understanding that all that is needed to get into Canada is a return ticket. Some bona fide visitors may be refused entry for lack of the means to make their case. Others may eventually emerge from the Special Inquiry procedure free to visit Canada—the Committee was informed that this is true of some 30 per cent of the cases that go to Special Inquiry—but their stay will be marred by their unpleasant experience at the port of entry. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that many "illegals" get through and disappear without any record of their entry.

116. For these reasons the Committee weighed the pros and cons of implementing a comprehensive visitor visa system, excluding only United States citizens, 30 million of whom visit each year, from the requirement of obtaining a time-limited visitor visa before seeking to enter Canada. Prospective visitors would then be accurately informed of Canada's regulations before undertaking a journey and would have the minimum necessary documentation, thus avoiding futile travel. Inspection at ports of entry would be facilitated. However, it is questionable whether officers abroad could better judge visitors' intentions even though they would be working under less pressure than port of entry officers in Canada. And the financial and staff implications of setting up systems and maintaining sufficient officers abroad are considerable. Again, unless a visitor visa system were coupled with an exit monitoring system there would be no way of knowing whether visitors had left Canada.

117. Consequently, the Committee has reservations about the efficacy and practicability of a visitor visa system and recommends that consideration be given first to the establishment of a combined entry and exit card system. If, after careful monitoring, it proved ineffective, a visitor visa system should be reconsidered.

118. With an entry and exit card system everyone entering Canada except Canadian citizens and landed immigrants, and American citizens, would be required to complete a card in duplicate stating name, passport number, country of citizenship, and intended place of sojourn in Canada. The Immigration Officer would check the card against the passport for authenticity, accuracy, and legibility, and date-stamp and code or number the card and its duplicate. The duplicate (possibly secured to the passport for safekeeping) would be surrendered to the Immigration Officer on departure. A computerized match would then indicate which visitors had, and which had not, departed. This procedure would give only a first lead as to where to look for people suspected of having failed to depart, but it would indicate whom to start looking for, and would for the first time provide some firm evidence of the dimensions of illegal immigration. Knowing that authorities had such records would itself discourage some visitors from overstaying.

119. A limited experiment with entry and exit cards was undertaken in Canada a few years ago, and was subsequently dropped. However, the system introduced at that time involved no inspection on departure and departing visitors were simply invited to drop their forms in a box. The Committee does not regard this as an adequate test of the system it has in mind.

120. For this system to be effective, Immigration Officers would have to be able to satisfy themselves that persons claiming to be Canadian residents or American citizens on entering or leaving Canada were telling the truth. This could be accomplished easily and efficiently by having such persons show their passports; however, alternative forms of identification should be considered acceptable for the 70 million Canadians and Americans travelling between the United States and Canada where passports have traditionally not been required.

121. Visitors would continue to be screened at ports of entry. The examination process would scarcely be speeded up, although officers on the primary inspection line would feel under less pressure in the knowledge that the entry and exit control card system were in effect. In this connection the Committee wishes strongly to recommend the establishment of separate inspection lines at international airports, one for Canadian residents and others for visitors and new immigrants. This would speed up the examination process for returning Canadians who in this day of giant aircraft may often be subjected to delays. If this small step were taken it would be possible to place trained Immigration Officers on the primary inspection line for visitors and immigrants, where their experience would be valuable.

122. The proposed entry-exit monitoring system would require additional personnel at ports of exit to check passports and collect exit cards, and inland to process the cards, but these costs would certainly be less than those involved in a visitor visa system requiring substantial personnel abroad.

123. The Committee recommends that an entry-exit monitoring system be complemented by more thorough follow-up, control, and enforcement procedures within Canada with respect to people suspected of remaining illegally. To facilitate this a number of specific steps should be taken:

—Employers should be required to make reasonable inquiries to establish that employees have a right to work in Canada, and be liable to prosecution for employing anyone who is not a Canadian, not a landed immigrant, or not in possession of a valid work permit.

—Visitors should not be permitted to change their status to landed immigrant, student, or worker from within Canada. (Exceptional cases should be handled by Minister's Permit.)

—Attempts should be made to develop additional methods to detect and take action against marriages of convenience by which persons fraudulently acquire the right to become Canadian residents.

—Landed immigrants who leave Canada for an appreciable period of time should be required to apply for a prima facie grant of re-entry from a Canadian Immigration Officer in the country of sojourn. The Officer would determine whether or not the absence was of a temporary nature with an intent of returning to Canada. At present the port of entry officer is required to make a hasty decision on these matters.

—Persons in Canada other than Canadian citizens who counsel, aid, or abet others to enter or remain in Canada illegally should be liable to deportation.

Special Inquiry, appeal and deportation procedures

124. Special inquiry, appeal and deportation procedures comprise some of the mechanisms for controlling in an equitable way the entry into or stay in Canada of persons who have no lawful right to be here, or who are undesirable. In addition to submissions from lawyers, civil liberties groups, and other interested parties, the Committee received testimony from the Chairman of the Immigration Appeal Board and Immigration officials, and visited ports of entry and Canada Manpower and Immigration Centres to observe procedures at first hand.

125. While the Committee does not wish to recommend any fundamental changes in the present system, it has two underlying concerns. First, whether individual justice is best served by a more rigorously legalistic adversary system with precise rules of procedure, of evidence, and of precedence, or by a less formal, more direct attempt to discover and respond appropriately to the facts as each case warrants. Second, courts and legal procedures in general are designed to protect rights, not to grant privileges. Immigration per se is, in this sense, a privilege, extended by the Parliament of Canada. The judiciary, or other independent bodies, should not, as far as possible, become involved in the selection of immigrants, although the current rights of review by the courts should be preserved. Also, the Committee wanted to ensure that procedures in Canada were not of a nature to encourage people to avoid applying for landed immigrant status abroad. It must not be made easier for would-be immigrants to achieve their objectives simply by arriving in Canada as visitors, and then taking their chances.

126. The Committee noted that many submissions recommended safeguards that are already in effect: at Special Inquiries the subject is now informed of his right to retain counsel; he has a right to the services of interpreters at no charge and to witnesses if necessary; he is read the report of charges against him, and is told of the purpose and possible consequences of the inquiry. The Committee rejects the suggestion that Special Inquiry Officers be appointees independent of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. It further recommends no change in the practice that where the inquiry concerns a person seeking to enter Canada, the onus of proof of admissibility lies upon that person, while where it concerns a person already within Canada, the onus of proof that the person is subject to deportation lies on the Minister. It agrees with the Canadian Bar Association (and with actual departmental practice) that "There should be no 'further examination' (by a Special Inquiry Officer) leading to deportation without a formal Special Inquiry hearing" (067).

127. The Committee was told that the powers of search, arrest, detention, and interim release provided for by the Immigration Act are exercised in a manner that adheres very closely to the provisions of the Criminal Code and the Bail Reform Act. The Committee concurs with the Canadian Civil Liberties Association that "it reveals no disrespect to insist that Ministerial assurances are no substitute for legislative safeguards" and recommends that the same safeguards that exist in the Criminal Code and Bail Reform Act be applied to the prehearing detention of "immigration suspects" who have been admitted to Canada and/or have filed appeals (34.42). At the same time, the Committee recommends the assignment of additional immigration staff to investigative and enforcement duties, and the provision of more adequate communications equipment, facilities, and R.C.M.P. support at Canada-United States border crossing points.

128. The Immigration Appeal Board at present is empowered to hear appeals from refusals of sponsorship applications made by Canadian citizens, and from orders of deportation in respect of landed immigrants, persons in possession of valid Canadian visas issued outside Canada, persons who have claimed refugee status and whose appeal has been allowed to proceed by the Board, and persons who have claimed Canadian citizenship and whose appeal has been allowed to proceed by the Board. On appeals from orders of deportation, the Board must first consider the legality of the deportation order; if the order is found to be in accordance with the law, the Board may then consider evidence that the person should nonetheless be allowed to stay in Canada for humanitarian or compassionate reasons.

129. The committee gave careful consideration to the arguments of the Chairman of the Immigration Appeal Board, made in testimony before the Committee, that all aliens should be given a right to apply for leave to appeal to the Board from a deportation or related order on questions of law, fact, or mixed fact and law, together with a right to claim special humanitarian or compassionate relief. It is the Board's exceptional power to grant special relief, to modify the laws of Parliament where the law would be unjustly harsh on individual cases, that the Board Chairman sees as the real raison d'être of the Board and as the justification for extending access to the Board to all persons ordered deported. A minority of the Committee favoured the recommendation of the Immigration Appeal Board. They believed that justice requires that a person ordered deported by an official of the Department should have a right to seek judicial review of this decision. They also thought that the experience of the Board should be recognized and its judgment be accepted on the principle of extending the right to appeal as proposed and on the practicability of the proposal—that it would not cause undue delays.

130. Most members of the Committee rejected the Appeal Board's recommendation for a number of reasons. It was felt that the Board's unique jurisdiction to modify the laws of Parliament should not be extended to visitors without visas who are ordered deported. Even granting only the right to seek leave to appeal would require a process of filing an application, production of the record of the Special Inquiry, written submissions from both parties, and consideration of these by the Board. This process, it was feared, would be unavoidably time-consuming, costly (not just in terms of the Board's time, but also because the subject would have to be detained and accommodated at public expense in the interim), create a backlog, and be largely unwarranted because Special Inquiries are judged to be satisfactory to these purposes. Here, specifically, Committee members did not want to create a situation where a person had more chance of gaining immigrant status by evading the selection process than by going through it. Moreover, the Committee's decision to recommend that students seeking to study in Canada should be required to apply for a visa abroad would somewhat extend the range of the Appeal Board's present jurisdiction. Should a future decision be taken to adopt a system of visitor visas, the Board's jurisdiction as now provided for would actually become larger than the limited extension it is now seeking.

131. The Committee agrees with the Canadian Civil Liberties Association that it is both unnecessary and unfair that a deportation order serve the goal of extradition: unnecessary because a country which wants someone extradited from Canada can request it; and unfair because extradition guarantees the safeguards of a criminal trial while deportation does not. Therefore, the Committee recommends that a person to be deported have the right to choose the country to which he wants to be deported, if that country is prepared to receive him (34:43).

132. Deportation carries with it a stigma and the consequence that, once deported, a person can legally re-enter Canada only by obtaining a Minister's Permit. The Committee found cogent the arguments of the Canadian Bar Association and the British Columbia and Canadian Civil Liberties Associations that there should be an additional, less drastic mechanism for removing people from Canada (067, 047, 34:48-9 respectively). It is unfair that a person having a right to a hearing of his case before a Special Inquiry Officer should forego it, in favour of departing voluntarily simply because the only possible outcome, if his suspected inadmissibility is confirmed, is the harsh one of deportation. The Committee therefore recommends the introduction of a "required to depart" procedure, to be used in cases of minor breaches of the Immigration Act or regulations.

133. A "required to depart" order should carry with it the same provisions for Special Inquiry and appeal as a deportation order now does. The rejection of an appeal of a "required to depart" order should be final. Anyone who fails to obey a "required to depart" order which is not subject to appeal or which has been upheld on appeal should be subject to deportation without further appeal.

134. The Committee considered suggestions that there be various additions to or deletions from the grounds for deportation of persons who are not Canadian citizens. As previously mentioned, it recommends the addition of persons in Canada who counsel, aid, or abet others to come into or remain in Canada illegally. It rejected additions which would be unjustifiably harsh or discriminatory against landed immigrants or which would compromise guaranteed freedoms; for example, immigrants who go on welfare or apply for unemployment insurance within 10 years of arrival, or immigrants who are politically radical. It agreed with suggestions for two deletions: homosexuals, for reasons outlined in the foregoing discussion of prohibited classes; and persons who have been admitted to hospital for treatment of mental diseases, since the threat of deportation has made immigrants fearful of using mental health services. Furthermore, the present provision that any inmate of a penitentiary, reformatory or jail may be subject to deportation should be modified to provide that a landed immigrant is liable for deportation only if he has been convicted of an offence which comes under the class of crimes which would have prohibited his entry into the country, as previously recommended.

135. The Immigration Act provides that Canadian domicile is acquired by a person having his place of residence in Canada for five years after having been admitted as a landed immigrant. The significance of domicile is related to deportation. Landed immigrants without domicile are liable to deportation on a number of grounds, including commission of criminal offences and gaining initial entry illegally or fraudulently. Landed immigrants with domicile are not and, of course, landed immigrants who have requested and have been granted Canadian citizenship are not. While not wishing to see eligible immigrants request Canadian citizenship simply to protect themselves against possible deportation, the Committee is unaware of any valid reason for retaining the concept of Canadian domicile and believes that it is reasonable to offer inducements to encourage landed immigrants to acquire citizenship. It feels that landed immigrants should have certain rights to remain in Canada, including the protection from deportation provided by the powers of the Immigration Appeal Board to grant special relief for humanitarian reasons. But these rights should not be inalienable as they are for Canadian citizens. It therefore recommends that the concept of domicile be deleted from the Immigration Act.

Temporary Workers

136. In Canada, employment visas (usually called "work permits") can be issued to persons who wish to work in Canada on a temporary basis at jobs for which Canadians or landed immigrants with the necessary skills are unavailable for the time required. The employment visa system is designed at the same time to preserve job opportunities for Canadian citizens and landed immigrants and to meet employers' needs for temporary labour which cannot otherwise be filled. Included in the 87,341 work permits issued in 1974 were many different categories of workers—managerial, supervisory, and technical staff on training cycles in international corporations; entertainers; seasonal agricultural and factory workers; domestics; working "visitors" who secured many sorts of casual employment; and others.

137. The Committee was impressed with a number of submissions which expressed concern that certain categories of temporary workers can be exploited by being relegated to unattractive jobs, receiving low wages, working under poor conditions, and being ineligible for social benefits. Witnesses also stated that temporary workers can suffer psychologically from being isolated from their families, perhaps unable to speak the language or understand their rights, and from disillusionment on having to return to economic hardship after becoming acquainted with standards of living in Canada.

138. On the other hand, the Committee noted that protections and safeguards have been instituted in an attempt to ensure that wages and working conditions are at least of a standard deemed adequate for Canadians. Moreover, as a study commissioned by the Law Reform Commission of Canada observed, foreign workers are under no coercion to come to Canada and they are usually satisfied with the arrangement because Canadian wage levels are attractive to them (0240). The Committee recognizes that even during periods of high unemployment in Canada, there will continue to be a need for temporary and particularly seasonal workers in Canada. It therefore concerned itself with trying to identify where the problems lie.

139. Twelve per cent of temporary workers now come to Canada on special programs worked out with their governments. Jamaica and Mexico are the principal countries involved, and from contacts which Committee members have had with these governments it would seem that these arrangements are satisfactory to them.

140. Apart from a few hotel workers, most are seasonal agricultural workers who return to their families and do not expect to settle in Canada. Since they come forward under an inter-governmental agreement, the terms of work and remuneration are specified in detail, enforcement is more comprehensive than Canadian migrant workers enjoy, and the worker has recourse to the assistance of authorities of his country in Canada if his contract is not fully honoured. The Committee believes that these arrangements under which temporary workers come to Canada are satisfactory.

141. Some criticism expressed in testimony seemed to be based on the incorrect assumption that Canada has a "guest worker" program similar to those in a number of countries in Western Europe. While there may be cases in which several extensions to a work permit are granted, the Committee understands that most temporary workers stay for fewer than 200 days and that in 1974 over a third were in Canada fewer than 90 days. The situation with "guest workers" is quite different, and the Committee strongly opposes any movement in that direction in Canada. In this connection some witnesses, including the Canadian Labour Congress, advocated full Canadian compliance with the terms of I.L.O. Convention 97.* The Committee does not disagree, but notes that the Convention is really intended to protect "guest workers" who work in a country other than their country of citizenship on a regular and long-term basis. The Convention is not designed to protect temporary workers, but the relevant provisions should be observed where practicable.

* A Convention concerning migration for employment which came into force in January 1952 and provides protection for migratory, but not for temporary, workers.

142. A serious complaint was made that Canadian employers have sometimes misrepresented workers' prospects when recruiting them. The Committee was given details of the unfortunate plight of textile workers from Colombia, some of whom gave up regular jobs to come to work in a mill at Louiseville, Quebec. The market for the company's products declined, and after a relatively short stay in Canada, the workers were released. The Committee believes this situation illustrates the danger of bringing workers on temporary work permits to fill positions which are not genuinely temporary and which should be filled by Canadians or landed immigrants. The Department of Manpower and Immigration must insist that work permits are issued only for genuinely temporary needs.

143. There is a corollary to this position. Where a persistent need for labour arises which Canadians are demonstrably not willing to fill in a specific locality, it should be possible, in conjunction with the provincial authorities, to identify the need, allot points for designated occupations, and find immigrants abroad willing to do the work—providing that the wage offered is comparable to that paid for the same job in similar communities in Canada.

144. A suggestion was made by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association that a temporary worker who loses his job should have a period of grace to enable him to arrange his affairs before being required to depart, or to find another job acceptable to Manpower officials (34:40). The Committee agreed courtesy requires that a temporary worker should have a reasonable time to arrange an orderly departure. But it was felt that, while a seasonal worker should be able to take a similar alternative seasonal job in the same locality with the approval of Manpower authorities, it would be inconsistent with the concept of a temporary work permit to allow a person to seek alternative employment as a means of extending his stay.

145. The Committee concluded that when filling labour needs for which no Canadians are available, or which Canadians are demonstrably not willing to meet, either now or in the reasonably foreseeable future, the emphasis should always be placed on immigration. It recommends that:

- foreign workers be recruited only for jobs that are genuinely temporary in nature, either because of the nature of the work or because Canadians being trained for the job are not ready;
- temporary workers be issued distinctive social security cards;
- extensions to work permits be granted only in exceptional circumstances;
- more regular and thorough inspection and enforcement of wages and working conditions be carried out in areas under the federal government's jurisdiction and that provincial governments be encouraged to do the same in their jurisdictions;
- greater efforts be made to persuade provincial or local authorities or union locals, whichever has the jurisdiction, to take a more generous approach to the matter of trade certification and apprenticeship of immigrants and so lessen the need for temporary workers;

—an advisory board be appointed, representing the federal government and all provinces in which foreign workers are employed, to protect the rights of those workers;

—temporary workers not be obliged to pay unemployment insurance premiums because they are not eligible to collect benefits.

146. With regard to visitors the Committee agreed with the sentiment expressed by a study for the Law Reform Commission that "visitors should visit, not work" (0240) and recommends that no one be permitted to apply for work permits from within Canada. This would discourage visitors coming in the hope of finding work and staying.

147. The Committee found that the "waiver list" of categories of foreign workers who are permitted to accept jobs whether or not there are Canadian citizens or landed immigrants available is in need of revision. Specifically, it recommends that primary and secondary school teachers be removed from the list, and that the other categories be examined to ensure that the list continues to serve the purpose for which it was designed. It also supports the Government's stated intention to remove the special income tax exemption clauses for teachers when re-negotiating tax treaties with the countries now covered by such provisions.

148. It was brought to the Committee's attention that many temporary workers, while in Canada, gain experience and a familiarity with Canadian society which could make them particularly adaptable and attractive as immigrants. For those temporary workers who desire to become landed immigrants the Committee recommends that when being evaluated abroad their past success in Canada be given recognition in points assigned for "personal assessment." However it is opposed to allowing temporary workers to apply for landed immigrant status while in Canada.

Foreign Students

149. The Committee agrees that Canada should continue to welcome foreign students. It endorses the opinion of the National Union of Students that "The diversity of backgrounds which (foreign students) bring to Canadian universities enriches the cultural milieu" (0110). Study in Canada is consistent with Canada's endorsement of policies of free movement of people and ideas, and enables us to share our specialized skills. And the Committee recognizes that Canadian students studying abroad outnumber foreign students studying here. It feels that study in Canada enables young people to learn about and develop positive impressions of Canada.

150. If these benefits are to continue, however, the Committee believes that energetic action is required to combat abuses, and to this end recommends that all students be required to obtain valid student visas before arriving in Canada. However, the Committee believes that present regulations should be relaxed in one particular: the visa should be valid for the length of the intended period of study in Canada, subject to an annual report to a Canada Immigration Centre with proof that the student has qualified for the next year's program.

151. The Committee notes widespread parental and student anxiety that a large number of foreign students may be displacing some qualified Canadians from many universities and professional schools. In fact, however, the 1974 foreign student enrolment of roughly 32,000 represents less than six per cent of the more than 560,000 total student enrolment in full-time post-secondary education. But, surprising as it may seem, neither the federal nor provincial governments have foreknowledge of or control over the numbers of students accepted by educational institutions in Canada.

152. The Committee believes that there is need for closer scrutiny of colleges and schools accepting foreign students since there is evidence that some institutions are being used simply as a device for gaining entry to Canada. The Committee also suspects that some schools are attractive less for the specialized training which they offer—hairdressing is a case in point—than for the opportunity to work legally or illegally in Canada. The Committee recommends that the federal government seek the cooperation of the provincial governments in devising ways to prevent these and similar abuses.

153. The Government of Quebec, in its submission to the Committee, complained that it did not know how many foreign students were enrolled in provincially supported educational institutions. A system of accreditation, combined with fuller exercise of powers which the provinces now have to limit the number of foreign students any institution can accept would better enable the provinces and the institutions to respond fairly to the needs of both domestic and foreign students.

154. The Committee considered sympathetically the argument that all foreign university students, after successfully completing one year of study, should be permitted to compete for work on an equal basis with Canadian students during the session recesses. It was not easy for the Committee to reach a decision. Under current regulations, students are permitted to work only if a Canada Manpower Centre certifies that no Canadian is available for the job in question. The only exceptions to this rule are students whose jobs are integrally related to their course of study.

155. Committee members recognize that foreign students often need work to finance their course of studies just as Canadians do, that Canada does not want only wealthy foreign students, and that it is demoralizing for a student to be inactive during the recess. Some Committee members felt that since the number of foreign students seeking work is small in relation to the number of Canadian students, granting foreign students the right to compete equally for work would not significantly endanger Canadian students' opportunities and would bring other benefits. However, a majority of the Committee concluded that at times of high unemployment—when Canadian students experience difficulty finding jobs—the present regulations should be put into effect.

156. It has been suggested that inquiries by foreign students about possibilities for work are normally rejected out of hand. The Committee urges that Canada Manpower Centres be directed to extend their services more positively and sympathetically to foreign students seeking work during their recesses.

157. A foreign student appearing before the Committee argued that spouses of students should be admissible to Canada and allowed to work. The Committee appreciates the hardship of enforced separation in the case of married students, and accordingly recommends that spouses of persons on student visas be admissible and be permitted to work while those persons are studying in Canada.

158. Several submissions proposed that foreign students should be able to apply for landed immigrant status while in Canada. The Committee has taken the general position that aliens should not be able to change their status while in the country, and is particularly strong in its views in this instance. It favours a generous approach to foreign study in state-supported institutions as a form of international assistance; this would be undermined if foreign students were not encouraged to return to their homelands. Study in Canada should be for its own sake, and not be a way of immigrating to Canada.

159. A special problem was brought to the Committee's attention by the National Union of Students and a South African student. If foreign students cannot seek landed immigrant status while in Canada, must they go back to their homeland if there has been a change of government and they are in danger of imprisonment or other punishment on their return? The Committee believes existing arrangements or proposals discussed in this Report in the section on refugees are adequate to deal with this problem. It calls attention to the fact that Section 15 of the Immigration Appeal Board Act enables holders of a student visa to appeal any deportation order on just such grounds.

Services for Immigrants

160. During its hearings the Committee received considerable testimony concerning immigrant services and the inadequacy of present arrangements. Most of the services required by immigrants fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces and cities or are provided by voluntary agencies. However, the Committee agrees in part with an Italian immigrant living in Montreal who said: "If Canada decides to accept immigrants, it is Canada's moral obligation to see to their needs and to make sure they do not fall into isolation or become alienated" (16:49).

161. Because so few services for immigrants are the direct responsibility of the federal government, and will in any event not be provided for in the new Immigration Act, the Committee dealt rather briefly with this subject. It does not wish to imply however, that the problems are not serious and in need of urgent attention.

162. Fortunately many problems requiring counselling and settlement assistance have been handled by the members of ethnic communities already established in Canada, and private and public agencies have striven to meet many new needs. But there are serious problems of coordination. As the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services said: "the system which we have is basically a fragmented system, . . . a policy has to be evaluated in terms of closer contact between government departments and the voluntary agencies in serving the immigrants" (33:45). The Committee urges the Department of Manpower and Immigration to give increased attention to the planning, development, and coordination of immigrant services and proposes that the federal government organize tri-level consultations with the appropriate provincial and municipal authorities, using as a model recent tripartite meetings on urban problems.

163. The immigrant's first contact with Canada is normally made in the immigration office abroad. Many submissions dealt with the problem prospective immigrants experience in securing adequate and accurate information. While some witnesses proposed a variety of pre-arrival services from language training to orientation, the Committee believes that all that is essential is good and accurate information and counselling to ensure that an applicant is making an informed decision to immigrate to Canada. Other preparation is of dubious value since only the very exceptional individual will retain information until he is face-to-face with the need for it.

164. The Committee did not have an opportunity to witness counselling abroad, but some members have observed post-arrival counselling procedures at Canada Immigration Centres. The Settlement Branch is directed mainly to helping the family breadwinner find a job and includes language training, rental assistance and small loans where needed. These particular services appear to be well organized and effective, at least in the larger centres.

165. Some immigrants and their families need additional services to adjust to life in Canada and to participate fully at work and in the community. Adequate and consistent funding is crucial for the success of immigrant settlement and service agencies. While the federal government brings immigrants to Canada, jurisdiction over immigration is shared with the provinces, who also benefit from the talents and skills of newcomers. Many witnesses involved in immigrant service organizations advocated federal government funding of private reception, settlement, and social service programs and agencies. The YWCA of Metro Toronto said, "[Funding is needed] particularly to help coordinate the activities of teachers, public health nurses, manpower centres and all other groups who help immigrants but who work in isolation from each other and are not aware of the services needed and available to their clients" (0114). The Committee advises that the federal government should review and expand its programs for support of voluntary agencies.

166. Three areas of services to immigrants were identified by the Committee as warranting special concern.

—As the Toronto School Board, the Board with the largest number of immigrant children, observed, 40 per cent of all immigrants are children, many of them accustomed to different cultures and languages than those found in Canada. There are already some shared-cost language programs for adults. In view of the special needs of many immigrant children, the Committee supports the principle of a federal contribution to the extra cost of educating immigrant children who require special training in English or French or other catch-up programs, providing these funds are clearly earmarked for the school systems.

—Attention was also directed to the particular plight of immigrant women, and especially wives and mothers. When they are not in the work force they have little opportunity to learn the language and make personal contacts, advantages enjoyed by their husbands and their school-aged and working children. Many of them remain in the home isolated by language differences, and can become estranged from the community and even from their own families. It was pointed out that language training is the single most important need of these women. The Committee is aware that federal funds are made available to the provinces to finance courses organized through the adult education division of the schools. But Committee members gained the impression that not enough attention has been paid to this program by the responsible authorities and recommends that it be reviewed.

—A special problem brought to the attention of the Committee was the difficulty faced by immigrants from different cultures in coping with the Canadian legal system. Professor Frederick Zemans of Osgoode Hall and the Director of the Parkdale Community Legal Services said that immigrants often need special help with consumer and tenant rights, and with women's rights in marriage breakdown situations. The Committee agrees with a Toronto lawyer who suggested that licensed paralegal personnel should be trained to work in immigrant communities because "immigration consultants", frequently untrained travel agents, now working in these communities often give improper advice, overcharge, and take on hopeless cases (10:5-6). The Committee is concerned about these practices and suggests that the federal government consult with the provinces with a view to introducing some regulation in this field. The Committee further feels there is need for a concerted program to develop information, counselling and referral services in major immigrant communities.

167. Many submissions received by the Committee suggested that if Canada's record of successful multicultural adaptation is to be maintained, more attention must be given to the development of programs related to cross-cultural and inter-racial understanding. The Newfoundland Government (30:81) and Dr. André Raynauld, Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada (15:11), for example, believe there is a need to assess the nature and extent of intergroup tensions and to examine the likely impact of future immigration on community relations. The Committee concurs. Should an assessment show a need for significantly expanded national, community, and school programs to promote inter-cultural harmony, the Committee believes the federal government should explore with the provinces ways of encouraging and implementing such programs.

168. The Committee also considers that a federal Human Rights Commission with responsibilities for conciliation, public education programs, and the enforcement of human rights legislation would help to ensure fair and just treatment of racial and ethnic minorities. Human rights laws and multicultural education are essential if intergroup harmony and understanding are to be achieved.

Departmental Organization

169. The Committee received a variety of suggestions for separating Immigration from Manpower and combining it with other related functions of government. Typical of these was the proposal of the Canadian Association of Social Workers that "immigration could be better handled by a department . . . which could emphasize such cultural and social aspects of immigration as settlement services, citizenship and multi-cultural programs" (0208).

Others advocated maintaining the present link with Manpower.

170. The Committee was divided in its opinion. All members recognized the heavy burden borne by the Minister of the present Department, but while some felt this justified separating the two branches, others argued that Immigration would be the weaker and accorded to a junior and therefore, less influential Minister. Again some felt the link with Manpower led to exaggerated importance being attached to employment considerations, to which others replied that immigrants come essentially to improve their employment opportunities, and the link ensured the necessary collaboration between the two branches. There were other suggestions as well, that a new Department be established, called Immigration and Population, or that immigration be closely linked to regional development in order to put emphasis on human settlement.

171. Of the several proposals put to the Committee, the one which attracted most support was that Immigration be detached from Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission and instead be linked with citizenship, multiculturalism and population to form a new portfolio. It was felt this represented a rational grouping of federal responsibilities, and a Minister with such a portfolio could expect to carry considerable weight in the Cabinet. Also, there was a widespread feeling that serious efforts should be made to strengthen the settlement services within the Immigration Branch.

Federal Provincial Cooperation

172. Federal-provincial cooperation is an area where the Committee feels substantial changes in practice are required. Vigorous efforts are needed to involve the provinces more closely in order to ensure that immigration policy reflects varied regional requirements. The Minister advised the Committee that he is committed to doing this, and it is apparent that serious efforts in this direction are being made. Quebec, the only province with an immigration act and an immigration department, is far ahead of the other provinces in assessing its needs and making them known at the federal level. The Committee is aware that the federal government would welcome other provinces following Quebec's example and hopes that collaboration will develop along the following lines:

—a permanent joint federal-provincial committee to coordinate the development and implementation of immigration policy including a consultative mechanism for identifying "designated communities" and for elaborating deportation and "required to depart" procedures; —a provincial presence in immigrant selection; this could involve sending officers abroad for counselling and promotional duties under arrangements similar to those provided by the Lang-Cloutier and Andras-Bienvenue Agreements between Ottawa and Quebec; —collaboration on the scrutinizing teaching institutions receiving foreign students and on fixing the numbers of foreign students accepted by each institution;

—cooperation on immigrant services beginning with a joint evaluation of needs as requested by an ad hoc committee formed by Toronto Mayor David Crombie (041).

173. The Committee paid special attention to the political problem faced by Quebec as a result of the decisive fall in the fertility rate in the last 15 years. In the past, the high fertility rate of French-Canadians had compensated for the consistently small francophone immigration to Canada. To forestall a decline in the size of the French-speaking population in Canada, Quebec has found it necessary in recent years to look abroad more actively for French-speaking immigrants or for immigrants who more readily integrate into the French-Canadian community.

174. The Committee has received submissions from various groups and individuals on this subject. It has also been made aware of communications from the Government of Quebec to the Government of Canada, and has heard, in camera, two senior officials of the Quebec Department of Immigration.

175. The French fact is an essential element in the political and cultural life of Canada. Therefore, the Committee agrees that to the economic, social, and other considerations which normally enter into the formulation and application of immigration policy must be added a concern for the maintenance of the French-Canadian presence in healthy and thriving condition. The Committee realizes that this goal cannot be achieved primarily through immigration policy. But it considers that the Government of Canada should not refrain from any reasonable effort within the limits of its jurisdiction which could contribute to the realization of this objective. For instance, the Committee would approve of increased activity to encourage immigration from Latin American countries because people with a Latin cultural background usually integrate easily into French language communities in Canada.

The Statute and Regulations

176. Under the present system, immigration law comprises mainly statutes enacted by Parliament and regulations introduced by the Government from time to time under the authority granted by the Immigration Act. The Committee sees no alternative but to maintain a balance between a basic act which establishes the framework of principle and regulations which set out the procedures for putting the principles into effect.

177. However, as the Green Paper admitted, "the essential criteria governing admissions to Canada are dispersed through the [present] Act and Regulations [somewhat haphazardly]. This makes it unnecessarily complicated for anyone who merely reads the Act to grasp the fundamental principles and conditions that surround the admission of immigrants and non-immigrants" (Green Paper I, p. 66). Therefore, the Committee recommends that a new Immigration Act contain in its initial provisions a clear statement of principles and objectives including those pertaining to admission, non-discrimination, sponsorship of relatives, refugees, and the prohibition of certain classes of persons. Operational details and procedures should be specified in regulations. These should continue to be published in the Canada Gazette, and presented as well in a form readily accessible to the public and available to prospective immigrants. Significant changes in regulations should be explained and defended before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration; where possible this should be done before they are put into effect. The Committee objects to the practice of in effect issuing regulations in the guise of confidential departmental directives.

178. The Committee noted that Minister's Permits were used in more than 16,000 instances in 1974 to supercede in special circumstances certain provisions of the Act and regulations; many of these were for refugees. With the new Act there may be considerably less need for recourse to Minister's Permits. Nevertheless, the Committee wishes to see the discretionary power provided by Minister's Permits retained because it allows for an element of flexibility sometimes needed to ensure humane treatment of exceptional cases.

Respectfully submitted,

Maurice Riel,
Joint Chairman

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 12, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Honourable Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem in the Chair.
Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Paul Henry Lucier, Esquire, has been summoned to the Senate.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons, which was read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and was seated:

Hon. Paul Henry Lucier of the City of Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. William J. Petten.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENTS BY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT—CANADIAN PRESS REPORT

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of privilege affecting not only Progressive Conservative senators but the Senate as a whole.

The matter arises out of statements made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate outside the chamber and reported, over the weekend, by the Canadian press. Let me quote the parts of this news report which are relevant to the question with which I wish to deal.

Senator Perrault is quoted as having said:

1. "The Senate will take action within ten minutes to investigate the Giguère affair if Opposition senators demand it."

2. "But, no specific allegation of wrongdoing has been made by any Opposition senator or M.P."

Referring to Mr. MacKay, the Progressive Conservative who sits in the House of Commons representing the electoral district of Central Nova and who presented on behalf of three Canadian citizens the petition which gave rise to this whole matter, Senator Perrault is reported to have said:

3. "He has yet to make an allegation or one specific accusation."

4. "Conservative senators have not even mentioned the issue publicly."

5. "Speaking on behalf of Senator Giguère, Senator Perrault said that a full inquiry would be welcomed, but that no action had been taken by the opposition senators to request such an inquiry."

Honourable senators, these words of Senator Perrault's are pregnant with innuendo, and I cannot allow them to go unchallenged.

When Senator Perrault says that an inquiry will be started within ten minutes if the members of the Opposition in the Senate so request, his statement gives rise to the several following questions:

Are we to assume that the Government Leader is of the opinion that a matter such as the one at hand should be of concern only to the senators who sit in the Opposition?

Should not the matter which seems to be involved here preoccupy all members of the Senate?

Do not the Leader of the Government and all members of the Liberal majority consider that they have equal responsibility in seeing to it that a matter such as this is thoroughly gone into?

Just what is the Leader of the Government trying to suggest? Is he trying to suggest that the silence of the Official Opposition in the Senate on this matter last week is to be interpreted as our not thinking that an investigation into this matter is warranted? Or is the Government Leader insinuating that the Official Opposition would be happier were there not to be a thorough and complete investigation into the matter?

Was all this an attempt on the part of the Government Leader to provoke the Opposition in the Senate into requesting a Senate inquiry so that the government party could then turn around and accuse us of witch-hunting? Or is it the Government Leader's opinion that a committee of the Senate, composed necessarily of a Liberal majority, would be better equipped than any other body to investigate possible criminal matters which involve several people other than Senator Giguère?

Is the Opposition justified in concluding—when Senator Perrault, "speaking on behalf of Senator Giguère," invites a complete investigation—that the Government Leader is already satisfied that Senator Giguère was involved in absolutely no wrong-doing?

Senator Perrault's statement of last weekend has given rise to so many and to such important questions that I now find myself compelled to make our position in this matter very clear.

A petition was presented to the House of Commons on November 3 last praying that the whole matter of the renewal in 1972 of a lease held by a firm known as Sky Shops Export Limited for the operation of a duty-free shop at Dorval Airport, including the part played by Senator Louis Giguère therein, if any, be fully investigated.

On November 4, Senator Giguère made a statement in this house giving his version of the part he is supposed to have played or not played in this matter, offering at the same time to answer any questions which senators might wish to ask him in connection with his participation, if any, in this whole matter.

As Senator Perrault is quoted as having said, and quite correctly, the member of the House of Commons who presented the petition on behalf of three Canadian citizens has made no allegation nor any specific accusation against our colleague.

According to press reports, Senator Giguère's parliamentary office—and that is another problem—his Montreal office and his domicile were searched by the RCMP. This would seem to suggest that some sort of an inquiry has already been launched into this matter.

We of the Official Opposition in the Senate are of the opinion that the problem appears to concern not only Senator Giguère, but also several other persons. The Senate, up to now, has been invited to examine only the participation of Senator Giguère in this whole matter. That would represent only one aspect of the question.

The declaration made in the Senate by Senator Giguère on November 4 at no point and in no way constitutes prima facie evidence of any action contrary to the Senate and House of Commons Act, or to the Criminal Code.

The Official Opposition in the Senate is, therefore, of the opinion that the only appropriate way to deal with this matter is by means of a judicial inquiry. Such an inquiry, if it has not already started, should start immediately and should cover all aspects of this matter.

At this time, the Official Opposition in the Senate considers that it does not have any evidence to justify an inquiry by the Senate or one of its committees into the part played in this matter by Senator Giguère.

The Official Opposition in the Senate also fears that were an inquiry by a committee of the Senate to run parallel to a judicial inquiry, this might well result in certain conflicts and would certainly involve useless duplication of effort.

● (2010)

If, following a judicial inquiry or otherwise, evidence is brought to light implicating our colleague in some serious wrongdoing, and consequently involving the privileges of the Senate, the Official Opposition will immediately request that the Senate or a committee thereof be seized of the question and directed to determine what the Senate can and should do about it.

In the meantime, the Official Opposition in the Senate refuses to become the accomplice of any who would want an unjustified charge to be made against Senator Giguère, or of any who would like to see the matter buried prematurely.

[Senator Flynn.]

I would like to add that Senator Perrault should be much more prudent when he tries to counsel the Official Opposition on how to conduct its business.

I have the sneaking suspicion that when Senator Giguère read the Canadian press reports concerning what Senator Perrault had said over the weekend, he probably ended up saying to himself, "God, deliver me from my friends; my enemies I can look after myself."

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in that line of thoughts inspired by the untimely statement of Senator Perrault, I remembered Lafontaine's fable titled "L'ours et l'amateur de jardins".

You remember the bear who wanted to chase a fly away from the head of his companion and threw a paving stone at it, killing both the fly and his friend at the same time.

Lafontaine concludes that one is better off with a wise enemy.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I note with a great deal of enthusiasm the statement which the Leader of the Official Opposition has finally made on this subject. I think we all appreciate hearing this evening what in the main has been a thoughtful contribution to the dialogue concerning the matter of the Sky Shops Company and its leases and our honourable colleague, Senator Giguère.

I must say at the outset that long ago I lost my simple, childlike faith in the capacity and ability of the media to faithfully transcribe in accurate detail everything said by any of us who are in public life. In saying this, however, I want to assure honourable senators that I am not retreating into the rather predictable and commonplace political defence that "I was misquoted." Some of the quotations are accurate, but they are necessarily incomplete. My remarks, made over the weekend to the media, were made during a very hectic meeting with some of my political associates during which we were discussing important matters of state and party. My views were designed to provide reassurances to members of the media, some of whom have been critical of what is alleged to be lack of interest or action on the part of senators, regardless of party, in what they appear to believe is an important matter of public concern. In the course of explaining the position of the Senate on this matter, I reminded them that Senator Giguère had made a rather complete statement about his personal position, and that he had said, and here I quote from page 1348 of Senate Hansard:

I never asked any member of Parliament, senator, cabinet minister, or any official of the government, to favour any request by Sky Shops Export Ltd.

He went on to say:

There was never any conflict of interest... If, however, some honourable senators believe that there is, or was, any conflict of interest on my part, I would welcome an inquiry by an appropriate committee of the Senate, and I would be pleased to appear before such committee.

I reminded the media of those remarks of Senator Giguère. I said that under our system of parliamentary democracy a senator had made a statement offering to appear before a committee of the Senate, but that as yet no senator on either side of the house had made any allegations of wrongdoing, because, perhaps, an investigation was under way. I said that without any evidence of wrongdoing by Senator Giguère, the issue had not been raised by members of the government and that if there were doubts in the minds of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition they should raise them, but I said that no one had made any allegations as yet. This is precisely what was said. I did not at any point say that I was speaking on behalf of Senator Giguère, who is totally capable of speaking on his own behalf.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the government leader if he said "because an investigation was under way"?

Senator Perrault: Yes, I said that to the media.

Senator Flynn: I don't know that I am reassured that what happened last Friday was in relation to an investigation.

Senator Perrault: I said that an RCMP investigation was under way. In the course of this evening I hope to provide some details.

I made the point to the media that Senator Giguère had made his statement to the Senate concerning an alleged stock transaction involving certain shares in the Montreal-based company, Sky Shops Export Limited. I reminded the media that the senator had invited an inquiry into his alleged actions and had offered to appear before a Senate committee. I said that, as yet, no one in Parliament had made any accusations against the senator, but I observed that there appeared to be a great many innuendos around. I said I rather regretted the fact—and I must admit this—that there seemed to be some people who day by day appeared to prefer having further innuendos circulated by the media than to having the type of investigation which would enable the facts to become known. You know, for some there may be certain publicity advantages, which I am unable to fathom, associated with this process of circulating innuendos. I stated that as yet no motion calling for an inquiry had been made from any quarter in the Senate. I said that if any such motion were made in the Senate, the government would act as quickly as possible to have the matter referred to the appropriate committee for an investigation.

Senator Flynn: The government?

Senator Perrault: Well, I think the honourable senator knows what I mean. The government would support such action in the Senate and I do not think that any member of this chamber would disagree with that position. I did suggest that there appeared to be a predilection for some—and I had reference to certain spokesmen primarily in the other place and certain people in the media—to day by day make available and circulate certain additional alleged information concerning the transactions of Sky Shops Export Limited and the senator. With some justification one might assume that in some quarters at least there appears to be a greater interest in the propagation of new innuendos each day and the attendant publicity in the media than there is in an objective discernment of the facts. However, I agree with what the honourable senator said this evening, that the proper course of action is for a thorough investigation to be made of the available documents and any other relevant material. To assist the process, anyone with information should come forward immediately and make it available to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is my view that after an analysis of the evidence has been made, the government may well have to consider whether there should be a judicial inquiry or whether to refer the findings of the investigation to the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec for him to consider the laying of charges.

In any event, it is my understanding that the following is the sequence of what has happened so far. On November 3 of this year Mr. Elmer MacKay, the member for Central Nova, presented a petition to the House of Commons, as the honourable Leader of the Opposition has stated. On November 5, Mr. MacKay sent certain documents to the Solicitor General of Canada, who, I understand, reviewed the documents the same day and immediately referred them to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for further investigation. The record shows that there is no basis in fact for the suggestion that somehow there has been any "cover-up" or inordinate delay by the government.

● (2020)

I understand that on the following day, November 6, the RCMP were authorized to conduct a search of Senator Giguère's Senate office and his office in Montreal. In this connection, other important questions arise, as the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has stated. The search warrant was signed by a justice of the peace in Montreal. On November 7, the search of Senator Giguère's offices took place.

In this whole process the government has held nothing back. All available information has been turned over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There has been no limited "in-house" investigation; there has been no attempt to confine the investigation to the efforts of any governmental department.

Honourable senators, it is my belief that if any wrongdoing is discerned, the appropriate and proper action will be taken by way of a judicial inquiry and the evidence and material will be turned over to the Attorney General of Quebec.

I agree with the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that at that time, when the facts become known, we may be called upon to investigate any matters which may relate to our colleague and to this chamber.

Senator Flynn: I wish to thank the Leader of the Government for his statement, because, in effect, he agrees with the position I have taken and has absolved the Opposition of exclusive responsibility in this matter.

Senator Perrault: I wish to add further that I think the Opposition in this place acts very responsibly most of the time.

UNITED NATIONS

CONDEMNATION OF ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I rise on an urgent and pressing matter and ask leave to move a motion, seconded by Senator Walker, in the following terms:

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted for the honourable senator to move his motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Croll: The motion reads:

That the ganging up in the United Nations of member countries from Africa in particular, and from other parts of the world, to bring about the adoption of resolutions in the United Nations which are contrary to the principles inherent in the charter and which are unjust to the nations against whom they are directed is dangerous to the continued existence, even survival of the United Nations.

And further that in the opinion of this house the iniquitous resolution passed by the United Nations Assembly last weekend against which Canada cast its vote which denounced the State of Israel as a racist nation is, in the opinion of this house, unmerited, untrue and deserving of the unqualified condemnation by this house and by all peoples who believe in freedom and world peace.

This motion, in those terms, was presented this afternoon in the other place by the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker and was unanimously accepted by the House of Commons without debate. I ask that the motion be adopted by the Senate in a similar manner.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I support wholeheartedly the resolution, but may I be permitted to ask if the sponsor would change two words in his motion? In the beginning of his motion he uses the words "ganging up", which could be construed as meaning gangsterism. I do not think that is an appropriate term to use in the Senate; it is unparliamentary.

Senator Croll: Those are the exact words used in the other place. I did not make any changes. I thought that would be the best way to handle it.

Senator Flynn: Is it in the form of a motion?

Senator Croll: Yes.

Senator Flynn: I thought it was being treated as a Notice of Inquiry.

Senator Croll: I said at the beginning that it was a motion.

Senator Flynn: It is just a matter of form. I thought it would be better in the form of a motion.

Senator Croll: I did make a motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I would ask the honourable senator to give me a copy of his motion. What I have here is a Notice of Inquiry, but the honourable senator has referred to it as a motion. I thought it would be better made when we reached Notices of Motion. However, leave has been granted, so it is in order.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I share the opinion of Senator Croll. When I read this in the papers my first reaction was one of disgust. There is nothing real in it. However, I also share the opinion of Senator Bélisle that "ganging up" is not a proper Senate expression. I think that should be altered; we should find a more appropriate expression which means the same thing.

Senator Bélisle: Joining up.

Senator Flynn: Aligning.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): In my experience of political life I have had occasion to meet all kinds of people from different countries. I have always been able to get along with all of them. I say most humbly that in my opinion the words used in the United Nations—their expression, their motion and their action against the Jewish people—were completely out of order. They concerned a nonsense that has never existed. I hope the Senate will unanimously share the opinion suggested in Senator Croll's motion, which motion should have been presented, I think, by another senator, one who is not of the Jewish faith. However, that is another matter.

Senator Rowe: Did I understand Senator Croll to say that these were the exact words used in the motion in the other place?

Senator Croll: Yes, I did.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

PARLIAMENTARY IMMUNITY—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

It is my understanding that on the basis of a search warrant issued by a justice of the peace—

Senator Flynn: We are not at the Question Period yet.

Senator Prowse: This is not a question; it is a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I understand that the Honourable Senator Prowse is rising on a point of order. Is that correct?

Senator Prowse: Yes, on a point of order.

Senator Flynn: On a question of privilege?

Senator Prowse: A question of privilege, if you like that better.

Senator Flynn: There cannot be any point of order.

Senator Prowse: I think we will get along more quickly if we just let it go at that.

On the basis of a search warrant issued by a justice of the peace in the province of Quebec a search was allowed of the office of a member of the Senate of Canada within the last two or three days. Regardless of all the other matters that may have been referred to earlier, I think it is incumbent on this house to stand up right now and make something very clear to everybody, namely, that no one has the right to search my office or any other office in this house. Nobody, except a committee of this house, has the right to issue an order to search a senator's office or, if a member of the other place is concerned, a properly appointed committee of that house. We are not subject to provincial law. We are not subject to federal law, except where we bind ourselves. It is a breach of the independence of Parliament that anybody should be permitted to go into my office, your office, or the office of any other member of Parliament and search private papers, without an order of the particular house, after a proper inquiry has been held by a committee of that house.

● (2030)

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, my honourable friend is generally correct in what he says, but I do not think he is quite correct this evening. In respect of anything to do with the civil law, a writ cannot be served here. The sheriff has no place in this house. If it is a criminal matter—and this does involve a criminal matter—we have not the same sanctum; we have not the same immunity. There is a very distinct difference.

My honourable friend, a learned lawyer, will be one of the first to appreciate that.

Senator Prowse: With all respect, honourable senators, I do not want to draw this out but most of us are old enough to remember—and Senator Walker certainly is—that just after the war there was what was known as the Gouzenko affair. There was a member of the House of Commons by the name of Rose. The courts of this country thought it very important, in the circumstances that were then being investigated, that Rose should be required to appear before the courts. But they could not touch Rose as long as he stayed within the precincts of the house.

An Hon. Senator: No, no.

Senator Prowse: Yes, it is true. The house itself then dealt with that difficulty by denying members the right to stay in the building past midnight.

There are ways of dealing with things, but there are also ways of maintaining rights. There is no way, in a civil or federal matter, that a justice of the peace in Quebec can issue an order against a member of Parliament, as I happen to be—a member of the Senate from Alberta, who is resident in Ontario—for him to answer for anything. As a matter of fact, I do not think even a justice of the peace in Ontario can so require me as long as I am in this house, unless I willingly submit to the jurisdiction—which I might choose to do.

Let us not permit for one moment the rights and independence of a free parliament to be whittled away by becoming, all of a sudden, very magnanimous because we want to look well. Let us deal with our problems as they ought to be dealt with—properly, fairly and with justice.

An Hon. Senator: And legally.

Senator Prowse: And legally, but not by this kind of arrant nonsense.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I have been here all weekend and yesterday, which was an official holiday. I have been disturbed about the matter that has been referred to by Senator Prowse.

I had prepared a question relating not to personalities but to parliamentary orders and procedures. I wonder, as this subject has been introduced here now, if I could have unanimous consent to ask the question now rather than in the normal place on the Order Paper?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Has the honourable senator leave to ask his question now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order raised by my honourable friend a moment ago—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Order, please. Senator Benidickson requested leave to ask his question now because it relates to the subject raised by Senator Prowse. After Senator Benidickson has asked his question, then I will allow Senator Fournier to make his comments, unless he wishes to raise another point of order or question of privilege. If Senator Fournier merely wishes to comment on the question of privilege raised by Senator Prowse, I will allow Senator Benidickson to carry on with his question first.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I gave notice of this question to a number of senators, who showed some concern about happenings over the weekend adjournment that we read about in the newspapers. I gave a copy of my proposed question this afternoon to the Leader of the Government and to the Leader of the Opposition and to several other senators.

It now has to be amended slightly. I was going to say, "I understand a search warrant was executed last Friday." Well, we have heard already this evening, in discussion between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government, that indeed a search warrant was executed within the precincts of the Senate on Friday, November 7, 1975, and I was told that Senator Giguère did not object.

Indeed, my question does not involve the personality or the personal position of my colleague, Senator Giguère, because I am informed that he consented, in this instance, to the entry to his office.

Therefore, I would question the Leader of the Government upon points of established parliamentary practices.

1. Whether police searches can be made in the offices of members of either of the Houses of Parliament without warrant?

2. Whether the procuring of a warrant to make such a search entitles authorities to search the office of a member of this house or the other house and seize documents in the process?

3. Upon whose authority in this instance was an application for a search warrant made?

4. Could a private citizen obtain such a warrant in the course of

(a) a civil proceeding?

(b) a criminal proceeding?

5. What precedents, if any, are there for an office search of a member of the Parliament of Canada?

6. What privileges or immunities apply to members of both houses with respect to search for and seizure of documents?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, naturally, certain developments this past weekend have been of concern to many of us. Certainly it has been of concern to me, as Leader of the Government. So, I have had a rather intensive investigation under way with respect to those events and to a number of questions raised by honourable senators.

Before I provide what I hope will be some enlightenment on the situation, I suggest that it may be very appropriate to refer the question of senatorial immunity and associated questions to the appropriate committee of the Senate. I think it may be of real value to have those questions studied by an appropriate committee when it is feasible for us to do so.

Senator Prowse: Why not now?

Senator Perrault: Certainly one fact emerges from the incidents of the weekend: there are questions in a number of these areas about how far police authorities may go with respect to searches of offices in the Senate and in the other place.

With your permission, I have a short statement which describes the weekend incident and the sequence of events in so far as I have been able to ascertain the facts.

● (2040)

On Friday, November 7, 1975, at approximately 9.30 a.m., four men dressed in business suits entered the Senate entrance of the Parliament Buildings and asked the constable in charge if they could see Her Honour the Speaker. The constable asked for their names and telephoned the Speaker's office. The Speaker's secretary, Mrs. M. Boulay, told the constable that the Speaker would see them if he would bring them up to her office, which he did. In the Speaker's office Inspector Stamler of the RCMP explained to the Speaker that they wanted to search Senator Giguère's office, and showed her a search warrant issued at the Court House, Montreal, on November 6, 1975, by a Justice of the Peace in and for the Province of Quebec. Attached to the search warrant was an endorsement issued by a Justice of the Peace in and for the Province of Ontario authorizing the execution of the warrant within the judicial district of Ottawa-Carleton.

The Speaker invoked the parliamentary privilege of senators, whereupon the Inspector replied that it did not apply in this case.

The Speaker then called the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod and when he arrived in her office, after having been told of the object of the visit by the inspectors, he suggested that Senator Giguère be called by telephone at his Montreal home. The Speaker readily agreed to that suggestion. Black Rod telephoned the senator, who told him that he knew all about the search warrant. He said that in fact the police were already searching his home and his Montreal office. While I understand that he did not give specific approval for a search, he did not raise any objection to his Senate office being searched, because he believed it to be almost, in effect, a fait accompli.

While the inspectors were in Senator Giguère's office, in the presence of Mr. Walter Maheux, Chief of the Senate Protective Staff, Black Rod went to the office of the Clerk of the Senate and showed him the search warrant. The Clerk then asked where the inspectors were, and was told that the search was in progress in Senator Giguère's office.

The Clerk immediately called Mr. R. L. du Plessis, Acting Assistant Law Clerk, who came to his office, and together they examined the text of the search warrant, looked up the Criminal Code sections referred to in the warrant, and took note of the description of the documents that were the object of the search. Black Rod left to go back to Senator Giguère's office, but the Clerk took from him the search warrant that he had and left it in the custody of the Law Clerk. A few minutes later Black Rod informed the Clerk that the search was completed and that the inspectors were leaving the building.

Precedents quoted in the authors—that is, May's Parliamentary Practice, Eighteenth Edition, pages 89 and 90, Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, Fourth Edition, at page 43, and Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, citation 103(1)—refer to arrests on parliamentary premises, and the authors all agree that the privilege is not claimable for criminal offences.

In the present case—that is, entry into a member's office by the police—the most recent precedent is found in a question of privilege raised in the House of Commons on September 4, 1973, by Miss Flora MacDonald, member for Kingston and the Islands, and I would refer you to page 6179, House of Commons Debates, 1973.

Miss MacDonald's question of privilege concerned the fact that on the preceding Friday her parliamentary office was visited on two occasions by members of the Ottawa City Police Force and the RCMP, without first having sought an appointment, or without the Speaker's permission or that of his staff. It was agreed that Miss MacDonald had a prima facie case of breach of privilege, and that the motion to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections should be put without debate. The motion was agreed to.

On September 21, 1973, the committee reported to the house—and I would refer you to page 567 of the Journals of the House of Commons, 1973-74—that it had held eight meetings and had adduced evidence from seven witnesses and had agreed to make the following observations and recommendations:

1. It is well established that outside police forces on official business shall not enter the precincts of Parliament without first obtaining the permission of Mr. Speaker who is custodian of the powers and privileges of Parliament.

2. The testimony heard by the Committee discloses that outside police forces while on official business, obtained entrance to the West Block and proceeded to the office of the honourable Member for Kingston and the Islands without having obtained the permission of Mr. Speaker. Accordingly, the Committee must find that the question of privilege of the House of Commons is well founded.

3. The Committee however is of the opinion that the police forces in question acted in good faith. This Committee therefore respectfully recommends to Mr. Speaker that he remind the outside police forces and the security staff of the House of Commons of their respective obligations in this regard, and that no further action be taken.

In the matter directly concerning the Senate—that is, the search made in Senator Giguère's office—a search warrant had been issued. I have been advised that the RCMP did obtain permission from the Speaker, the senator concerned was notified and raised no objection, and the Chief of the Senate Protective Staff was present in the senator's office while the search was being conducted.

Honourable senators, having given that statement to you, I have no doubt that other questions will arise, and, insofar as I am able, I will certainly obtain replies to them and to the number of questions already asked this evening by Senator Benidickson.

I still believe, however, that the question of immunity and the right of search are of grave and fundamental importance to the Senate.

Senator Benidickson: To both Houses of Parliament.

Senator Perrault: These and associated questions should be referred to an appropriate committee at the earliest opportunity so that there is no doubt at all about what constitutes parliamentary immunity and its limits, and whether these apply to the Senate in the same way as to the other place.

Senator Walker: Would the Leader of the Government put on record the appropriate sections of the Criminal Code to which he referred earlier, or has he already done so?

Senator Perrault: Yes, if possible, this information will be placed on the record.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, without intending to interfere in any way, may I say that in my opinion this is too important a matter to be allowed to drift even for a moment. I would ask leave of this house to move that this whole matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for investigation and report at the earliest opportunity.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to state that I hold the same views as those expressed by the Leader of the Government. Our sources of information are obviously alike. With respect to the definition of the immunity of members of the Senate, their immunity has always been extended to civil matters, but not to criminal matters as such.

With regard to the procedures which should be followed in circumstances such as those which existed on Friday last, it would seem to me valuable for the Senate to have a committee draft some regulations which would guide the Speaker and the staff of the Senate henceforth. The point is that if the procedure which was followed last Friday were to be used for other purposes, real problems concerning the immunity and freedom of action of members of Parliament might well develop.

For those reasons I am in accord with Senator Prowse's motion to refer the matter to a committee. I have no particular committee in mind at the moment. Senator Prowse mentioned the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, whereas Senator Langlois mentioned a committee on privileges and elections. However, a committee on privileges in the Senate would involve the whole Senate.

Senator Langlois: Yes, but we could form a subcommittee.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is true. Perhaps the appropriate thing now is to leave the matter until tomorrow at which time the Leader of the Government can move a formal motion, either creating a special committee to deal with the particular problem or referring the matter to a standing committee such as the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the constructive remarks which the Leader of the Opposition has made, and also Senator Prowse's proposal that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, or some other committee. Indeed, I am prepared to bring a motion forward tomorrow to that effect, if it seems the most appropriate way in which to proceed.

● (2050)

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I do not like mentioning such things, but at this particular moment I can think of three precedents within my time in both chambers when the police came in under one circumstance or another, and I think that before we jump into these questions those precedents ought to be presented for our consideration.

I share the view that on both occasions this was handled rather awkwardly but, on the other hand, when we are dealing with criminal matters we had better be a little careful.

Senator Flynn: That is what I said.

Senator Croll: So let us give the matter a little thought. I think the leader ought to make sure that all the precedents are presented to the Senate before we are asked to make any decision.

Senator Flynn: When the Leader of the Government puts his motion tomorrow he can bring them to the attention of the Senate, and the learned senator can also give us the benefit of his memory if he so wishes.

Senator Croll: Senator Forsey may be able to help.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I am waiting to hear the honourable gentleman. I have a couple of minor questions that I would like to ask.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Does the Honourable Senator Forsey have a question to ask on the particular matter that is before the Senate at the moment, or will he wait until we reach the Question Period?

Senator Forsey: Arising out of the statement that has been given to us, honourable senators, there are just one or two details which, on account of my hearing infirmity, I may not have caught.

Did the Honourable Leader of the Government mention the sections of the Criminal Code that were concerned? Because if so, I did not hear them.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall certainly undertake to provide any sections which are in the transcript.

Senator Forsey: I hope that if this matter is investigated further, whether by the Senate as a whole, or by a committee, two things will be investigated particularly: One is this business of Senator Giguère having raised no objection. If I got correctly what the Leader of the Government said, it was that Senator Giguère raised no objection because the thing was already a fait accompli. If this is so, then I do not think this particular failure to raise an objection is very material.

The other question I would like to see investigated is whether, in any event, the consent by a senator to have this done in fact takes away the privilege. Is it an effective waiver of the privilege, or is it not?

Those are the things I would like to have enlightenment on, whether from the Senate as a whole, or from whatever committee investigates the matter.

Senator Perrault: I can only say that in my discussion with Senator Giguère I believe that he stated that he was contacted while the law officials were in his office and asked whether he had any objections. He said that really there was no point in entering an objection because in fact the search had virtually been accomplished, or was about to be accomplished.

A number of questions are inevitably going to arise, however, and if such is the mood and feeling of the house I shall undertake to bring in an appropriate resolution tomorrow so that the questions of immunity and search can be discussed further here, and then, perhaps, again in committee.

Senator Denis: I want to know, honourable senators, if they were in the senator's office or in Madam Speaker's office.

Senator Flynn: In the Montreal office.

Senator Denis: He said it was a fait accompli as far as Montreal was concerned, but was this so as far as Ottawa was concerned?

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I got the impression when the Leader of the Government was speaking that it was from the Speaker's office that Senator Giguère was contacted, not when the law officials concerned had already entered his office. I also got the impression—and I am putting this as a question—that the honourable senator concerned did not at any time give his approval, but did say, as I understood the statement made by the leader, that there was no point in registering an objection at that stage because it was un fait accompli.

I must confess that like Senator Forsey I do not understand the significance of un fait accompli at that stage.

Senator Perrault: May I simply go over the transcript again? Black Rod telephoned the senator, who told him he knew all about the search warrant. The senator was in Montreal at the time. He said that, in fact, the police were already searching his home and his Montreal office. While he did not give specific approval, he did not raise any objection to his Senate office being searched, because it is my understanding that when the call was put to him in Montreal the police officials were already in his Senate office.

Senator Denis: In his Senate office, but not in his Montreal office.

Senator Perrault: I must say that this is open to interpretation, and I do not want to place yet another interpretation on it.

Senator Asselin: I would like to know what answer he gave to Black Rod when he was called in Montreal. Did he say he had some objection to the search, or did he say, "I have nothing to say"?

Senator Perrault: I can only attempt to recall my conversation with Senator Giguère this evening. I discussed it with him, and made some notes because there was some doubt in my mind. I said, "Did you in fact raise an objection to your Senate office being searched?" He said, "I raised no objection. There was little point in doing that because they were already there."

Senator Asselin: In his office in the Senate?

Senator Perrault: Presumably in his office, or outside the office. Apparently he gave no specific approval for a search; but, honourable senators, I suggest that he must speak for himself when he is back in the chamber. That, however, is all the information I have.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, one point occurred to me during the narration of the events that led up to, and resulted in, the search of Senator Giguère's office. Before the departure of the searching officers, was any report made to anybody in authority—the Speaker, the Clerk, or Black Rod—as to what, if any, documents were taken from Senator Giguère's office, and as to the nature of such documents or material?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am simply unable to provide an answer to that question. The statement I have given to the chamber really constitutes all the information I have. I think it is a rather imprudent and dangerous procedure to try to interpret the document beyond any explanations I have given.

Senator Denis: I would like to ask just one more question. I would like to know if an accusation has been made against Senator Giguère, or is it only a matter of a search warrant in connection with an inquiry? Is he accused of a criminal offence or a civil offence—or is it only a matter of an inquiry, which would be quite different.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, I would like one question taken into consideration by the Leader of the Government, and that is with regard to the statement by the inspector, or whoever he was, from the RCMP, who apparently told the Speaker that this was a different position, and that he had the right to make the search. The first thing that I want answered is: Where did he get that advice, and why did he think he was free to tell Her Honour that?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, insofar as I have any information, I do not believe there are any charges of any kind against Senator Giguère. There are none that I know of.

Senator Prowse: No, but there may be against other people.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wish to make a comment, though I hesitate very much to do so, because in the presence of so many authorities of such long experience I feel a great deal of humility. It seems to me that a warrant could not have been obtained without some reason having been given, and this should be an essential part of our inquiry into the matter.

Senator Walker: It goes further than that, honourable senators. The relevant sections of the Criminal Code are set out in a search warrant, so obviously it must have been a criminal matter that they had under consideration. The immunity we have in civil matters is not available to us in criminal matters.

Senator Perrault: It is my understanding that the appropriate sections were in fact set forth in the warrant.

Senator Walker: They must have been, or the warrant could not have been issued.

Senator Smith (Colchester): With deference, if I may again enter into the discussion on this point, my comment is not as to whether the appropriate sections of the Criminal Code were in fact included in the warrant. I think that another appropriate section of the Criminal Code, and of the criminal law generally, provides that before any justice of the peace can issue any search warrant he must have certain information before him. And that information, contained in whatever documents were put before him, or even if it was verbal evidence on oath, is an essential portion of the information which ought to be before this house when it makes its inquiry, if it does make an inquiry.

● (2100)

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Reid had been substituted for that of Mr. Railton on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND, (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Department of External Affairs for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of External Affairs Act, Chapter E-20, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of letters addressed by the Prime Minister of Canada to Provincial Premiers relating to Foreign Ownership of Land, dated September 5, 1975.

Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Thursday, November 13, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

CELEBRATION OF SILVER JUBILEE IN CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on Wednesday, October 29, Senator Forsey asked a question with respect to the Queen's Silver Jubilee and how it will be celebrated in Canada. He asked whether the government had made or is making any preparations for celebrating the Silver Jubilee of the Queen's accession. In response to Senator Forsey's question I should like to inform the house that the government is aware of Her Majesty's accession to the Throne.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Forsey: Congratulations.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must say I am just as surprised to read those words as you are to hear them.

Senator Forsey: These bureaucrats are wonderful!

Senator Walker: Is this a quote from the Prime Minister?

Senator Perrault: May I say that there appears to be an accidental omission in the reply which was prepared for me. The reply should note, of course, that the government is aware that Her Majesty's accession to the Throne occurred 25 years ago, and it is the government's intention to see that suitable celebrations will take place to mark the anniversary of the occasion.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to say with respect to the postal dispute that I have been informed this evening that workers at 92 locals across the country are now back at work.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: And there are hopes for improved postal services in the near future.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 6, the debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment.

Hon. Josie D. Quart: Honourable senators—

Senator Croll: Happy birthday!

Senator Quart: It was on Saturday. You are a couple of days late. I am now 80 plus a couple of days.

Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill C-25, as I understand it, is to provide a mechanism for screening, and the authority to control, new and existing substances dangerous to the environment and hazardous to health. The idea is to prevent harmful contamination and associated problems from arising, by submitting suspicious substances to identification and analysis.

This legislation is intended to go beyond the abatement of pollution to the stage of catching suspect chemical substances which are about to enter or have entered the environment. Having the authority to demand information, the government would be able to control existing and new chemicals and, presumably, to avoid environmental pollution. In other words, the approach here is supposed to be preventive rather than curative. And in that way it is reminiscent of the Food and Drugs Act, though it does not seem to carry with it the authority of that act, and this may eventually prove to be the aspect that will render it ineffectual.

We have recently recognized that certain substances, while they are of some value, do represent significant dangers. I refer here to mercury and DDT among others. My only reason for supporting a bill of this type is that I can think of no other way to ensure that substances which at the outset are quite legitimately thought to be beneficial do not end up by doing us all in.

● (2110)

We owe it to ourselves to know more about the long-range effects of the chemicals we produce and put to use. We need protection. Yet, on the other hand, we must not allow a government bureaucracy to become unduly inquisitive and overbearing. A balance is required and I wish to emphasize that. A balance must be struck when considering the hazards associated with a product, and the need for that product. There is nothing intrinsically evil about chemicals. They can be extremely useful and beneficial. So, it is imperative, in our crusade to protect ourselves from possible ill effects, that we do not end up completely frustrating technological experimentation.

It becomes binding, therefore, upon those entrusted with implementing this law to be able properly to identify early in the process those chemicals which represent a real danger. To this end, information is required—the testing, researching and analyzing of data must be carried out. These are the prerequisites of competent control. This act, as originally introduced, failed, unlike the Food and Drugs Act, to place the onus on the manufacturer to monitor his products for potentially hazardous substances, preferring to rely almost totally on government initiative.

The Opposition made some suggestions for amendment. They were not all accepted, but one was. As a result, an amendment was made to clause 4 of the original bill. Now manufacturers must notify the minister of all new substances within three months of their manufacture or import. The government is also authorized to require the manufacturer to supply information on these new substances, but this falls short of what we would like to see. Reporting the existence of a substance is definitely not equivalent to monitoring a substance and disclosing potentially hazardous side effects. If all we can rely upon is the voluntary disclosure of information with regard to potentially dangerous side effects, then we do not really have a very forceful and effective means of pre-marketing control. Rather, we have something akin to a toothless tiger, a bit of window dressing, a mere pretence of serious concern on the part of the government. The Food and Drugs Directorate before allowing a drug to be marketed first requires of the manufacturer that he supply evidence that the drug will really do what he claims it will do, and, secondly, if it is taken in the method suggested by the manufacturer, that it will have no harmful side effects. All these claims must be solidly supported by evidence—proof of instances where the drug has been used and shown to be effective and not to cause harmful side effects or, at least, unmanageable side effects. In this bill, as far as testing requirements are concerned, there is no provision for vetting the industrial testing techniques to be used in order to ensure their adequacy. Even if they required testing, the government has not provided for upgrading the research facilities which would permit it realistically to assess the information.

There are many unknowns in connection with new substances—cumulative effect, persistence, reaction in conjunction with other chemicals, side effects, by-products and waste disposal characteristics. Knowledge of these factors depends on a good research program. But where is it? How will the government judge the potentially hazardous quality of new chemicals without an independent research facility specifically geared to that purpose? If it cannot do that properly and effectively, how can it really provide the preventative protection that this bill, it is claimed, will supply? Without adequate provision for the supportive functions that will give this legislation teeth, such as upgraded research facilities and appropriate testing criteria and techniques, it is difficult to see how this piece of legislation will have the comprehensive “preventative” effect it is meant to have.

Another problem presents itself: The provinces have expressed concern that the legislation will supersede provincial legislation in the field. The federal government has replied that the bill is intended to fill gaps and reinforce rather than replace existing law. As in many other pieces of environmental legislation where jurisdictional complexities impinge on the objective of the legislation, the desire to gain acceptability both by provincial governments and by other federal agencies has resulted in a watered-down piece of legislation with few teeth and many ambiguities. The relationship of this law to other laws is not clear. If consultation with the provinces must take place every time to see if another law is better equipped to deal with the exigency, delays may ensue before steps can be taken to remove a hazardous substance from the environment.

All these shortcomings considered, I am pessimistic as to the ultimate worth of this piece of legislation. However, I am in agreement that we should protect ourselves against pollution. I am in favour of our adopting preventive measures, because I realize it is easier and certainly less painful to prevent than it is to cure. I am equally in favour of placing the burden for preventing environmental disasters and health hazards on those who produce potentially dangerous substances, but what troubles me is that the method used in this bill involves creating a larger and more interfering bureaucracy. That always represents additional dangers to personal freedom and to our free-market economic system. It appears, however, to have become a necessity.

The judicial system seems not to provide the protection I, as a layman—or a laywoman—would have thought it did. That saddens me, because it tells me that somehow big business, with the help and protection of big government, has over the years created for itself a legal sanctuary. As a result of that, it has become next to impossible for the taxpayers of this land to sue those who pollute for the full value of the damage they cause. I think this is unfortunate because the judicial system would have been the proper way of solving such problems. With heavy enough judgments against polluters, manufacturers would have been a lot more careful about polluting in the future, but that has never really happened. Whether by accident or design, the judicial system has proven inadequate. As a result, we are forced into an interventionist, statist attempt at a solution, which frightens me. But pollution frightens me more, so I will support the bill.

My intellectual dedication to consistency forces me to request that this bill be sent to committee, where some of the weaknesses I have underlined can be looked at more closely and an attempt can be made at further improving it.

● (2120)

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Macnaughton speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all very much indebted to Senator Quart for her thoughtful and worthwhile contribution to this rather important bill.

Far be it from me, an amateur, to attempt to answer some of those questions, because I propose, in due course, to move that this bill be referred to the appropriate committee, where the honourable senator may again ask her questions and receive authoritative answers. I would like to say that we all appreciated her contribution this evening, and I congratulate her, at this late stage, on her birthday which, I understand, took place a few days ago.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA—REPORT REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-30, to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada, which was presented Thursday, November 6.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, we have a rather odd, or, should I say, unusual situation in relation to this bill. It was my intention this evening to explain the nature and substance of the amendments which were made in committee. In the process, I would have referred briefly to the very capable explanation given by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West).

However, in the meantime a serious question has arisen. At the time the bill was before the Senate committee there was no evidence of any kind adduced in relation to the proposed title of the bill, or to indicate any opposition to the title. I am not in a position to give the circumstances which led to that situation, but I have learned that there are serious grounds which should be reviewed by the committee to determine whether, in the circumstances, the name "Continental Bank of Canada" should be granted.

The question of procedure involves some consideration. I could proceed this evening to give an explanation of the purpose and effect of the proposed amendments, which would not take very long.

I understand a motion is to be made to refer the report back to committee for consideration of the propriety of the name of the bank in all the circumstances as they may develop before the committee.

The question is: What should we do? In my view, the motion to adopt the report tonight should in no way lose its prior position by virtue of the motion which may be made, if it is approved and the bill goes back to committee.

I should add that I have no interest in the name of the bank and no personal objection toward affording those who have an interest—and a very serious interest, as I appreciate it is—an opportunity to be heard, even at this late stage of the proceedings.

If the report is to be referred back to committee, it should be so referred only on the subject matter of the propriety of the title, and I suggest that when the report of the committee dealing with the title comes forward, the report which is now before us should not lose its proper position under our rules, and that both reports should be considered at the same time without regard to the requirements of our rules in connection with the time lapse between the presentation and the consideration of a report.

I am in the hands of the Senate. If honourable senators require an explanation of why the amendments were made, I am prepared to do so tonight, or I am prepared to deal with that after the committee has considered the title and brought in its report. I could then give one explanation of the committee's reports in relation to this bill.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not know if a motion will be put, but it seems to me that the proposal of Senator Hayden is entirely acceptable. In my view, the motion should be that the report be not now adopted but that it be considered only after the bill has been referred back to committee for consideration of the name of the bank and the presentation of a second report.

Senator Hayden: While preserving the prior position.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: At this time I would like the position clarified.

Senator Flynn: No motion has been put. I understand that a motion will be made.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I thought that Senator Hayden had asked that his request be adopted.

Senator Flynn: No, not yet.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I am not certain about the procedure to be adopted in connection with Senator Hayden's request. I call upon Senator Lang.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I move in amendment, seconded by Senator Inman, that the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further consideration of the bill in respect of the name of the proposed bank.

In my opinion, Senator Hayden has given sufficient explanation of this motion to satisfy the house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that the report be now adopted. In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Inman, that this report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further consideration of the bill in respect of the name of the proposed bank.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Rowe: I take it from what has been said that Senator Hayden will not be called upon tonight to give any clarification, but will bring the whole report back in one package.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, as the sponsor of the bill, might I ask for the indulgence of the Senate for just a moment to say something that I think must be said in view of the remarks made by Senator Hayden, the chairman of the committee, that the Senate feels this is an amendment that should be adopted.

The sponsor of a bill sponsors the bill, not the applicant or the company. However, in the course of getting information about this rather complicated measure, I was bound to be advised of some of the problems the applicants face. One of these problems has to do with the time element. To put it neatly, it is desired to have this bill, if possible, receive royal assent before the Christmas recess. Under normal circumstances, if the amendment had not been moved tonight, we would probably have had the report of the committee adopted, and then it would have been open to the sponsor, myself, to move third reading at the next sitting, which normally I would have done. Tomorrow there will be what we might call a combined report of the committee. Our rules preclude me from moving third reading tomorrow. We will not sit Friday; we will not sit Monday, and I could not move third reading without unanimous consent until Tuesday.

I do not ask for the Senate to make any conditions about this matter, but it may be that tomorrow there will be a question whether or not something might be achieved on behalf of the applicants if unanimous consent could be given to third reading tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Not in advance.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not want to do it in advance; certainly not. All I want to say is that there is a factor which I think the Senate might want to take into consideration if that contingency arises.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to the amendment and to the suggestion that certain rules as to time would be understood to be waived if Senator Lang's motion passes.

Last Thursday mine was the only voice that refused unanimous consent to take a step that would have accelerated the speed with which this bill would pass in the Senate. I told everyone that I had no animus against the sponsor or the proposers of the bill. That is still my position.

Yesterday I too was approached, because these people had heard of my activity the week before, to speak as Senator Lang did tonight, to have the bill referred back to committee for the purpose of hearing complaints about the use of the name and decide whether or not they are substantial. I said I did not want to do so because I had no real interest, and I might be doubted in my remarks of last week in committee when it met on Thursday last, the proceedings of which have now been printed. They were made available and were in our hands this morning. If honourable senators are at all interested in the points I raised in committee last week about the purchase by the principal corporate shareholder of IAC of a substantial number of additional shares within a few weeks of the presentation of this bill to Parliament, that is the responsibility of each and every senator.

In case, as a result of my actions last week, some protest comes to me about abridging the rules and we are asked not to compact the two reports, I would not for a moment propose that we deny Senator Hayden his opportunity to compact the rules so far as a combination of the two reports is concerned in time. However, I would reserve my right to say on third reading, if there should be some good reason for it, that we might expect the bill to have the usual lapse between adoption of the report and third reading.

Senator Flynn: I think Senator Benidickson has indicated that it is always better to follow our rules unless there is a very clear reason why we should not do so.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 13, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of a contract between the Government of Canada and the Municipality of Buctouche, New Brunswick, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970 (French text).

PRIVATE BILL

CONTINENTAL BANK OF CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, November 13, 1975.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred back for further consideration the Report on Bill S-30, intituled: "An Act to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada", presented to the Senate on November 6, 1975, has in obedience to the order of reference of November 12, 1975, re-examined the said Report and recommends its adoption by the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hayden: I move that the report be adopted now. This is not a new report, but a continuation of the report made about a week ago. With leave of the Senate, I should like to give the explanation at this time.

Senator Flynn: After the motion has been put.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by Honourable Senator Bourget, that this report be taken into consideration now. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hayden: The first part of this report was the subject matter of some discussion last evening and then was referred back for further consideration by the committee only with reference to the name of the bank which appears in the bill as "Continental Bank of Canada."

I should tell you at the outset that the substance of the amendments contained in the original report was mainly such that they would fall into the category of drafting amendments. The scheme of the bill as proposed by the petitioner—that is, by IAC—was for the incorporation of a bank. IAC at that time was in the position where it might be called a non-bank—that is to say, it did not have the assets and resources of the nature or kind that would permit it to be incorporated as a bank. The plan of the petitioner is to incorporate a bank, and in subsequent years, as it sheds the assets which prevent it from qualifying for the right to apply to be incorporated as a bank, the bill provides for an amalgamation as between IAC and the bank.

● (1410)

We examined these provisions very carefully. In the interest of clarity and proper relationship to the Bank Act and the Canada Business Corporations Act, both these acts had to be looked at in the light of this bill, because there were many clauses in the bill under which at the present time, if the provision to incorporate a bank is granted and this bank is incorporated, the petitioner would not be able, by reason of the conditions in the Bank Act, to become a shareholder to the extent that it wishes to become a shareholder and to do other things it is seeking to do in the operation of this bank, which, strictly speaking, would be operated as a bank.

The bill provides that within a period of ten years there might be an amalgamation of IAC and this bank to be incorporated. Therefore, over that period of time IAC would have to so adjust its holdings so that its capacity within the ten years would be such that it might be described as having the necessary qualifications and characteristics of a bank, so that then these institutions might be merged.

In the meantime, in order to accomplish the amalgamation and to have this period of time within which this can be done, it was necessary to incorporate many exemptions, for the time being, from the provisions of the Bank Act, such as, for instance, IAC holding in excess of ten per cent of the shares of the bank at a time when it would be the only shareholder of the bank. The bank itself would carry on within the provisions of the Bank Act, and only as permitted by the Bank Act, if the minister granted his approval to the carrying on of the business of a bank by Continental Bank of Canada within a year from the date of incorporation.

The bill also provides for what happens if approval by the Minister of Finance is not given. You then have a bank which is incorporated as a bank. What is it if it does not have the power to carry on the business of a bank? All the subscription moneys to this bank would have been provided by IAC, so they would want to take their money out of this shell of a bank, since it could not, in those circumstances, carry on the business of banking without the approval of the Minister of Finance.

In considering the amalgamation provisions we had to see that they were clearly related to both the Bank Act and the Canada Business Corporations Act. We also had to check very carefully that the references were clear and concise and, without any confusion as to the respective authorities, what IAC could do and what the bank could do within this period. That necessitated some amendments. It also necessitated breaking down some of the clauses in the bill for the purpose of clarity in understanding what was being intended by the clauses in this bill.

That is the purpose of the amendments contained in the original report. The only point that you might regard as of substance is the provision that if the consent of the minister is not given within a year to the carrying on of the business of a bank, then at least the shareholders of the bank may carry on all the necessary proceedings and meetings and vote the shares in order to distribute and return to those who made the subscriptions the moneys which had been subscribed. That is subject to all proper deductions, of course, for expenses.

This morning, acting on the reference from the Senate of last evening, we considered the question of title. The title in the bill is "Continental Bank of Canada." We heard the representatives of the Continental Bank of Illinois and representations from the petitioners for the incorporation of this bank. We concluded that no confusion could result from the circumstances that were disclosed to us. It appears, for instance, that in the United States at the present time there are at least 12 banks operating under names such as Continental Bank of Texas, or Continental Bank of some other state, which seem to operate without confusion. Secondly, the Continental Bank of Illinois carries on no business directly in Canada and we were trying to determine what could be said by way of possible confusion as between this bank proposed to be incorporated in Canada and the Continental Bank of Illinois, which is a very substantial bank with many branches in the United States, and which operates in many different parts of the world. Also, in various parts of the world there are other banks which operate under a name which includes the words "Continental Bank."

We also discovered that before the petitioners for incorporation of this bank settled on a name they considered a list of approximately 50 names, and made all the eliminations which they thought should be made from the list. They then consulted with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to which, in the ordinary way when it is proposed to incorporate a company, the name is submitted for approval. There was no objection on any basis that could be related to confusion, or the public's being deceived in any way as to with whom they are dealing. So they have done all these things, and exhausted all these possibilities.

In addition, I should point out that the Continental Bank of Illinois is a customer of, or extends credit to, IAC, which is the petitioner in respect of the incorporation of this bank. While the Continental Bank of Illinois does not carry on business in Canada, it does have, through a subsidiary Ontario company, certain business operations in Canada. It finances by that method certain building and other operations in Canada.

[Senator Hayden.]

So, in the light of all the foregoing, and after an acknowledgement from the parties concerned that they had received a full and extended hearing of all their presentations, your committee concluded that they should report the entire bill, including the title, without amendment, other than the amendments which are contained in the original report.

Motion agreed to, and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

● (1420)

Senator Connolly: Honourable senators, for reasons I gave last night, and having regard to other information I have been able to gather today concerning the time factor in respect of the work of the House of Commons, I intend to ask for consent to third reading now.

May I also say that if the report had been adopted last night, I could then have moved third reading for today. So we are in no different position now from that in which we might have been had there not been the reference back to the committee last night. Therefore, if the Senate is agreed, I will move third reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ANTI-INFLATION POLICY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY LEGISLATION

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and report upon the subject-matter of the Bill C-73, intituled: "An Act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada" in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

Senator Flynn: You wish leave?

Senator Langlois: With leave, yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: I regret that I must refuse consent but I should like to have an opportunity to look into this matter. I do not think any prejudice will result from having this matter taken up on next Tuesday.

Senator Langlois: I wish to give notice of this motion today, then.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 18, 1975, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put I should perhaps give the house the usual brief summary of what is expected for next week. I shall deal first with the committees.

On Monday there will be a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region at 3.30 p.m., and at 8 p.m. the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet.

On Tuesday there will be a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service at 11 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet at 2.30 p.m. to continue its study of the Green Paper on Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest. A meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which has been referred Bill C-25, the Environmental Contaminants Bill, will also be held on Tuesday, but the time has not yet been fixed. The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has scheduled a meeting for eight o'clock on Tuesday evening.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. but it has not yet been decided whether it will consider Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, or continue its advance study of Bill C-60, the Bankruptcy Bill. Also on Wednesday it is expected that there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which have been referred supplementary estimates (A), but the time has not yet been set.

On Thursday a meeting of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has been called for 11 a.m., and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 3.30 p.m.

In the Senate on Tuesday evening, Senator Hayden will move the second reading of Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No.2), and we will proceed with the other items on the Order Paper and any legislation that may come to us from the other place.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the deputy leader referred to meetings of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. I understand that that committee is dealing with matters which have been referred specifically to it, but not with Bill C-52 which I further understand was referred by the other place to this committee. However, we have not received the messages yet. In the second place, am I correct in my understanding that the deputy leader mentioned a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the supplementary estimates (A) have been referred—or did he say they will be referred?

Senator Langlois: They will be referred.

Senator Flynn: But they have not yet been referred?

Senator Langlois: There will be a motion made today in that respect. With regard to Bill C-52, we are awaiting a motion which was apparently passed in the other place yesterday. It appears that we will have to present a similar motion of concurrence in this house before the bill is referred to the joint committee in question.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1976.

Senator Asselin: It is getting more expensive all the time.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

PARLIAMENTARY IMMUNITY—STATEMENT BY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday I gave a commitment that an endeavour would be made to advance a motion today regarding senatorial immunity, the right of law enforcement officials to search Senate offices and the question of guidelines for senators and Senate officials in relation to privileges and immunities within the precincts of the Senate.

I can report today that I have had a useful and constructive discussion with the Leader of the Opposition. It is proposed that a motion be presented next week, hopefully on Tuesday, with respect to the matters which I have just mentioned, if that is satisfactory to honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—QUESTIONS

Senator Cameron: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government can give us any information about the present situation with respect to the completely inexcusable postal strike which is dragging on and on. Has anything new or encouraging turned up? Can he give us any information as to what the government proposes to do about this disruption of Canadian business?

● (1430)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can report that as of this afternoon in excess of 100 post offices have been reopened across the country, involving 622 workers. There are approximately 8,000 postal stations altogether, so there is still a long way to go. This total involves both small and larger post offices. Progress is being made—not as rapidly as many of us would desire, but nevertheless progress is being made. It is hoped that at some point in the near future the union leadership will permit a secret ballot to be held in centres across the country, and it is felt that this might lead to a favourable vote by the workers. However, I have nothing further to report.

Senator Asselin: Is there any hope of a reopening of the negotiations soon?

Senator Perrault: The minister responsible for the Post Office made a statement today that he is still waiting for the union to call the members back to work, but he made no offer to reopen negotiations on the terms demanded by the union involved. As senators are aware, the government and the unions have resolved all non-monetary differences. The only matter left is in relation to dollars and cents—

Senator Flynn: Common sense.

Senator Perrault: —and the government is not going to violate established guidelines and precedents inherent in its last offer.

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, we have had strikes before all over this country, and when they lasted too long, and began to paralyze the economy, the government intervened and very quickly introduced legislation ordering the strikers back to work. This strike has been going on now for three weeks. Is there anything preventing the government from legislating these people back to work? If so, what is it? And if there is not, why should not the government take those necessary steps?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think Senator Choquette realizes that in view of this type of situation and at this point in time it is not possible for this or any other government to divulge the contingency plans it may be developing. I can certainly assure honourable senators that there is no intention on the part of this government to allow the economy to be endangered or destroyed by any one sector of society.

Senator Choquette: But it is being destroyed.

Senator Perrault: The government is fully aware of the grave consequences of a prolongation of this dispute and impasse, and ways of dealing with the situation are being studied.

Senator Inman: May I ask the Honourable Leader of the Government if the post offices he has mentioned are distributing post offices in the sense that they serve the outlying areas, or are merely local post offices?

Senator Perrault: The main centres such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver are still out. Should the workers at one of those main centres return to work, this would, of course, represent a significant breakthrough.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, may I address a further question on this subject to the government leader? There have been some conflicting press reports as to whether the striking workers are receiving compensation or not. I recall one report saying that they were paid during the time that negotiations were going on. There have been other reports saying that they are still receiving some compensation. Could the Government Leader clarify the picture?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: There was a question in this chamber last week relating to whether or not postal workers had received what, in effect, represented an advance payment for work not done. The answer to that question really is that because of the manner in which the computers are programmed, cheques are sent out on a ten-day basis, and it is the intention of the government to recapture any overpayment from the workers when they ultimately return to work. In other words, there will be no net overpayment, and there will be no payment by the government for work not done. This will be reflected in later payments.

As far as other aid for the workers is concerned, some of the leaders of the postal union have stated that the workers are being helped insofar as they are able to help them. What this constitutes in terms of dollars and cents I am unable to say.

Senator Flynn: May I ask a supplementary question? For some years the question has been before the government and Parliament, and indeed before the public, that some permanent legislation should be enacted to deal with these strikes which affect the public. I was wondering, in view of the fact that in the present instance the union refuses to submit the government's proposals, which are final, to a vote, whether in this legislation which I hope the government will have the courage to introduce in the not too distant future there should not be a provision which would enable the government to force the union leaders to submit any proposal made by the government, or any other agency or group, when the public is affected, to the union membership in order to know whether the strikers are willing to accept it, so that we do not have to rely only on the opinion of the leaders of the union.

Senator Perrault: I think we all find it difficult to understand how any democratic organization in this country can reject the idea of having a secret ballot on such an important matter. Yet this has been the pattern across this country where the leadership of this union, in what I suggest to be a most irresponsible fashion, has refused to allow the members to exercise their democratic right to a secret ballot. The votes which have been taken in a number of centres have been standing votes, or votes by a show of hands, with all of the possible intimidation inherent in these processes. I can assure honourable senators that the government is considering the Senate's suggestion as one of the possible options for action.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: By that I mean a proposal which would give the workers in the Post Office the right to exercise their choice by secret ballot under properly supervised conditions. While no decision has been taken, this is one of the alternatives under study.

Senator Cameron: Is there any machinery through which the government can step in and remove a person who conducts himself in such an irresponsible manner as the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers?

Senator Perrault: There is no such device known to me, senator. I believe that, despite the difficulties which occur from time to time at the bargaining table, the technique of labour-management confrontation is part and parcel of industrial relations in this country; it is an established, historical part of it. In most circumstances the process works very well, and has advanced the interests of labour, and the interests of management and government extremely well. I think all parties in Canada support free collective bargaining. But there are times when acts of such outright irresponsibility occur that governments, regardless of political persuasion, must act in the public interest. We may now be approaching that point rapidly.

UNITED NATIONS

ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION ON ZIONISM—QUESTION

Senator Greene: Would the Government Leader accept a question on another subject? Does the government contemplate any action by way of limiting contributions or otherwise as a result of that incredible and reprehensible resolution of the United Nations equating Zionism with racism?

● (1440)

Senator Perrault: The position of Canada in relation to the United Nations and certain nations which may have voted for the condemnation of Zionism is being reviewed, but I am unable to make any further statement on that question today. I shall certainly undertake, however, to obtain further information, and I would like to take the question as notice.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 6, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, as I rise to speak on Bill C-73, whose purpose is to restrict benefits, prices, dividends and salaries in Canada, I should like first of all to touch upon certain aspects of the problem of inflation in Canada. I shall therefore limit my remarks, as much as possible, to the subject of the last inquiry of the government leader in the Senate, namely, "Attack on Inflation—A program of national action."

I congratulate our leader for having brought up the matter, as well as the senators who have already taken part in the debate. Their contribution, their views, help enlighten us with regard to the serious problem of inflation in Canada.

During the last eight years, the fight against inflation in Canada has grown ceaselessly. In spite of that fight, we have had nothing but negative results; that national plague continues to persist and even grow more acute. We are dealing here with inflation of a global nature, which could be solved much more effectively through global effort and cooperation.

Of course, the economists of our governments and those of our industries as well as the financial advisers from different walks of life in Canada are unable to agree on the balanced economic policy to follow to fight inflation efficiently or to have their views adopted. It is unfortunate because we could not come up with appropriate corrective measures which could have wrestled inflation to the ground.

Our old economic history and our economic history since the First World War reveal among other things some economic principles and certainties we fail to take into account.

To evade the inflationary economic problems, it is essential for individuals to restrain their expenses and live according to their real means. To ensure a sound economy, which is not inflationary, all levels of government must live within their tax revenues. Moreover, according to our expert advisers, these tax revenues must be maintained to a limit level ranging from 35 to 36 per cent of the gross national product so as to prevent serious inflationary problems. Unfortunately, that is what the electors refuse to allow governments to do. Everywhere also, even in the most remote industrialized countries, nobody wants to recognize that there is a price to be paid for everything, at its real cost. Pressure from the public over months to force our government to take every means to find work for the unemployed by increasing the money supply in Canada caused our inflationary situation that we condemn so vigorously today.

Those nations which play with their economy to postpone sine die the settlement of their debts, even though it implies interests which multiply the debt itself little by little, or even though they are involved in new debts to promote social programs that very often prove to be unproductive, or indeed to improve the chances of representatives to get re-elected, those nations, as I said, will never avoid the serious inflationary problems coming as a result of that and producing in the long run periods of economic uncertainty and decline.

[English]

For years, the advice, counsel and economic directions of economists were expected to provide the solution to defeat or, at least, to curtail and control inflation and give us an acceptable economic policy that would somehow constrain wages and prices. The more I read their reports and analyze the recommendations of some of them, the more I become confused and disturbed.

A review of the recommendations made by business and labour leaders reveals that there is a wide disparity of views but no solid effective program giving the solution that would curtail, surely and safely, the current inflation. A few made the recommendation that governments at all levels should revert to some of the very basic principles of economics if they wished to be able to stay clear of a multitude of major economic problems. The Economic Council of Canada should have warned governments much more strongly and more consistently on the real consequences of the governments' overspending. Public behaviour on spending and their urging and pressure on government should have been denounced and shamed.

In 1967, in its Fourth Annual Review, the Economic Council of Canada, while setting new growth targets up to 1975, said repeatedly and truly that we would not be able to fulfill Canada's potential unless we could:

(a) Increase productivity by more efficient use of all our resources, including capital and labour. Instead, we decreased productivity, and we failed.

(b) Maintain price stability and improve ability to compete. Instead, we let prices run away even on basic items such as food. We disregarded the need to be able to compete and we failed.

(c) Restrain government spendings. There is no necessity to point out our failure here.

(d) Limit fiscal and monetary policy to medium and long-term goals and try not to respond to every short-run fluctuation. I believe we failed on that.

(e) Continue to attract large amounts of foreign capital. Instead, with our repeated hostile statements on foreign investment in Canada, we curtailed it as much as we could.

(f) Convert manufacturing industry to more efficient standards of scale and specialization. Instead, we killed our shoe industry and badly damaged the glass industry and some divisions of the textile industry, instead of assuring their conversion and giving replacement jobs. We failed on this recommendation and we weakened our secondary industry.

● (1450)

(g) Tackle the unresolved problems of growing cities. We did not touch much on these problems.

(h) Increase the rate of house building. We rated better on this one in our attempts, but certainly not in our results, as the figures of Statistics Canada will show.

In the most outspoken lecture the council had then yet given to the government, it said:

Monetary and fiscal policies should seek to steer the economy along the course of potential economic growth over the medium-term future, rather than simply reacting to emergency (or past) short-term developments.

Government deficits must be eliminated when the economy is expanding at its maximum potential. This is one of the points contained in the report. This was not done; instead we have been, and are presently, steadily increasing our debt load. Canadian fiscal and monetary policies had to be managed so as to attract enough foreign capital. We failed on this!

After the Honourable John Turner, whose departure from the Cabinet was a great loss that was deplored and regretted by many Canadians, met with the leaders of the different sectors of the Canadian economy, he reported on the extraordinary economic confusion that prevailed in each of these sectors. The representatives of business, for instance, were unexpectedly divided in their economic views. Mr. Turner was challenged when he met the labour leaders. If wage controls came to be, for whatever reasons, there would be a militant resistance, he was forewarned. The views were different in the West and in the East. All spoke against inflation, but none wanted to lift a finger to fight it. All shunned any sacrifice.

The elected representatives in the House of Commons asked for the protection and exemption of some of their electors whose support, they underlined, they needed. The economists could not give a reliable consensus as to what could be most effectively done against inflation. The reports gave the feeling that greed and personal interest had really set in amongst Canadians; that we were deep in an ugly economic mess; that few cared about Canadian economic troubles at the federal, provincial and municipal levels; and that no one would or could constrain the waste and spending in education and in our school systems.

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

This kind of thinking, this type of general behaviour, in time could only bring about the economic disturbance which we were experiencing. At this time there is a further need to resist over-spending. Not only the federal government, but governments at other levels, in my view, have been and are to blame for most of our present inflationary trend, although they are getting away with it without the same public criticism as the federal government has been getting.

I believe that the actions of Canadians are predicated on the assumption that government at long last will practise what it preaches, and give concrete evidence of practising real restraint itself. Government spending should never, under any circumstances, and certainly not with the intent of buying votes and obtaining electoral support, be allowed to rise more quickly than the GNP. Yet, this is what is happening today at every level of government.

Time and again in the past, the government was warned by the nations' business leaders, here and elsewhere, and by responsible business economists, that the urgent responsibility of government was the wise management of the country's expenditure. Legislators and the public chose not to hear the reminders that were made that resources are limited; that economic growth depends greatly upon productivity improvements; that the efficient use of resources must be an essential basic economic objective in the pursuit of any goal; that waste and unproductive expenditures can and do occur on a substantial scale when undesirable and unproductive programs are approved, and when some poorly conceived programs are adopted; that inflation is fostered principally by a pattern of government expenditure which peaks at the same time as private spending and investment; and that it is the responsibility of governments at every level to keep a realistic balance between wants and programs and current capability.

Recently, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, the President of the Treasury Board, complained that government expenditures were difficult to curtail because they were authorized by legislation. Perhaps it would be helpful to review some of these increases in spending, especially those in the last three years. According to Statistics Canada, the increases in federal government spending from 1971 to 1974—three years—were 50 per cent in goods and services, old age security and interest on public debt; close to 50 per cent in transfer payments to provinces and municipalities; 140 per cent in unemployment insurance, which is understandable; close to 200 per cent in family allowances; some 125 per cent in subsidy spending, excluding oil; and about 125 per cent in capital spending. These resulted in an average 75 per cent increase in total spending during those three years.

Two weeks ago, Ottawa, in a policy statement on inflation, indicated that government spending should not grow faster than the trend of the GNP. A look at recent excesses in spending indicates the kind of restraint which will be needed if the government's goal is ever to be realized.

● (1500)

Between 1971 and 1974, federal government total spending increased by $11.4 billion on a national accounts basis. If federal government spending had advanced exactly in line with the GNP, the increase in spending would have been only $8.8 billion.

This overspending to the tune of $2.8 billion occurred principally in unemployment insurance and family allowances. Obviously, no political party would now dare lower spending in these areas. Too many interested votes are involved. We also have to consider the effect of the deficit of $1 billion in our balance of trade as well as an expected deficit for the current year of some $2 to $3 billion. Moreover, owing to the expected decrease in government revenues, these estimates may even have to be increased, and this will have a tremendous negative effect on our economy, and on our political thinking.

Federal revenues from taxation rose from a little less than 7 per cent of the gross national product in 1926 to 21 per cent in 1961, and then to 39 per cent of the GNP in 1975. If we add to this contributions to pension plans, it then rises to 40 per cent. Expectations are that in 1975 tax revenues will likely hover around 41 or 42 per cent of the GNP—which would be a major economic disaster. Some experts claim that it could be even worse if there is stagnation instead of growth in the GNP, and if readjustments by indexation in welfare legislation are enlarged and extended, as has recently been implied.

From 1961 to 1974 total government expenditures—including capital outlays but excluding transfers between governments—had already risen by 351 per cent, and this was principally because of the federal contributions to education, health and hospital care, and welfare services.

Among the various levels of government, provincial expenditures rose fastest—560 per cent from 1961 to 1974! Compared to that, local government expenditures rose by 307 per cent in the same period, while federal government expenditures rose by 273 per cent. Of course, all these expenditures are even higher in 1975 in terms of percentages. But, however unacceptable it is, the increase in federal government expenditures has still been the slowest.

While total government expenditures rose from 31 per cent of the GNP in 1961 to 39 per cent in 1974, provincial government expenditures rose from 6 per cent of the GNP in 1961 to 11 per cent in 1974. You can see that savings, while actually dropping in value, were at the same time being drained from Canadians. At the end of 1974, the current accounts deficit stood at $4 billion. It is even more—considerably more—in 1975, and there is little hope for an improvement in 1976.

Let us consider just one item, namely, the indexing of personal exemptions. Expenditures in 1976 will require in excess of $1 billion more in federal government tax revenues, so you can understand why recent statements by the Minister of National Health and Welfare about necessary additional spending in 1976, when tax revenues will actually be decreasing, are most upsetting and gloomy. The obvious inference is that Canada might well become a sick, and rather poor, welfare state.

However, there is a whole school of economists who do not object to such expenditures, because they claim that in order to avoid depression, to stir the economy and to provide growth and fight unemployment, it is necessary to adopt the Keynesian approach. Milton Friedman, a recognized adviser to governments, thinks somewhat like that. He is of the Keynesian school. But, in the long run that is not a realistic approach, because eventually the economy must revert to what is basic; the correction must be made and the economy must be put back to where it should have been all the time. We must have an economy with only a reasonable refundable debt which will not drown us all, a debt which is refundable from revenues.

However, whatever we may say here about certain causes of inflation, it is necessary to point out in all fairness that in 1974 inflation also occurred at a double digit rate in all major countries except West Germany, and that situation has not changed in 1975. As measured by the consumer price index, prices in 1974 increased at an average annual rate of 10.9 per cent in Canada as compared with 13.3 per cent in all the OECD countries, which we so often like to take as examples. So far in 1975—that is, up to now—all of those countries have had an even larger rate of increase in inflation. This is, indeed, a gloomy and disturbing picture for the future of an economy in 1976.

● (1510)

In Canadian industry the profit margin per $100 of sales decreased by 26 per cent in 1974 and by over 13 per cent in the first nine months of 1975. There is even a forecast figure of some 24.5 per cent decrease for 1976. Currently, the tax revenues of Canada for 1975 and the rate of growth of the GNP are still dropping. Without much caution, there could be hardship ahead in the country's economy—if not a breakdown—which could lead eventually to another depression.

When the public exerts heavy pressure for more welfare and more subsidies, when governments have to give ever increasing grants to bolster the country's economy and when government leaders see the general public giving strong support to candidates who call for more and more socialization and more and more spending, it is no surprise that governments spend so much more than they take in, without even having regard to the fact that at some time there will be a day of reckoning. To survive in office, governments feel they have no choice but to create the extra money needed for spending programs that will help their public image and popularity. Inflation, however, responds to economic events, random shocks and government policies, most of which result from pressures exerted by the electorate. We have the government that we deserve, because in a democracy we elect it and give it the mandate we want to give.

We have given the government a mandate. Primarily it must concentrate on solving our major national problems, before we attempt to get mixed up in the affairs of other countries in trying to solve their problems and to deal with foreign enigmas. This applies more particularly when we are not able to solve our own problems.

The blame for our growing rate of inflation must be shared, with the government, by most of us Canadians who have been living beyond our means, who have been constantly pressing for costly social and welfare legislation that now has to be indexed. What else can we expect, when we think we can find or print money, as needed, to pay for all kinds of welfare schemes, to take care of the young to maturity, students often to manhood, hospitalization for the complete recovery of the sick, the old to their death, and so on—from cradle to grave, so to speak—and to give ever increasing help to regional administrative bodies, while we, like the Romans in their time, keep clamouring for more and more of everything, and while the workers, including civil servants, keep asking for higher and higher wages to take care of ever-increasing inflation. This way of life will not serve us or any other country in the world community.

I was against government controls. I am still against government controls. On a long-term basis, I question their efficiency. I believe they will do little for our betterment in the long run. I think that eventually there will be aggressive thrusts to regain lost ground. We have seen it happening elsewhere. All around us other countries are experiencing inflation that continues to influence and affect our economy, despite controls. We import enough to feel the effect.

Under present circumstances, in despair and out of fear for the collapse of the value of the Canadian dollar and a breakdown in sales and trade, and since the government appears to want to correct this situation of the utmost gravity, I, for one, will support all bona fide attempts by the government to contain inflation. The anticipated legislation, however, should extend no favouritism and should provide for no exemptions. It must be strong and uncompromising if it is to be effective.

I believe it is most important that other levels of government agree and follow through on these proposed drastic measures by setting an example and having, for some years to come, balanced budgets. There is no quick cure for inflation. You can brake, but you must not jam the brakes in a way that might cause damage.

The stakes are high for the government. A failure of the program would necessitate either immediate drastic total control or, God forbid, an election at a time of economic confusion.

What can we do as individuals to help, not government as such, not other countries, not those in need in the world but, for some time to come, our Canada, and to adopt a program for our very survival as a progressive nation?

We must have, or find, the will to accept the inevitable sacrifice involved in the implementation of any effective policy. The government must have, or achieve, the freedom of action necessary to compose and impose the necessary policy in the face of seemingly unavoidable constraints. The government must be at full strength for action and receive the undivided support of all representatives and constituents everywhere.

● (1520)

The anti-inflation program, unpalatable as it is, is very much the lesser evil, preferable to either a continuance of rampant inflation or total government control over the economy. In either case our national standard of living would greatly suffer. It has already started to fall significantly from one of the highest in the world to seventh place, with indications of a lower place in a few years. Business leaders are blaming government action, and intervention in competitive economic forces is the major cause of the deteriorating inflation situation. Governments never act according to the soundest economic advice, as they should.

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

Canadian firms must produce their goods and services at world competitive prices if they are truly to serve Canadians, if the firms themselves are to survive and if rewarding employment is to be expected. Every rise in wages must be balanced with a higher production of units if we are to remain internationally competitive and fight off the flood of imported products. Economic guidelines as such cannot and should not mean a guaranteed price level, nor a guaranteed income level, for any noticeable duration of time. These are high stakes indeed affecting us.

A way must also be found to commit all other levels of government in Canada to arrange sets of rules providing the same goal, the same objective—total defeat of inflation, and, I must add, the reinstatement of common sense in our government spending and our public spending behaviour.

The public, in its own interest, must be induced by strong government action to accept and believe that governments at all levels mean business, that they really mean to cut expenditures and not merely to spend money.

One balanced budget may help to neutralize the inflation psychology that exists today. As everyone wants more and fights for more, this will be hardest to realize by our government. Yet it is of major and basic importance, and of the highest priority. Budgets may even have to be balanced for several years to come before the public is convinced that governments really do mean business and that runaway inflation, as a way of life, will not be tolerated. There must be restraints on government programs and services. It cannot be accepted that a sufficient anti-inflationary policy may also ensure economic growth. Governments must become the good example for all of us Canadians to follow.

The federal government has the weapons needed to combat the vicious inflation that has plagued us and the world. The government has the duty of restoring the image of a good and balanced Canadian economy by reinstating the good domestic purchasing value of its money and assuring reasonable productivity in its manufactured products. The government must find the will to use their weapons effectively for the greater good of Canada. They have no choice, since if the present anti-inflation program fails there will be no alternative but to freeze prices and wages by total drastic controls, which will unfortunately prove to be much more costly to Canadians, or to get the people involved, as they should be, in the inflation problem by calling for an election.

The Canadian people must believe in the governments they choose to elect. More than ever before they must back them up and unfailingly assist them in realizing an urgent national mission—to defeat a runaway inflation that is destroying and eating away at every value that Canadians have saved through the years of hard work, besides destroying even what enabled us to save.

As a Canadian who is as affected as any other Canadian, and even though I am against controls, even temporary, as a way of life, or any other form of economic regimentation, I feel that under the present grave circumstances the government's plan to use controls should be supported. Its plan against inflation should be tried and given our full backing. It is our duty to do what we can now, and without reservation, to fight effectively the common enemy, this vicious inflation. We must assist our government to make the anti-inflation measures, even if imperfect in our view, truly operative in their purpose and their goals.

Senator Bélisle: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? I should like to preface my question by complimenting him on a very forthright and constructive speech. It is not the first he has given us in this chamber. However, since at the beginning of the week the newspapers informed us that the Honourable Jack Davis, former Minister of Fisheries in the Trudeau Government, was so disillusioned and discouraged by the government's present economic policy that he decided to accept a Socred nomination in British Columbia, and since we were also informed this week that the former Minister of Justice of Quebec was so disillusioned that he formed another party, would Senator Desruisseaux look favourably upon receiving an invitation to attend the Conservative Party convention in February?

Senator Langlois: Are you short of candidates?

Senator Desruisseaux: I must tell my honourable colleague that I feel no urge at all to join the Conservative Party at this time. Any party that can convince people to make the necessary sacrifices will be the victor, and the just victor, against inflation.

Senator Choquette: We tried it at the last election and you were not too convinced, were you?

Senator Desruisseaux: No.

● (1530)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I contribute to the enlightenment of Senator Bélisle. The Honourable Jack Davis has proclaimed on several occasions that he remains a supporter of the federal Liberal Party and the Government of Canada.

On motion of Senator Choquette, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the house I would like to correct a statement I made earlier today when I was outlining the business of the Senate for next week. I said that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which has been referred Bill C-25, the Environmental Contaminants Act, will meet next Tuesday. That committee will not meet Tuesday but will meet when the Senate rises on Wednesday.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 18, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 18, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 32 of the Saltfish Act, Chapter 37 (1st Supplement), and section 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Small Loans Companies and Money-Lenders licensed under the Small Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1974.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Co-operative Credit Societies for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 57 of the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, Chapter C-29, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of a contract between the Government of Canada and the Town of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970 (English text).

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 19th November, 1975, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—
QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he has anything to report on the strike of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers?

Senator Perrault: Yes, and in view of the importance of the situation I think that when we meet each day it might be useful if I give honourable senators as complete a daily report as possible on the postal strike. These reports will be no longer than necessary but I shall endeavour to present as much relevant information as possible.

During the past week the number of post offices operating has increased from 30 to approximately 150. Most of the offices that have re-opened are in the smaller centres, with the Ottawa post office being the major exception. Because of the inoperative status of Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, we have no national mail service. In those centres we have significant indications of many workers wanting to return, but they are being prevented from doing so by a minority of the union.

The Post Office, in cooperation with the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada, and the Association of Postal Officials of Canada, is in the process of effecting delivery to Canadians of the government's social assistance and pension cheques. According to a late report this afternoon, better than a third of the system's 500 staff offices were operating today as the strike erosion continues. About 1,600 of the 22,000 CUPW members were back on the job today. Post offices which opened today are in Sackville, New Brunswick; Bridgewater, Nova Scotia; Aylmer and Huntingdon in Quebec West, Goderich in southwestern Ontario; Etobicoke and Woodbridge in Metro Toronto, and Terrace and Kamloops in British Columbia. Ottawa reports that 165 CUPW members—150 of them full-time members—were back on the job today. Ottawa has also informed the Control Centre that persons unknown last night sealed at least 200 street letter boxes in the downtown core with a cement glue substance.

● (2010)

The North Bay local of the CUPW last night voted 31 to 26 not to hold a vote on return to work. The vote was supervised by the provincial MPP for Nipissing. The Control Centre has been informed by reliable sources that the CUPW has ordered maximum picketing at all offices containing federal assistance and pension cheques, in an apparent attempt to prevent delivery of the cheques.

Newfoundland reports that continued mass picketing of the St. John's post office again prevented management from entering the building. Metro Toronto reports heavy picketing at Terminal A, but little or no picketing in fringe areas.

Finally, in Nova Scotia, a district office postal clerk reports he was assaulted while crossing a heavy picket line and is seeking to lay charges.

That is all I have to report this evening.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the government leader a supplementary question? When the Postmaster General says that he is willing to wait until Easter, does he mean that that is the target date he foresees having regard to the progress now being registered, or does he mean it is the intention of the government to wait until that time?

Senator Perrault: I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter personally with the minister responsible for the Post Office since that statement was allegedly made. However, I want to reassure honourable senators once again that the government does not intend to be blackmailed by any sector of the Canadian economy, including members of the CUPW.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

UNITED NATIONS

ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION ON ZIONISM—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked last week by Senator Greene, the essence of which is as follows:

Does the government contemplate any action by way of limiting contributions or otherwise as a result of that incredible and reprehensible resolution of the United Nations equating Zionism with racism?

I have a report which I can now give to the house.

Regarding the position of the Government of Canada and any action by way of limiting contributions or other actions that the Canadian Government might take, I may state that the Government of Canada is reviewing its position with respect to any United Nations activities that may flow from the adoption of this particular resolution, and to others which were acceptable in themselves but which we voted against because of the effect that the Zionist resolution had on them. Any activities flowing from these resolutions will be carefully examined by the Canadian Government and probably our participation will be put in question.

It is possible that Canada will not be participating in the conference on racial discrimination to be held in Ghana in two years' time. That is a possibility. We are reviewing that question as well as the implications of the resolutions on the United Nations Decade for Action to combat racism and racial discrimination and it may be that the participation of the Government of Canada will be reduced or removed but we have not reached any final decisions on this question.

Regarding aid to countries that may have voted for the United Nations resolution, the Canadian Government has never taken a position that we would use our aid to determine the political attitudes of other countries and we do not intend to either change our support generally for the United Nations or change our aid flow. However, we are questioning, and will review our participation in, new activities that flow from the adoption of this particularly unacceptable resolution.

In some quarters it has been suggested that we might bring home some of the fine Canadian troops serving as peacekeepers in the Middle East as a sign of protest against this United Nations resolution. The Canadian Government most certainly takes the position that it would not be helping the situation very much as it would not help the peacemaking process. If we took our Peace Force out of the Middle East area, the element of stability that is now present there, I am sure, would be in some way jeopardized by such a withdrawal and would be opposed by Israel, Egypt, and other nations.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

CASUALTIES IN DEFENCE OF FRANCE IN WORLD WAR I AND WORLD WAR II—QUESTION

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question. How many Canadian soldiers were killed or wounded in defending France in World War I and World War II?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

An Hon. Senator: Surely you know that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware, of course, that over 60,000 Canadians were killed on various fronts in World War I. However, insofar as casualties on French territory are concerned, I must take the question as notice and obtain the exact statistics for the honourable senator.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND, (NO. 2)—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, I find one comfort—and I am sure all of you have noted it—that being the size of Bill C-65. We have almost grown accustomed to receiving very voluminous bills dealing with income tax. This one is remarkable by reason of its brevity, and possibly also by reason of certain of its provisions—certain substantive provisions.

I should tell you that this bill deals with a number of matters which are designed to expand the productive capacity of Canada. While one might say that it is modernizing in its tone and in its approach to these problems, in that regard I would prefer to use the language that it adopts a more realistic approach to the question of the position of the petroleum and mineral industries in Canada.

This bill, as one of its first highlights, contemplates what is termed a resource allowance, namely, 25 per cent of the profits of a petroleum or mineral industry, determined after all the operating costs and the capital cost allowances have been deducted and before there is any deduction for development and exploration, interest and depletion. That 25 per cent is deducted from the tax on the profits that might otherwise be leviable, resulting in a substantially lesser amount of profits being subject to the corporate rate of tax. The bill also changes the corporate tax rate from 50 per cent to 46 per cent, effective in 1976.

● (2020)

There is one thing that concerns me a little. In clause 1, in connection with this resource allowance, the bill provides:

(v.1) such amount as is allowed to the taxpayer for the year by regulation in respect of oil or gas wells in Canada or mineral resources in Canada;

There are no regulations in existence at this time, and nowhere in the bill do we find any reference to 25 per cent as being the resource allowance. The only place where we can look for support for the 25 per cent is in the minister's budget speech, and it can be found at page 33. There he deals with the 25 per cent resource allowance. It can also be found in the highlights and supplementary information, which was part of the budget material, at page 36.

Senator Bourget: That is, the June budget.

Senator Hayden: That is in connection with the budget of June 23. In addition, the debate in the other place proceeded on the basis that the budget allowance was 25 per cent. All discussion proceeded on that basis. When I inquired as to why we did not have a regulation at this time, I was advised that it was in the process of being developed. Provision for regulations is made elsewhere in the bill.

The budget speech, which included reference to this resource allowance, was made on June 23. Perhaps a practice has developed of releasing regulations after the bill has passed. If so, it is about time something was done about furnishing all the material. In this case, I do not see any harm done by not having the regulations at this time, as they would refer to resource allowances, but conceivably regulations on other subject matters could be very important for the proper consideration of a bill. If we do not have them until after the bill has been dealt with, we are not able to give full consideration to the bill.

I shall proceed on the basis that the resource allowance is 25 per cent of the profits after deduction of the costs of operating and the capital cost allowance, but before any other deductions are made. The effect of that, as I will demonstrate in a moment, is that those companies which engage in the business of exploration and development will gain by reason of this provision.

I should like to have the permission of the Senate to include later in my remarks a table showing what I might call the sharing of the $1.50 price increase on a barrel of oil under the modified system—that is, the system of resource allowance—including Alberta's royalty reduction.

Senator Flynn: Is this an official calculation of the department?

Senator Hayden: I received it on that basis. I did not see the person who prepared it.

Senator Flynn: but your source is the department?

Senator Hayden: Yes.

Senator Walker: Senator Hayden, before you close out the area of resource allowance, I take it, with your great experience as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, that you will obtain an assurance from the government that the resource allowance will be included in the regulations, as you expect it to be, before this bill passes the committee stage.

Senator Hayden: Yes, I can quite readily give that assurance. I can also say that I have talked, as late as today, with senior officials of the Department of Finance, who assured me that the regulations, in the form in which they now are in course of preparation and in the form in which they will be published, will contain the statement which the then Minister of Finance made as to what would be the nature and extent of the resource allowance—that is, in accordance with the terms and the definition which I have set forth this evening as to how the resource allowance will be calculated.

[Senator Hayden]

This statement is prepared on the basis of the present tax system—that is, the system prior to this bill's coming into effect—and it makes two assumptions. The first assumption is that the company that is being dealt with in this study has no exploration and development, and, secondly, that it has exploration and development.

Under the present system of taxation, the Province of Alberta, on the $1.50 price increase from $6.50 to $8 a barrel, has a 65 per cent royalty. Under the new system, the royalty would be reduced to 50 per cent. On that basis, if the particular company being studied had no exploration and development expense, the province would receive $1.03 of the $1.50 increase. On the basis of the new tax system, which includes not only the reduced royalty as far as the Province of Alberta is concerned but also the application of the resource allowance, the province would receive 82 cents. The federal income tax on the 65 per cent royalty basis for Alberta would amount to 37 cents, whereas under the new tax system it would amount to 40 cents.

The industry—and this is very important—under the present system where the 65 per cent royalty base applies, would receive 10 cents of that $1.50 increase, and under the new tax system of 50 per cent royalty, the industry would receive 28 cents. That is in the case of a company which has no exploration and development.

If you assume that a company has spent the maximum amount on exploration and development, the province under the present system of 65 per cent royalty would receive 98 cents; under the new tax system, it would receive 68 cents. The federal income tax under the 65 per cent royalty would be 31 cents, and under the 50 per cent royalty, it would be 11 cents. Industry carrying out exploration and development under the 65 per cent royalty base would receive or retain 21 cents; under the 50 per cent royalty rate it would receive or retain 71 cents.

● (2030)

Honourable senators, at this point it might be convenient to place on record the table I referred to earlier.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[The table follows:]

Sharing of $1.50 Price Increase in Barrel of Oil under Modified System and including Alberta's Royalty Reduction

| | Present Tax System | New Tax System |
|------------------------|-----------------------|-------------------|
| | 65% Royalty | 50% Royalty |
| Nil Exploration | | |
| Province | 103¢ | 82¢ |
| Federal—Income Tax | 37¢ | 40¢ |
| Industry | 10¢ | 28¢ |
| | 150¢ | 150¢ |

Maximum Exploration

| | | |
|----------------------|-------------|-------------|
| Province | 98¢ | 68¢ |
| Federal—Income Tax | 31¢ | 11¢ |
| Industry—Exploration | 21¢ | 71¢ |
| | 150¢ | 150¢ |

Senator Hayden: I should point out that the reason for these differences in the amount the industry would receive is dependent on this factor, which I stressed earlier, that the 25 per cent resource allowance is calculated on the profits from petroleum and mineral production less operating costs and less the capital cost allowance. However, if a company does no exploration and development its rate of tax will produce a higher result in tax, because it will not have as many deductions. You can see that the company which does explore and develop then has deductions for exploration and development, so that overall its tax position is better.

I hope I have succeeded in clarifying that. It may be that some subsequent speaker might decide I have done exactly the opposite. I think at least the words are clear. They are simple words, and there being no arithmetic, subtraction or multiplication involved, my scientific knowledge has not, to that extent, been put to the test.

Honourable senators will remember that when we conducted committee hearings on Bill C-49, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, we received certain figures from the Canadian Petroleum Association about the disastrous effect resulting from the substantial increases in royalties in Alberta. Later there was a change in the plans of Alberta, as a result of which the royalty rates were reduced. We invited the Canadian Petroleum Association representatives to come before the committee again, and they gave us figures to show what would be the effect reflecting the changes in Alberta's position. What we were trying to ascertain was what could be said to be a fair royalty at a time before this game of higher royalty rates between the provincial and the federal authority developed—what would the federal authority allow as a fair royalty reduction, as it formerly used to do.

These men in their evidence—and this is a matter of record in the printed proceedings of our committee—said the date to choose would be December 31, 1973. They said that what could be regarded as being a fair royalty—one that has all the characteristics of a royalty and not some of the characteristics of an income tax—would be 24 or 25 per cent. When you apply this resource allowance, plus the standard corporate taxation rate of 46 per cent instead of 50 per cent, you end up, in effect, with a 22-1/2 per cent rate on conventional oil. Therefore, these figures certainly appear to be moving in the right direction.

If there are two phases of industry in Canada that are in an almost impossible position at the present time, they are petroleum and oil, and the mineral resources industries. Anything that will lighten the burden, and permit the economic continuance of exploration and development, should be welcomed. Whether this is the final move in this direction, I am not in a position to say. This is a different kind of a step, and it is aimed at encouraging the expansion of production facilities. Whether it goes far enough, whether it is good enough, or whether some enlightened person will come to some other conclusion, I am not in a position to say. I do not boast that I am a professor of science, a professor of mineralogy, a geologist or a mining man, but I can read.

Senator Buckwold: You are pretty good at digging.

Senator Hayden: I can read, and I can dig.

Senator McDonald: You also hit pay dirt.

Senator Hayden: I think I can understand some things more than just adding two and two and getting four.

So much for the resource allowance and the change in the standard corporate rate of taxation from 50 per cent to 46 per cent.

I should remind you that last March, when we were dealing with Bill C-49, a man and his spouse were each given a $1,000 credit for interest and dividends received in the year. Unfortunately, there should have been one more change in order to make the benefit complete. Where the taxpayer's dependent spouse does not use up the allowance to which she is entitled—that is, $1,000—it was provided that there would be a transfer of that to the taxpayer. However, there was another provision in the law, under which the dependent spouse could only have income of not more than $334 before the husband's marital exemption started to erode.

• (2040)

Bill C-65 provides that any portion of this allowance or deduction to which the taxpayer's dependent spouse is entitled, but does not use, may—as is the case with old age deductions and pension deductions—be transferred and used by the husband, or the taxpayer, without any regard for the amount of $334 which limited the wife's $1,000 exemption, thus reducing it in the hands of the husband to $666.

Senator Flynn: And vice versa.

Senator Hayden: Yes.

The individual was dealt with in the last amending act by being given a deduction of the greater of $200 and the lesser of eight per cent of federal tax and $750. This was an encouragement intended, it was stated, to stimulate the economy and possibly stimulate the purchasing power of some of the people. This has been changed. The $750, as the top amount, has been reduced to $500. This should produce about $50 million additional tax revenue to the government. It would start to be effective at about the range between $22,000 and $25,000 a year. In other words, the $750 which you were entitled to would be eroded at that amount of income, which would then make your maximum $500, and not $750.

In order to assist Canada's balance of payments and to give the private sector in Canada access to the international capital markets, heretofore reserved to the public sector, interest paid at arm's length to non-resident lenders in respect of debts issued after June 23, 1975 will be free from withholding tax if no more than 25 per cent of the debt is repayable within five years. It is now suggested that the effect of this will be to assist the private sector in Canada in its borrowings in the international markets, where it is at a disadvantage at the present time. It is suggested that this will enable the private sector to become more cost-competitive by reason of its being able to make borrowings outside Canada when it is known that the lender will not be faced with a deduction of 15 per cent of the interest by way of withholding tax.

The next item is the creation of a five per cent tax credit on the capital cost to any person who has acquired qualified capital property in the period after June 23, 1975 and before July 1, 1977. The idea is to ensure an adequate level of capital investment in productive facilities for the next several years for certain industries sharing common financial problems and difficulties.

Although the five per cent tax credit on capital cost will overlap other incentives which may be enjoyed by those same industries, nevertheless, the other incentives are not taken away. They still remain. The other incentives which manufacturing and processing and resource industries enjoy are considered necessary. At least, this was the opinion of the then Minister of Finance, and the government, I suppose, felt that the extra investment tax credit of five per cent was needed because of the serious financial needs of those businesses, which, after all, are important to Canada.

I can tell you that the system in the United States is similar in many ways, and, in fact, the current rate there is 10 per cent rather than five per cent. Of course, in the United States buildings are not included, whereas here they are.

You will find in this investment tax credit a flow-through. I think that is a good word to describe it. It is a flowthrough of the five per cent investment tax credit. You will find that where you have a trust which, by the acquisition of qualified property, qualifies for entitlement to the investment tax credit of five per cent, there is a flow-through so that the benefit of the five per cent may be taken by a beneficiary of the trust to the extent of his interest in the trust. There is a similar provision in the case of partnerships—that is, there will be a flowthrough of some part of that investment tax credit of five per cent to a partner in circumstances which are described in this bill.

The drafters of the bill have also attempted to deal with cooperatives. Cooperatives must withhold a 15 per cent tax and pay it to the government on sales to customers of the cooperative who are not members of the cooperative. There is a provision now that instead of remitting that 15 per cent withholding tax, the cooperative may apply that investment tax credit on account of any property which the cooperative itself has acquired and which is qualified property under this bill. So that the benefit of the investment tax credit of 5 per cent is, in this direct way, extended as well to cooperatives.

• (2050)

I should tell you, also, that something has been done with registered retirement savings plans. As you know, a person can set up a registered retirement savings plan, known these days as an RRSP. Under the present act an employee is entitled to a maximum deduction for a premium paid to his RRSP equal to the lesser of $4,000 or 20 per cent of his earned income, provided his employer did not make a contribution on his behalf to a registered pension plan in a particular taxation year. The budget proposal and

[Senator Hayden.]

Bill C-65 will reduce the maximum deduction from $4,000 to $2,500 in the case of any individual who is eligible for benefits under a registered pension plan in respect of the taxation year—and here is the catch—whether or not his employer may have made a contribution on his behalf to a registered pension plan during that year.

The amendment ensures that employees who make past service payments to pension plans cannot contribute to an RRSP except to the extent that their past service and current service contributions are less than the amount which they are otherwise allowed to contribute to the RRSP. At present an employee's contributions to an RRSP are reduced only by his current pension plan contribution. This bill would make the past service contribution part of the total that would be deducted from what he might otherwise be entitled to contribute to his RRSP.

There are other provisions in the bill with respect to election expenses.

Senator Walker: Senator Hayden, before leaving that point, could you explain why the minister would make that deduction?

Senator Hayden: The explanation I received was that in some years, by getting together in some way, the employer would make his full contributions, and in other years he would make no contributions; then the employee would make his contributions. By that method of straddling the situation they were able to get a greater benefit than they were really entitled to. I think I have a full explanation of this point, if I can find it.

Senator Walker: Just summarize it in your inimitable fashion.

Senator Hayden: I did attempt to summarize it, but I judged by the expression on your face that I did not succeed in making it any more intelligible.

Senator Walker: I could not understand the reason for doing it. I appreciate how it is being done, but not why. Did you explain that, too?

Senator Hayden: First of all, there is no question as to what the bill proposes to do. The reason for this provision, as it was explained to me, is that some employers and employees have been working together to get the maximum benefit from such a combination, and take advantage of this right to make contributions to an RRSP. This provision is designed to close that road, not the road to success and prosperity, but the road to achieving some larger amount without paying tax on it.

Senator Langlois: It is a way to plug a hole in the legislation.

Senator Hayden: Yes. To put it colloquially, it is plugging a loophole in the law, but I am not sure that that is the right description. If legislation is drawn in such a way as to permit these things to occur, then I do not think the proper description is that it is a loophole.

Senator Flynn: It is an unforeseen method of taking advantage of the law.

Senator Hayden: It is a lack of appreciation of the potential that is contained in the language used. That is a fair way of putting it, I think.

There are amendments to the exemptions in relation to contributions to registered political parties and candidates. It was discovered that a registered agent, or a candidate, might give a receipt to a worker for so many dollars by translating an amount of work that he did into money. An amendment provides that such contributions must either be in cash or by cheque. There are more stringent provisions in connection with books, records and receipts, but the principle of allowing deductions for contributions to registered political parties and candidates, which was established some years ago in the Income Tax Act, is not being eroded.

Senator Flynn: It is just that another loophole is being plugged.

Senator Hayden: "Plugging" in respect of elections has a different connotation; you take your word and I'll take mine.

Senator Flynn: I know where it came from, anyway.

Senator Hayden: I wish to make one additional comment. You will recall that last spring we studied Bill C-49 in depth. We even sent our own experts to confer with the senior officials of the Departments of Finance and National Revenue. They discussed certain things we saw in Bill C-49, together with things which we saw in earlier legislation and which we thought needed some substantial change or clarification. All these experts, constituting a panel of eight or ten people, were present at our committee hearings. The same questions that our experts had submitted to them were asked again, and they gave certain answers. They agreed that some changes were required in Bill C-49, but because of the size and complexity of the bill they thought it would be a difficult if not impossible task to try to make changes at that time. They said they had noted our proposals and would deal with them. I think of one instance I might relate. We asked the chief witness whether, in relation to a certain clause in the bill, there should be a cross-reference to another clause, because otherwise it might appear that an unjust penalty was being imposed. After consideration the answer given to us was, yes, there should be a cross-reference. But in this bill there is no cross-reference nor are there some of the other changes we would like. However, there are two or three other changes carried into this bill. I inquired as to why these other points were not developed, and the answer I got was that they certainly had been fully considered, together with a list of changes which the department itself had compiled and all of which are intended to go forward into a revised income tax bill, possibly next year, whereupon I said, "If not next year by you, then perhaps by the Senate committee."

● (2100)

So, honourable senators, our position is fully noted and our objections are well understood. When we are considering this bill in committee we will again ask these questions with a view to getting a specific answer as to why they should not be dealt with at this time. The point I made to the departmental officers today was that if in the meantime a case should get into the courts and the judge should hold on the interpretation which it appears that the section bears, it would be no use telling him that we had this on our list and that we were going to get at it and correct it this year or next year or the year after. The judge would say, "It is my job to interpret the law as you have written it." So, this business of delaying and piling up intended amendments where they appear to be fully justified, is something that should be studied closely. Public interest should govern, and not simply the fact that more pages might be added to the statutes for any particular year. Taxpayers have no recourse if tax legislation is drafted in such a way that a judge is bound to reach a conclusion that was not originally intended.

I mention that, honourable senators, because it is very important that where amendments are acknowledged to be worthwhile, important and necessary, no time should be lost in dealing with them in the public interest.

There were some other comments I had to make, but since time moves along I shall just refer to the interesting points made on pages 9 and 10 in connection with this investment tax credit. The scope and the extent of the application of the investment tax credit is dealt with starting at the bottom of page 8 and going to about half-way down page 11. There you have listed all the different businesses and all the acquisitions of property which would qualify as qualified property for purposes of entitlement to the investment tax credit of 5 per cent.

Honourable senators, I would expect that a bill of this kind, in accordance with our usual practice, when it has been fully debated in the house, would go to committee, and if that should happen, then we shall have the opportunity to do a thorough review of all points dealt with.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question? I am sure he has the answer at his fingertips because of his knowledge of this act. Could he estimate the number of amendments to this beneficent piece of legislation visited upon us in 1971 that have come to his hands from the department since the act was brought into force?

Senator Hayden: I think I can go this far, that all changes and amendments which we recommended when we originally considered the White Paper in 1969, and when we considered Bill C-259 in 1970 and 1971, and all those amendments in respect of which undertakings were given by ministers, have now been made. I quote as my authority the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Turner, who, when he was before us in 1974, dealing with one of these amendments, announced that that was the last of the amendments in respect of which there had been submissions and that now all the undertakings had been fulfilled. But amendments build up quickly, and some may even build up in this bill. There may even be some by reason of the discovery by the department that particular clauses do not say what is really intended. I can tell you that in the other place there were four or five amendments made to the bill as compared with when it was introduced, but the scope of the amendments was not substantial; it was to correct a misstatement of an applicable date to start some particular operation under the act, or things of that kind. So, honourable senators, your guess is as good as mine as to how many amendments will develop and when they will develop. All we can do is keep plugging away, asking questions, applying whatever knowledge we have to the subject, listening to our experts and listening as well to a little bit of reason in deciding whether in all the circumstances we should defer consideration of a particular amendment. We shall ask ourselves, "Is it that important to do it now? How will the public interest be served if we do not do it now? Should we impose terms?" These are the questions which we as a committee should indulge in. We should not just viciously or deliberately attempt to chew away at the bill. Our objective should be to accomplish something that is of benefit to the public and to the government as well. This is my approach, as those who are members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce know, and this, of course, I shall pursue.

● (2110)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I shall detain you for but a moment this evening to express my thanks and appreciation to the honourable senator who has just spoken for the detailed and clear explanation he has given of this very complicated bill. Having said that, I would now move that this debate be adjourned.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask a question before the motion is put?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Manning: Senator Hayden, in your outline of the legislation providing a greater incentive for oil exploration and development, you pointed out that this incentive will stem from a combination of the changes in the provincial and federal royalty regulations. Can you advise us if there is any indication of agreement between the federal government and the oil-producing provinces—and I am thinking particularly of Alberta—that this arrangement will be effective and will not change for any specific period of time? I ask that because either government, by changing its tax or royalty legislation, could pretty well nullify the benefits provided by the other.

Obviously, to meet the point that you so well expressed of greater incentive, there must be the combination of more favourable circumstances, both federally and provincially. Is there any agreement that will ensure that the arrangement provided for in this legislation will continue for a fixed period of time?

Senator Hayden: No, but, of course, I am not a member of the government, nor would I expect to be consulted in connection with any agreement that might be entered into between a province and the federal authority. However, good old common sense would appear to suggest that perhaps they have finally discovered that the right road is the road of combination and agreement as between the provinces and the federal authority. The proof of it may be the solution which this bill proposes. In saying that, I do not possess sufficient knowledge to be able to say that the resource allowance and the conditions described in this bill will go sufficiently far. That I do not know, but at least it is a step in the direction of combination and agreement, as against a spitefest over the back fence.

Senator Manning: In your reference to the deduction of $1,000 of interest income, you explained that under the proposed change if the total of $1,000 is not taken up by the wife, the balance can be deducted by the husband. Does this apply where a joint return is filed by husband and wife, and where husband and wife file separate income tax returns as individuals? Does it apply in both cases?

[Senator Hayden.]

Senator Hayden: Each one, husband and wife, is entitled to this $1,000 exemption in the case of interest and dividend income. It is hard to conceive of a situation in which each has no taxable income. A taxpayer's dependent spouse may not have sufficient income to use up all the $1,000 exemption. If she uses part of it so that she has no taxable income, the balance, by virtue of this legislation, can be transferred to the husband. I do not know whether I got the point of your question.

Senator Manning: Perhaps I did not make my question clear. My concern is that there are many cases in which a husband and wife file separate income tax returns. If either one has interest income of less than $1,000, assuming all the other factors have been taken into account, can the exemption be transferred to the other spouse, or does this apply only in those cases in which a joint return is filed by the husband and wife?

Senator Hayden: No. To begin with, many husbands and wives file individual returns. That is because both have taxable income. If the wife has less income than her husband, and by applying some part of that $1,000 exemption she can reduce her taxable income to zero, the balance will go to the husband.

With respect to joint returns, the husband may file a return while his wife does not, because she has insufficient income to be required under the Income Tax Act to file a return. In those circumstances, the husband gets the marital exemption. It is hard to conceive of a situation in which the husband and wife could file a joint return. They could each file separate returns, but that is because each has taxable income.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of Senator Hayden? Am I correct in my assumption that there is no such thing as a joint return for a husband and wife under the income tax legislation of Canada? There is in the United States, but not here. Am I correct in that?

Senator Hayden: I do not know of any.

Senator Walker: There are separate returns, and I am satisfied that there are no joint returns, unless the spouses are incorporated.

On motion of Senator Smith (Colchester), debate adjourned.

● (2120)

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 5, the debate on the motion of Senator Molson for the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was presented Wednesday, October 29.

Hon. David A. Croll: If honourable senators refer to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for Wednesday, October 29, they will see therein the report presented by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. It is an extensive report—a very good report—and, in the main, one can agree with its recommendations.

We have in the Senate nine standing committees. I need not enumerate them, as honourable senators are members of one or more. In general, the report recommends that the committees remain much as they are. I do not see any major changes in any of the committees, or in their responsibilities and duties. There is, however, one exception.

The present rule with respect to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is:

The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to internal economy, budgetary matters and administration generally.

The amendment proposed in the report reads:

The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum—

And this is new:

—which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

That, in my view, is a backward step. A new principle is being introduced into the rules whereby subject matter is not delegated, and the committee becomes a power in itself.

For as long as I can remember the house has delegated certain work to various committees. A committee has never been a self starter, but something new has now been introduced in by which this committee can by-pass the Senate by undertaking work on its own volition. In quoting the proposed amendment I read the words “and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.” There is no indication of whether the report is to be presented in a week, a month, or a year.

We should not forget that most meetings of the committee to which I refer are held in camera. Some meetings, by their very nature, must be held in camera. I have never seen any minutes of that particular committee. Reports are occasionally presented of the amount of money spent by a committee. To make the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration unlike any other committee in the Senate is, in my view, a great mistake.

Senator Flynn: If the honourable senator will refer to rule 67(1)(e), he will find that the same thing is provided there.

Senator Croll: I may get to that. I had not noticed it.

Senator Flynn: It weakens the honourable senator's argument that it is the only committee.

Senator Croll: The rule which Senator Flynn has brought to my attention says:

The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is empowered on its own initiative to propose to the Senate amendments to the rules from time to time.

I have no objection to that. They have always had the right to do that.

I am saying that the Internal Economy Committee is now taking upon itself a new initiative. Over a period of years I have looked at some of the rules of the other place, but I have never seen anything quite as forward as this request to turn over to this particular committee unlimited power. Certainly the members of the committee are absolutely trustworthy and responsible, but that may not always be the case, and to allow the matter to get out of hand by deviating from the ordinary procedure is, in my view, a grave mistake.

Senator Flynn: How could that be?

Senator Croll: The report is a good one except for this particular recommendation. It is deliberately underlined in the report. This contemplated change, in my view, is a dangerous one.

No committee should deal with anything other than matters referred to it by the Senate, and on which it is asked to take action and report back in due course. That has always been the practice and the conditions under which the committees function, sometimes with more power, sometimes with less power. To hand over part of the power of the Senate to a committee, no matter which committee, is a serious mistake.

I hope the chairman of the committee will give this matter further consideration. Honourable senators should also give this matter some thought before adopting this recommendation, because in my view it is a matter of great consequence.

● (2130)

Senator McIlraith: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question arising out of his remarks? The new wording in relation to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is as follows:

—which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

Does that mean, in his view, that the Senate, if it adopts this new rule, loses the control it might now have over the administration of the Senate generally?

Senator Croll: Well, the Senate has never been bound to accept a recommendation of any committee.

Senator McIlraith: It is not a recommendation that is provided for in the rule; it is only the result of the work of the committee, not the recommendation. It is not the usual language.

Senator Croll: I have been standing here for 10 minutes trying to say that this is most unusual, and now that you agree with me, I am not going to argue with you.

Senator Grosart: That is not what he is saying.

Senator Croll: I don't know.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I am permitted to speak more than once, but I would be delighted to reply to my honourable friend if I may have leave to do so.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molson: Senator Croll's point, I think, is very well taken, in that exceptions are always undesirable if they can be avoided, and perhaps the powers and duties of committees is a very good field in which to find that differences are not attractive.

I would remind you that the Rules Committee did not go into a seance for the purpose of thinking up ways in which it could give a committee more or less power. This matter arose because of certain problems that have been encountered. The main function of the Committee on Internal Economy is to carry out its duties as manager or housekeeper of the Senate. Its prime responsibilities are in relation to staff, salaries, conditions of employment, general facilities in the buildings, protection, and so forth. It is the voice of the Senate in management through the designated members of the staff of the Senate.

In the past we have had a motion—I do not know how often it has happened—making it possible for the Committee on Internal Economy to carry out its management functions without having each item referred to it. What brought the proposed change forward is the fact that if the Committee on Internal Economy has to wait for a reference to be made, we could very often get into critical conditions in relation to salaries, employment of staff, and problems of this sort. Such matters simply take too long to come to attention, and there is no other machinery to put the committee into operation. Who is going to make the motion? Where is the information to come from?

This is the housekeeping committee, and what it should be doing is running the affairs of the Senate for the benefit of all the members of the Senate. Its function is to make sure the facilities and staff are available for members of the Senate, and that the compensation and conditions of employment for the staff are adequate.

The motion I referred to earlier permitting the Committee on Internal Economy to carry out its duties without having each item referred to it has been made during many previous sessions. This amendment would make unnecessary a motion for this purpose in each session, but rather would make it a permanent state of affairs.

When the Committee on Internal Economy carries out its functions and has to report back, there could be a delay that might be disadvantageous. However, if it must report back to the Senate, I would suggest to honourable senators that there is very little danger of any abuse, such as has been suggested by Senator Croll.

I would like to call the attention of honourable senators to the Minutes of the Proceedings of October 16, 1974, which is issue No. 9. On page 44, will be seen the following:

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Langlois moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.:

That the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to consider any matter affecting the internal economy of the Senate, and that it report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

That motion, I am informed, has been made in each session for quite a considerable length of time, and I think that Senator Croll can be reassured by the fact that so far, in adopting this motion in the past, we have not run into any problems.

Senator McLraith: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question for the purpose of further clarification of the point I sought to raise earlier. I do not have any particular objection to the giving to the Committee on Internal Economy the power, on its own initiative, to consider these housekeeping matters. The point I raised in my question to Senator Croll was a little different.

If you make reference to the rule governing the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, that committee, too, is empowered, on its own initiative, to propose to the Senate amendments to the rules. That committee has to report back, and its actions have no validity until or unless they are adopted by the Senate.

Under the language used in the proposed amendment to the rule governing the Committee on Internal Economy, it does not have to report back in the same way. It merely reports the result of its consideration. There is not the same kind of control, and, by the nature of the work of that committee, it is not possible that there could be in all cases. However, it is a different situation from that of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, because the control is absent altogether.

I wonder if any particular thought had been given to the language, "and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate". It is merely required to report the result. It is not required to come back to the Senate with proposals or recommendations. I wonder if that was intended, or if thought was given to the draftsmanship of those words I have just read.

Senator Molson: I really have to answer the honourable senator right off the top of my head, and I am a little concerned that the answer may not be too clear. I think we have to put in perspective the functions of these two committees.

The Committee on Internal Economy had a very difficult task over the last two years, and that was to examine the functions and responsibilities of all the members of the staff of the Senate, as well as their compensation. In fact, that work is not completed yet. If in the course of that work, or that examination, the committee brings in changes in grading, salaries, responsibilities, and so forth, I do not think it has ever been contemplated that the Senate would approve the report in detail. The Senate does not go through the exercise of submitting for approval a budget of its own internal affairs. It never has. Its budget goes to Treasury Board.

● (2140)

The point I am making is that if the Rules Committee thinks that a rule should be changed, it is dealt with as has happened in this latest case. Many people suggested amendments over a period of about three years, and we collected them and finally started holding meetings to consider them. The result is the report that the Rules Committee made.

[Senator Croll.]

The Internal Economy Committee has an on-going responsibility. I think of salaries as being perhaps one of the most serious. Budgets of all sorts are perhaps equally serious. They do not come back here for approval after the chairman of a committee submits a budget and it is approved by the subcommittee of the Internal Economy Committee; it then goes to the main committee on Internal Economy and is approved by that committee; it does not come back here for approval, but only as a report.

Senator Grosart: Oh yes it does, definitely.

Senator Molson: No.

Senator Grosart: It must.

Senator Bourget: It must in case somebody objects to one of the recommendations. How can he do so if he is not a member of the committee? I am talking about the principle of this matter.

Senator Molson: I do not quarrel with that. I am merely saying that all individual items do not get approval in the chamber.

Senator Bourget: I would not swear to it, but I think they do. There is a question of principle involved here. If a report is made to the Senate and a senator is opposed to one of the recommendations, he should have the right to say so. How can he do that if somebody does not ask that the report be approved here? I am not sure about the procedure we have followed in the past, but as a matter of principle it should be reported to the Senate and the Senate should approve it. In that way all honourable senators will have the opportunity to oppose any recommendation that has been made by the Internal Economy Committee. That is my view.

Senator Bélisle: I have been a member of the committee for only a year, but I believe a request is made to the chairman to report the budget to the house to be approved by the whole house.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, perhaps I might clarify the point I was seeking to raise, which was that the language used in the proposed new rules limits the reports, whereas now they are not limited. They can report quite widely now under the motion made, quoted earlier by Senator Langlois, which was a wide power of report. Under this proposal they are to report only the results of the consideration; they cannot report proposals; they recommend to the Senate. They cannot report a dozen and one things that they might wish to report. They cannot report other things that it is usual for a committee to report. This will be the most limited committee in the Senate in its reporting.

Senator Hicks: Surely Senator McIlraith's position puts too restricted an interpretation on it when he reads into it that they report only the result of such consideration. Surely as a result of such consideration they might make recommendations. I should think that is consistent with the language used.

Senator McIlraith: How do you get a recommendation approved?

Senator Hicks: By motion in the Senate, which could be made by the chairman of the committee reporting.

Senator Grosart: As a member of the committee which suggested these revisions of the rules, perhaps I might make a few comments. On the matter of reporting, one of the things we discovered was that there was, and still is, no general requirement for any committee to report, other than the two referred to. Committees are not always required by our rules to report.

On the matter Senator McIlraith raised, I agree with Senator Hicks that the requirement that this committee report the "results of its consideration" gives it not only the widest latitude in reporting but requires it to report the results of what it has done. The "result" may be the decision it has reached or that it has reached no decision or that it has heard witnesses and reached such and such a decision. I do not see it is in any way limiting. On the other hand, it is a fact that this committee is required to report, which I think should to some extent answer Senator Croll's suggestion that it is empowered to undertake any matter relating to internal economy.

Senator Croll: Report when?

Senator Grosart: Perhaps you will allow me to finish. The other committees are not required to report.

Senator Croll: But they do.

Senator Grosart: The fact that this committee is required to report I think assumes that it would have to report within a reasonable time. Surely we do not have to say it should report within three minutes, three days or three hours. This committee is required to report, and it is one of two committees in the Senate that are required to do so. That has been put in the rules.

On the question whether the committee is being given too great a power of initiative, surely all this does is to bring the rules into line with what has been the practice all along. The Internal Economy Committee deals with such matters as whether a senator is to have a new carpet, or whether an employee is to have his salary classification raised. It would obviously be impossible if this committee had to wait for every single one of hundreds of items with which it deals in a year to be raised in the Senate and then referred to it.

As I remember our discussion, that was the intent of this change, to bring the rules into line with practice. Surely there could be no other practice, as the chairman of the committee said, than that this committee should have responsibility for all the housekeeping of the Senate, and not only housekeeping but the budgeting, which is often a separate item. Having this responsibility, the committee simply has to be seized of situations as they arise, go to work and do something about them. As I said a minute ago, it would be absurd to suggest that this committee should wait until somebody raises a matter in the Senate and have the Senate refer it to the committee. We never have operated in that way.

Senator Croll: The committee has been operating like this for many, many years. Any time we have referred a matter to the committee it has sooner or later discharged its responsibility of reporting back that it has handled the matter in one way or another. Every committee gives us some report on anything that we pass to it.

Senator Grosart: But it is not required to by the rules.

Senator Croll: When you say it is not required to by the rules, it has been taken for granted that that is the way it is handled. It has always been done that way. If it did not report back, sooner or later the question would arise as to what had happened to the report on this or that bill. Up to the present time the committee has always had its hands full. If I recall correctly, we used to pass the accounts over to them and let them deal with the matter. They then handled it. In what manner did you handle your responsibility before this amendment was proposed?

Senator Grosart: We were just doing what came naturally.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, perhaps I might reply briefly to Senator Croll. I think the answer to his last observation is that the committee was able to operate with any degree of efficiency only by virtue of the motion passed from year to year.

Senator Croll: Yes.

Senator Laird: Otherwise it would be sunk, for the reasons given by Senator Grosart. It would be utterly impossible for us to wait for action on any given small matter—dozens, if not hundreds arise—until it was moved in this chamber that we give consideration on it. We have simply got to move faster than that. That is the reason, of course, why the motion was passed each session.

● (2150)

I suggest, with respect, that the Rules Committee is making this practice a permanent part of the operation of the Senate.

Senator McIlraith: Would the honourable senator not agree that the elimination of the necessity for the motion takes away the rights of senators who are not on the committee to raise questions about the internal administration or management of the Senate? The motion is a debatable motion. When there is no motion, honourable senators have lost the forum in which they may make suggestions regarding the management of the Senate.

Senator Laird: It is obvious that we are all concerned that the committee does not act irresponsibly. First of all, of course, the committee is composed of 20 members who, because of their number and diversity of experience, are capable of dealing adequately with any situation.

Secondly, do not forget that while it is true these meetings are held in camera, any senator is free to attend. However, the fact of the matter is that we never have any problem in getting a quorum. I would be willing to guarantee that our average attendance is 20, because at each meeting there are two or three non-members.

I believe it is just impossible for the committee to function without this power, and it should not be necessary to request it session by session. There is adequate protection, for the reasons I have mentioned; there is adequate supervision of what transpires.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

ANTI-INFLATION POLICY

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY LEGISLATION

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and report upon the subject-matter of the Bill C-73, intituled: "An Act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to give a word of explanation as to why the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee was selected to make this study. We have received many representations suggesting several committees to consider this legislation, particularly the National Finance Committee and the Health, Welfare and Science Committee. Consideration was given to these representations, and to the tasks assigned to various committees.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the power to examine papers and other matters relating to federal estimates generally and, more particularly, to national accounts and government finance. The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science shall have referred to it all bills and matters relating to health, welfare and science, generally, veterans affairs, and so on.

It was thought that these committees could have made a thorough and proper examination of the bill in question. However, considering the tasks assigned under our rules to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, which has the power to study bills, petitions, inquiries and matters relating to banking, trade and commerce—including; banking, insurance, et cetera; customs and excise; taxation legislation; patents and royalties; corporate and consumer affairs—it was considered that this latter committee was the appropriate committee to which this bill should be referred.

Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the fact that the bill in question has many references to sections of the Income Tax Act, and taxation legislation is one of the subjects assigned to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. I hope that honourable senators will concur in the choice which was made after due consideration.

I commend this motion to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 19, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45 (1) (i), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent?

Senator Flynn: I think it would be useful if we had a word of explanation on the record.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, this motion is necessary because this committee has no general power to engage technical advisers as has, for example, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The motion I moved last night with respect to the consideration of Bill C-73 included this power to engage the services of technical advisers. I am simply making a motion now that will apply to all matters referred to this committee in the future by the Senate.

Senator Flynn: "In the future" are the words that worry me. I am aware that this power has in the past been accorded to the committee insofar as matters referred to it were concerned. But, as I recall, permission was always granted with regard to advance examination of particular pieces of legislation, like Bill C-73. I feel that we are now departing from the method of giving that power for specific purposes. I can understand the situation with the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. They have a general mandate. But usually the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has specific mandates, and I do not see why we should be called upon to give this power at this time for any future legislation that may be referred to it. Such power would be too wide, in my view. If the chairman is willing to say it is only at this time and in connection with Bill C-73 that this authority is needed, then I would have no objection, but I should like to know what other legislation may be referred to this committee in future.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, my friend knows very well that my crystal ball does not enable me to see far enough ahead to determine what legislation may be referred to this committee. I certainly hope it may be found unnecessary to refer any further legislation before the Christmas recess. As to the status of Bill C-73 at the present time, this motion is certainly needed.

Certain items are outstanding and there may be a question as to whether they are covered by the authority we have had so far. When the subject matter of a bill, White Paper or whatever it may be, has been referred to committee for study, there is usually a budget in relation to that subject matter. Subsequently, however, when the bill itself comes to the Senate and is referred to committee, this motion would bring everything up to date and nullify any suggestion that we do not have authority to spend funds for technical assistance.

As far as the future is concerned, it can take care of itself. If a subject matter is referred to a committee for study, then we can ask the Senate to award the committee funds for that purpose. The best way to stop the inquiry is, of course, not to award the funds.

● (1410)

Senator Grosart: If I may comment on that, it appears to me that there are committees which do have permanent staffs. Whether the authority for that is from the Senate itself or arises merely from a budget approved by the Internal Economy Committee, I am not altogether sure. In determining the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition, it might be useful for us to have some further information. What committees now have permanent staffs consisting of one or more? And what is the authority for that? I suggest that the debate on the motion be adjourned until we have that information.

Senator Hayden: Well—

Senator Grosart: I have not made such a motion, senator. I am merely suggesting it.

Senator Hayden: I want to point out to my friend that we will not be able to proceed with our hearing on the subject matter of Bill C-73 unless we know that there are some funds in the offing, because we require certain technical staff. Since the study will not take long I do not expect that the amount of money will be substantial. But that is the position we find ourselves in, and the point is that if we wait for a debate on the whole subject we might well have reached the Christmas recess by that time.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am merely asking the chairman of the committee if, before he uses the authority provided in this motion for purposes other than the advanced study or the regular study of Bill C-73, he would so advise the Senate. That is the only point I am making now.

Senator Croll: I suggest we pass the motion for the present and cut out the word "future".

Senator Langlois: The word "future" is not in the motion. It refers simply to matters which "may be referred".

Senator Croll: "May be referred" is the same thing. I suggest we change it to say "for this particular matter."

Senator Flynn: I am satisfied with the assurance of the chairman.

Senator Langlois: In any event, the committee chairman would have to submit a budget to the Internal Economy Committee and control would be exercised at that point.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but the Senate would not know in advance. I merely put that warning on the record.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

THERAPEUTIC ABORTIONS—QUESTION

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, my question has to do with the setting up by the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Otto Lang, on September 29 last, of a committee to conduct a study to determine whether the procedure provided in the Criminal Code for obtaining therapeutic abortions is operating equitably across Canada.

The composition and terms of reference of the committee cast serious doubt upon the committee's ability to produce a factual and unbiased report.

I raise these points, first, because one of the members of the committee, Dr. Marion C. Powell, is a well-known pro-abortionist. She is an outspoken member of the Doctors for Repeal of the Abortion Law, a small medical group which is very active in trying to have abortion removed from the Criminal Code. These people are determined to have this country accept the idea of abortion on demand. The minister might just as well have appointed Henry Morgentaler to the committee.

My second reason for raising this issue is that the terms of reference of the committee are also pro-abortion. The committee is asked, for example, to determine whether the views of the doctors and hospital boards are dictating the refusal to have abortions performed. But the committee is not asked to determine whether the views of the doctors and hospital boards are resulting in the practice of abortion on demand in some hospitals.

There is no question but that there is widespread abuse of the abortion law in this country. If we are to set up any committee to study the matter of abortion it should be one that would be charged with looking into the extent of the abuses of the abortion law and the corrective measures that should be taken. The data it collects, the sources of that information and the statistical methods employed by the minister's committee should be made public. The knowledge and experience of the public should also be sought to supplement the data gleaned from official channels. No biased committee guided by slanted terms of reference and working in complete secrecy can serve any valid and useful purpose. As far as I am concerned, the committee as it is presently constituted is completely unacceptable.

Would therefore the government leader inquire of his colleague, the present Minister of Justice, if he would be willing to reconsider both the composition of the committee and its terms of reference?

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has both asked a question and made a rather lengthy statement on this subject.

Senator Grosart: It was a long question.

Senator Perrault: On a matter of this kind, it is extremely difficult, of course, to strike a committee which is satisfactory to all the viewpoints which exist in Canada on this extremely controversial question. However, I assure the honourable senator that his views will be communicated to the Minister of Justice, and that I will undertake to obtain a statement from the minister in reply to the observations made this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: It would be interesting to have the opinion of the former Minister of Justice also.

Senator Walker: We already know them.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—STATEMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a further report with respect to the postal dispute.

The postal situation continues to improve across the country today as more staff offices and postal stations reopen. There are now at least 155 offices being manned by something in excess of 2,000 Canadian Union of Postal Workers employees. Additional offices reopening today include Rothesay, New Brunswick; Summerside, Prince Edward Island; Strathroy, southwestern Ontario; Collingwood, Ontario; Rexdale in Metro Toronto; Dawson Creek, Vanderhoof and Chilliwack in British Columbia, and the Yukon.

Federal pension cheques are being distributed to post office stations across the country today from regional offices, and letter carrier delivery of the first batch is expected to start Thursday and Friday. We have a late report this afternoon from New Brunswick. The president of the Fredericton local has stated that his workers could vote to return if they wished.

Senator Flynn: Would the government leader tell us how many post office employees are back to work?

Senator Perrault: I think we are looking at a total of around 8,000.

Senator Flynn: That is the number of post offices.

Senator Perrault: Yes. I thought you said post offices.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: It still represents a relatively small percentage of employees back at work, but there is an encouraging trend.

● (1420)

Senator Choquette: Can the Leader of the Government tell me who directs the people who are returning to work as to what type of mail is to be delivered? All this week we received third- and fourth-class mail, such as Eaton's catalogues, cheap magazines, Christmas seals—

An Hon. Senator: Playboy.

Senator Choquette:—and items like that. I am wondering how sincere these people are, and who is directing their work.

Senator Perrault: The question relates to the type of mail which is being delivered by post offices now back in operation. I am unable to provide that information. When we question the sincerity or goodwill of postal workers, however, I maintain the view—and I think it is shared by most members of the Senate—that the vast majority of postal workers want to put in a good day's work. They are becoming very frustrated with some of the leadership they appear to be getting from their union.

Senator Walker: Is it true that Mr. Davidson, the leader of it all, is an avowed communist? I do not know about his being an avowed communist, but is it true that he is a communist, and is working at it? His object in that case, of course, would be anarchy, would it not, instead of getting the people back to work? In that connection, have the postal workers been allowed a free vote recently?

Senator Perrault: Apparently, there has been a concerted effort by Mr. Davidson to prevent any of the workers from exercising their right to a secret ballot or a secret vote on the current offer. The standard procedure has been for this question to be raised at the meetings: "All those who are opposed to the actions of the trade union leadership please stand up." I suggest that there is a considerable difference between that kind of procedure and a healthy democracy.

In connection with the question asked at the outset, there are indications that some of the CUPW leaders do not subscribe to the principles and standards of our parliamentary democracy—principles and beliefs subscribed to by those in this chamber and the vast majority of Canadians.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I think it is encouraging to note that by a very slow process more and more postal workers are returning to work. I would like to suggest to the Leader of the Government that he pass on to the Postmaster General the suggestion that those workers who do return to work, or those who might like to but are refraining from doing so because of fear of the consequences, should receive perhaps even more encouragement than they have had to date from the government, and that such kind of retributive action will not take place in the future. Several postal workers have said that they would like to go back to work, but that they are really frightened of the harassment that could eventually occur, if the threats that have been made are any indication.

I feel that if strong representations of this type were made by the Government of Canada there would be more and more postal workers returning to work. This would occur much more rapidly if the employees knew, and were really assured, that their own security and working conditions would not deteriorate as a result of their actions. We must also bear in mind the kind of harassment there has been on the picket lines, where those who cross those lines are being subjected to all kinds of vilification.

If the kind of assurance I speak of were given, I think we would soon see a flood of workers returning to the post offices.

Senator Flynn: Question mark.

Senator Macdonald: May I ask the Leader of the Government if it is not a fact that in the normal course of collective bargaining the only time that a matter such as this is put to the employees is after some kind of an agreement has been arrived at between the negotiating committee for the employees and the employers? Is it not most unusual for the employer to ask that his proposition be put to the employees when the negotiating committee has not agreed to it?

Senator Perrault: You are suggesting, senator, that it would be unusual to have the membership express their view with respect to the last offer of the federal government. Well, it is a matter in controversy, and, of course, the position of the government is that because the final offer is substantially different from the earlier offer made to the inside employees of the Post Office, democratic practice suggests that there should be a ballot—a secret ballot—by the workers. I support that view, and I think most Canadians support that view. The leaders of the union, however, take the position that they were given a broad and vast mandate, and that they are not obligated to ask the workers whether or not they wish to go back to work. Their motives may be substantially beyond merely the return to work of the people they purport to represent, and a restoration of postal service.

Incidentally, there is a misleading report being circulated by some leaders of the union that those workers who return to work will lose their status in the Post Office. The fact is that it is not necessary to belong to the union in order to work in the Post Office. The Rand formula applies and CUPW membership is not mandatory, so those workers who believe they should go back to work, and wish to do so, need have no fears about their job security.

Senator Macdonald: I would just like to comment that it does seem to me, forgetting about the postal strike, which everyone would like to see settled, that it is setting a very unusual and, to my mind, very bad precedent, if the employer is able to say, when he does not agree with the negotiating committee, "You must put our proposition to the membership." To me that is a negation of collective bargaining.

Senator Perrault: Well, there are certain special circumstances in labour relations across this country at the provincial and, I understand, the federal level, where there can be government supervised ballots under certain conditions. The idea of a supervised ballot is not an unprecedented situation. Indeed, many suggestions are now coming in from across the country that we should have a government supervised secret ballot to get this thing resolved.

Senator Macdonald: That would be a new course to follow in collective bargaining.

Senator Walker: It is about time we had a new course in collective bargaining, with this strike going on week after week. If the present system does not work, it is in the public interest that we have something new that does.

Senator Macdonald: We should remember that the government did give these people the right to strike. If they exercise that right, why complain about it?

Senator Walker: Because the public is suffering, and suffering greatly.

Senator Macdonald: When you gave the right to strike, then you automatically took into consideration, I presume, that a strike would at some stage occur.

Senator Walker: We had nothing to do with that on our side.

Senator Macdonald: We passed it, though.

Senator Perrault: The proposal here is not to remove the right to strike. The real question at stake is whether a small group of powerful leaders of this union shall have the right to deny the workers the opportunity to ballot secretly on the last and best offer of the government, a government acting on behalf of the people of Canada. That is the essential question here.

An additional question arises as to whether or not they are afraid to have a secret ballot because of their own personal positions in the union.

Senator Macdonald: All right, forget about the strike. As I said, in the ordinary course of collective bargaining, is this going to be a precedent? In any employee-employer relationship, when the point is arrived at where the employers say, "We cannot give you any more"—and perhaps they are right; perhaps they cannot give any more—is it not a whole new method of conducting collective bargaining for the employers to say, "Put our proposition to the membership"?

Senator Forsey: I quite agree with Senator Macdonald on this point. It would be an innovation. Whether it is an innovation that is justified in the peculiar circumstances of this case is another matter, but I think the warning Senator Macdonald has given us about this becoming a precedent is a very sound one, and one which anyone with experience of labour relations would endorse.

Senator Perrault: I would remind honourable senators that when the public interest is very much at stake, as it is in a dispute of this kind, any government, regardless of its political persuasion, must ultimately act in the public interest, as successive governments have acted in respect to a number of disputes including the tie-up of ports, the grain situation, transportation crises and like situations. Such action has been taken by New Democratic governments, Social Credit governments, Conservative governments, Liberal governments, and others. Ultimately the public interest is very much at stake in matters of the kind discussed today. I do not disagree with you, senator, but I do say that there comes a time when any government must act in the public interest.

Senator Forsey: I quite agree, but at the same time I think it is worthwhile that we should have this caveat from Senator Macdonald who, I should imagine, has very great experience in this field. My own limited experience in this field would lead me to feel that his caveat is one that should be heeded.

● (1430)

I was very careful to say that the circumstances in this case may justify a departure from the normal procedure, but I think we should heed the caveat, the warning, which Senator Macdonald has given us about the application of this generally, because it could have a very, very far-reaching effect, an almost revolutionary effect on labour relations and collective bargaining. I do not know whether Senator Goldenberg, with his enormous experience in this field, would care to make any comment on it, but I think if he did it would be most valuable for the chamber.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I am not going to discuss the postal strike or the circumstances surrounding it, but there is no doubt that the caveat set out by Senator Macdonald is correct. I fully agree with what he and Senator Forsey have said.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I put a question to the Leader of the Government the other day about the refusal of the union leaders to put the proposals to the membership. I posed it in the context of permanent legislation which the government could use, after a period of time, when the public interest is at stake. There is no legislation presently that could force the leadership of a union to put the proposal to its members. So I put the question to the Leader of the Government whether in permanent legislation dealing with strikes affecting the public interest such a device should not be included, and I think it is something that should be seriously considered.

Senator Perrault: I want to assure Senator Forsey, Senator Goldenberg and Senator Flynn that the government does not anticipate at this time forcing a vote of this kind.

Senator Flynn: It cannot.

Senator Perrault: No, it cannot, but, frankly, governments finding themselves in a position such as this one inevitably must seek out alternatives to protect the public interest.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, in looking back in the history of collective bargaining, it comes to mind that there was a law passed in the 1920s, in Kansas or some such place, when Samuel Gompers was the President of the American Federation of Labour, and the same thing happened. They passed a law containing the words "in the public interest", but over the years it has never been determined what can be done when the public interest is involved. Of course, the public interest is involved, but why give the right to strike when you know that the public interest is going to be involved? If you give the right to strike, then you cannot complain if that right is exercised. That is my point.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, it's about time we got rid of a lot of this huffy-duffy and settled down to the realization that we are faced with a crisis where the public interest is being abused abominably. We must consider the fact that some labour leaders are communists, and their object is anarchy—they just do not give a damn about the rules, or the public interest—so it is time that something was done. The government has done nothing so far except to humour these people and allow them to go on week after week.

It is all very well for the professors and great constitutional authorities to get up and explain what the law is at the present time. Most of us know what the law is, but I suggest that the time has come, and has even passed, when the situation has ceased to be a joke. The time has come when something must be done—by legislation, if necessary—to force the postal workers back to work, in the same way that the railroad workers were ordered back to work. Why should this strike go on week after week?

We know in advance that the Prime Minister, under the new regulations, cannot offer them anything more than they are being offered at the present time, so why should the public be damned the way they are being damned every day? It is a shocking commentary. It is all very well to sit here and be wise, and listen to those profound professors in this chamber who won't ever do anything except follow the rules. Let us make rules that will enable us to change the present situation, and get the postal workers back to work. This thing cannot be, and should not be, tolerated any longer.

Senator Forsey: I was not aware that Senator Macdonald is a professor. I am most interested to hear that.

Senator Walker: I was not aware that you are a lawyer, but you profess to be one.

Senator Goldenberg: May I add one more word in answer to Senator Walker?

Senator Walker: You are a professor; I can see that.

Senator Goldenberg: Senator Walker made certain statements about the leaders. There is nothing to prevent the government from asking Parliament to order the workers back to work, and we may be coming to that very shortly—I do not know. But, if that is done now, will it not really take those leaders off the hook? Everything has to be done at the proper time.

Senator Walker: When are you going to take the public off the hook?

Senator Goldenberg: The public does not seem to be complaining very much at the present time.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Walker: In the ivory towers of professors they do not hear this.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not think my ivory tower is as high as that of Senator Walker.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY OF THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE

TWENTY-SEVENTH SESSION, STRASBOURG, FRANCE

Honourable Maurice Bourget rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-seventh Session of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe held in Strasbourg, France, from 6th to 8th October, 1975, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

● (1440)

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, early in October of this year, more specifically on the 6th, 7th, and 8th, I had with Mr. Gerald Baldwin and Mr. Marcel Prud'homme of the other place the privilege of representing Canada at the 27th session of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. Our delegation had been chosen to attend the session and take part in the proceedings on the activities of the OECD in 1974. Our participation resulted from an invitation addressed to the Speakers of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

You will probably recall that early in February last, the president of the Council of Europe, Mr. Vedovato, made an official visit to Canada to improve relations and intensify cooperation between Canada and Europe and more especially with the Council of Europe. During that visit, the three presidents agreed to the participation of the Canadian parliamentarians in the proceedings of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, the main reason for our participation was to attend the session and take part in the proceedings on the activities of the OECD of which Canada is a member. However, we were also given the opportunity of unofficially discussing in plenary meeting first, and with the members of the commission the political issues and future relations between the Council of Europe, Canada and the United States. I will return to this during my comments.

At the opening of the debate on OECD operations, we had the pleasure to hear Mr. de Niet, reporter for the Commission on Economic and Development Affairs, who summed up his report. He drew the attention of the Assembly to the recent activities of the Organization in the area of energy, and in particular on the creation of the International Energy Agency and the Financial Support Fund which, he said, will be most useful in future years for the members of this organization. Speaking on the current economic crisis, he said he was satisfied that a few countries—and I suppose honourable senators have read in this morning's Gazette, or yesterday's La Presse that the situation as described at the time the meeting took place, as I said, in October, is not according to United Nations experts as attractive as Mr. de Niet perceived it when he addressed us in October.

However, dealing with the economic crisis, he felt happy at that time that a few countries had reached the bottom of the wave, and he was calling on them to try to improve their internal situation and promote exports from other member countries. He deplored the fact that one of the most dramatic consequences of the crisis was unemployment that seemed to affect mostly younger people. He congratulated the OECD for having decided to hold in the near future a tripartite conference on unemployment, that will bring together representatives from governments, employers and unions. This conference is to be followed by the labour ministers' meeting in March 1976. Finally, he expressed regret that official assistance to the developing nations was not averaging more than .33 of one per cent of the GNP while it had been .71 of one per cent in 1973. Therefore he wished for a marked improvement in that area and greater cooperation with the underdeveloped nations.

Mr. De Bruyne, from Belgium, reporter for the Science and Technology Commission, followed Mr. de Niet to the stand. He told the Assembly he was pleased with the orientation of some scientific research undertaken by OECD, such as the research activities in social science. He also insisted upon the matter of technology transfers to developing countries and in conclusion recommended that OECD should speed up the tempo of its studies on multinational companies.

Another important participant in that debate and, indeed, the most important one, in my opinion, was Mr. Van Lennep, Secretary General of OECD who centered his remarks around the three main themes of the resolution proposed to the Assembly, namely:

First, the reaction of OECD countries to the main economic disruptions and difficulties of the last couple of years.

Second, the policies to be adopted to end the current recession and head towards a non-inflationary recovery consistent with the new situation.

Third, the need for OECD countries to react in a constructive way to the ever stronger trend towards world economic interdependence.

On this subject—I am now addressing myself to the first theme—the Secretary General reminded the assembly of the adoption by OECD members of the "Trade Pledge" which was aimed at limiting the risks of an escalation of protectionist measures and of a trade war, plus a recycling of petrodollars which has permitted the international money market to bring in money where it was needed. He mentioned also the agreement creating the OECD support fund, on April 9, 1975, to help countries faced with considerable financial difficulties. He advised the Assembly of the setting-up by the OECD Council in November 1974 of the International Energy Agency, to plan and operate an energy cooperation program, to share oil supplies in emergency situations, and to decide on an oil consumption reduction for the forthcoming years.

On the subject of the prospects for a new non-inflationary growth, Mr. Van Lennep indicated that for the whole of the OECD area, which comprises 24 countries, economic activities had already passed the turning point, following the recovery of the United States and a certain resumption in Japan. He suggested that the new OECD projections will probably show an increase in gross national product of from 3 to 4 per cent. As I said a while ago, it seems that since Mr. Van Lennep made this statement, the figures have changed a little. At that time, however, he predicted an increase in gross national product of from 3 to 4 per cent and perhaps an increase of 5 per cent in the volume of imports and exports. He pointed out, however—and on that he probably was anticipating some drawbacks—that prospects vary a lot from one country to another and that there are a good many unanswered questions. In Europe, for example, there are now very few early indications pointing to a sudden turn in the trend, and that is where confidence can play a crucial role. It will be necessary, in his opinion, to maintain confidence and convince public opinion that we can progress in the fight against inflation. For this purpose, it might be necessary for certain European countries to take new steps for economic revival, and this as soon as possible. In order to help the member states reassess the prospects for sustained economic growth in the present circumstances, Mr. Van Lennep indicated that the OECD Ministerial Council had asked an independent group of distinguished economists to examine the political issues which might surface in seeking economic growth without fueling inflation. This group will be headed by Mr. Paul McCracken, former chairman of the United States' Council of Economic Advisers.

[Senator Bourget.]

● (1450)

Mr. Van Lennep concluded his remarks with a reference to the need for more constructive relations with the underdeveloped countries. He told the assembly that the climate within the governments and the international organizations had improved since the adoption last May, at the ministerial meeting of the OECD, of a statement on relations with underdeveloped countries. As we know, the purpose of that statement was to strengthen the position of those countries in world economy, and to provide for discussion on matters of food production, energy, raw materials and development assistance with regard to these countries whose needs are the greatest. Of course, he said, the climate is better, but we must not forget that getting there will be a long and difficult proposition. A big effort will be needed to create a better economic balance between industrial and underdeveloped countries, or, as it has been said, to set up a new international economic order.

After Mr. Van Lennep's speech, I had the opportunity to make a few comments on certain operations of the OECD which are of particular interest to Canada. I told the assembly that our country had been glad to endorse the "Trade Pledge" adopted by member countries in May 1974, as well as its renewal for another year as of last spring. Canada believes that this statement, along with the creation of the Financial Support Fund, which Canada supported enthusiastically, will contribute to economic stability and restore confidence among industrialized countries. As an important trading nation depending so much on our external trade, it is of considerable interest to us that commercial exchanges be as free as possible. Our present economic situation is very similar to that of the majority of the member countries of the OECD and that is why Canada depends to a very large extent upon greater cooperation between all the industrialized countries and upon the economic recovery of our neighbour to the south to improve our situation.

Another point which I emphasized was the creation by the OECD, in January 1975, of a committee on international investment, especially by multinational companies.

I mentioned that Canada took a very special interest in the project as one of the countries which have obtained the largest foreign investments. That is why a task force was set up and we, in Canada, have submitted many suggestions in this regard. I pointed out that one of the important aspects stressed by Canada with regard to that code of ethics, was that the latter must address itself to the multinational companies rather than to the governments, mainly because of its extraterritorial legal applications. We sincerely hope that the committee of the OECD will go ahead with that code.

Another Canadian delegate who took part in the debate was Mr. Gerald Baldwin; he dealt mainly with the question of energy. He mentioned that, at the present time, Canada imports energy, and that in spite of our tremendous energy resources, we will surely develop them, not only in our own interest but also in that of the rest of the world. That is why, he said, it is important for other countries to join us in the exploration and development of those resources. He added that he agreed with the government decision concerning the setting-up of an international energy agency.

During his remarks, Mr. Baldwin called the attention of the Assembly to the important question of the conservation of the energy now at our disposal. He deplored the fact that in many parts of the world this problem seems to be somewhat ignored. In the fight against pollution and waste of energy, he averred, parliamentarians have an eminent role to play, not only to enlighten public opinion but also to help governments make the difficult decisions which must be made.

The other Canadian delegate who took part in that debate—there were three of us—was Mr. Marcel Prud'homme who dealt with the matter of our relations with the underdeveloped countries. He said he rejoiced in the fact that the members of OECD appreciate the importance of their relations with those countries, for their voice must not remain unheard. He reminded the Assembly that our Secretary for External Affairs, Mr. MacEachen, at the 7th Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly, in early September, mentioned the importance of avoiding a confrontation and of ensuring, through positive cooperation, a better solution to our difficulties, more particularly in the fields of basic commodities, including, of course, energy resources. He added that Canada does recognize the validity of the suggestions on the new international economic order, and that our country will do its best to reduce the unacceptable disparity between rich and poor countries.

On this subject, he said that our country had announced its strategy on international development cooperation for 1975-80, at the special meeting of the United Nations held early in September. He also mentioned a few essential points of that new policy. I presume honourable senators have heard about this new strategy which, in fact, was made public even before the special session of the United Nations was held in New York in early September. Moreover, I think honourable senators may have received the document; if not, it will be easy for them to get it, and then they will be able to read about the strategy the Canadian government wants to adopt for the coming years, namely, from 1975 to 1980, to respond to a request made at one of the sessions of the ministerial council of OECD, to improve the economic situation in the world.

Mr. Prud'homme concluded his remarks wishing that the legitimate rights and aspirations of the developing countries become the main criteria of our discussions and action.

On Tuesday, October 7, in the morning, the presentation and the discussion of the report of the Commission on Economic Affairs and Development on European shipping policy was on the agenda. I was then given the opportunity of outlining briefly Canada's position on this subject. I stated that our country to a very large extent depends on its export markets for the balance of its economy. I added that because Canada has had no merchant marine since the end of the last war, we largely depend on our system of free competition between shipping companies, which are members of the shipping conferences and the others, to get the best and most economical service possible. I also added that if our country failed to sign the United Nations agreement on a code of behaviour for the shipping conferences in Geneva last year, it was because we were opposed to certain clauses in this code, in particular those aimed at reducing competition between the different shipping companies, and also because the conciliation procedures had been formulated too hastily.

To conclude, I informed the assembly that our government was now considering the possibility of initiating a new shipping policy and that this policy would be released shortly. Canada will then be in a better position to present further suggestions concerning the code of conduct of sea conferences.

During the afternoon of October 7, the question of the relations between Western Europe, Canada and the United States was on the agenda, and Mr. Gerald Baldwin was the speaker for the Canadian delegation. After having made it clear that Canada was in no way prepared to sacrifice the close relationship it has with the United States, Mr. Baldwin said that Canada was nevertheless eager to develop closer links with other parts of the world, particularly Europe from which we inherited our language and culture. Since the European community was enlarged, it has become one of Canada's major trading partners, he said, and our Parliament has concluded an agreement with the European Parliament providing for a yearly meeting to be held alternately in Europe and in Canada. As far as the relations between the Council of Europe and Canada are concerned, he indicated that the President of the Consultative Assembly, Mr. Vedovato, had agreed with the Speakers of both our Houses to hold those parliamentary encounters regularly.

As stated in the proposed resolution, he added, the democratic governments must first reaffirm their loyalty to genuine democratic ideals and their determination to check the continuous erosion of democratic institutions. At a time when the interdependence of nations becomes more and more evident, he said, in concluding, it should be easier for the countries to cooperate, provided that they respect freedom of information and expression. It is in this spirit that we Canadians intend to cooperate with Europe.

Those are, honourable senators, the remarks I wished to make concerning this meeting with the members of the Council of Europe which, in my opinion and in that of both my colleagues from the House of Commons, has been most rewarding, interesting and successful.

In concluding, I would like on behalf of my colleagues and myself to thank most especially the President of the Assembly of the Council of Europe, Mr. Czernetz, for the warm attention he extended to us during the meetings of the Assembly, as well as Mr. and Mrs. Guarneri, who attended to the Canadian delegates during our stay in Strasbourg. I also have to mention the precious and clever cooperation that Mrs. Carol Seaborn, who acted as an adviser and secretary to our delegation, extended to us during this meeting.

● (1500)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES OF SENATORS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Perrault, pursuant to notice, moved:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon the privileges and immunities that apply to members of the Senate within the precincts of the Senate, and the powers of the Speaker in respect thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion flows from the recent debate in which the matter of the privileges and immunities of senators within the precincts of the Senate were discussed. There was a general belief expressed at that time that, because of the rather indeterminate nature of the precedents which would apply to such occurrences as the search that was made of a senator's office, and the general lack of specific information about those privileges and immunities which exist here, it would be useful to have a special committee look into the question, without going into the issues affecting any one particular senator. The motion would have only the general question discussed.

The special committee that it is proposed be set up would endeavour to establish a list of the immunities and privileges that exist, and report its views back to the Senate.

Senator Croll: On a matter of privilege, honourable senators, I would like to raise one question. Are we not liable to embarrass a fellow senator if we start such an investigation? The idea will go out to the public that we are doing something that we are not supposed to be doing. Should we not let the matter rest until some later time? I think it is quite unfair to the senator whose name has been bandied about for us to hold any investigation or inquiry at this particular time.

Senator Perrault: There are two things I should like to say in reply to that.

First of all, the terms of reference of this committee specifically exclude reference to any particular case, or any individual situation, which may be under discussion.

Secondly, it is not necessary, if that is the wish of the Senate, to rush into this within a two-day period. However, at some point I think it would be useful to have this committee develop a list of privileges and immunities which may exist, so that it will be available for senators, the Speaker, and the staff, should situations arise in the future. In my view, such a list would be helpful.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the Leader of the Government has made it clear—and if he has not, I wish to make it clear—that the event which happened about ten days ago is not the cause, but the occasion of this motion. As everyone knows, in that particular case consent was given for the search of the office in question.

[Senator Bourget.]

As a consequence of this situation, however, several questions arose in the Senate. For example, do we have immunities or privileges, and if so what are they? We are not seeking extended immunities or privileges; we are asking if we have them, and what they are.

I think it has been clearly established that any immunity or privilege available to senators in the precincts of the Senate does not extend to criminal matters, but we would like—and I think this is the purpose of the motion—to clarify what “immunity” or “privilege” means.

It might not be necessary to go that far but, in any event, it is quite clear that the matter of immunity or privilege governing the searching of offices of members of Parliament without a warrant should be clarified.

It is not the problem of our colleague with which we are dealing at this time, because, as I mentioned before, he had given permission for the search, and there was a search warrant issued on the basis of certain sections of the Criminal Code. The idea in the present case is to probe the matter and see if it is not possible, under the guise of a criminal offence or under some other pretext, for the office of a member of Parliament to be searched.

I say again that the purpose is not to establish new immunities or privileges, but, rather, to find out what privileges and immunities, if any, we now enjoy. It may be that the timing is not of the best, but in any event it is better to look at the matter now, before another event similar to the one that occurred recently takes place.

I am not afraid of the press. This mania of always being afraid of the press is not one of which I approve. In any event, the press does not care about us at all. That is the first point, and probably the only point worth bearing in mind.

● (1510)

What I am interested in is an objective consideration of this problem. We can always consider the timing, but in my view the timing is only a matter of opportunism in the present case. We have had enough publicity on this, and I don't really expect that the press will pay much attention to us again for some time.

What I want to find out from this committee study is whether we have some immunities and privileges, and, if so, how far they go. Do they go too far? If they do, then let the committee say so.

As far as the problem of procedure in the execution of a search warrant within the precincts of the Senate is concerned, I would like to see the committee give some advice to the Speaker of the Senate and to the staff so that, if this should occur again, they will be able to proceed in a clearly-established manner that is fair not only to the members of the Senate but to the public in general. If a search has to take place, then it should take place, but we should set down very clearly the method to be followed in such cases. That is what I think the committee should direct a good part of its time to.

Again, I emphasize that I am not discussing Senator Giguère's problem. I say that this simply provided an occasion, and is not the cause of our seeking to set up this committee.

I think an objective study of this method can take place. As the Leader of the Government has said, we do not have to start it tomorrow; we may have discussions as to the membership of this special committee. If we do not do it before Christmas, we can do it after, but I think it is in the best interests of the Senate, and the best interests of the public, that we try to clarify the situation.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I will not discuss the merits of the motion moved by the government leader. I seldom disagree with the Opposition leader on such important matters.

However, I wonder why we should establish that committee now. Why did the Senate not think of that earlier? It was said when the motion was introduced that it was not because of the Giguère case, but on the occasion of the Giguère case.

It was also said—the government leader said so—that there was no objection to setting up a parliamentary committee on Senator Giguère's request if, of course, the official Opposition agreed. We as sensible people said it was not up to the Senate to solve the Giguère case, that it was up to the House of Commons, that the House of Commons had raised the problem and that it was up to them to find a solution.

So what we cannot do directly, we are now trying to do indirectly.

Willy nilly, when discussing privileges and immunities as applied to senators, we shall, of course, be referring to the Giguère case, because the Giguère case is the reason why this motion was introduced in the Senate; indirectly, honourable senators, we shall be ruling on the Giguère case through that committee.

It is not that I am afraid of journalists. Yet I say the time is ill-chosen for the government leader to appoint such a committee. Whether we like it or not, whether journalists or the public in general are concerned, what scares me most is that the public in general is beginning to question the credibility of the Senate and wonder why we now appoint such a committee to discuss the privileges and immunities of senators, especially as the Giguère matter was raised in the other place.

I say that this is not the right time, and we could do it more objectively once the matter is settled, and that we are placing ourselves in a delicate situation, where we cannot defend ourselves. Besides, I think people will say that the Senate is looking for privileges and parliamentary immunities on the occasion of the Giguère matter because the police obtained a search warrant and the Honourable the Speaker acknowledged the search warrant. The role of the Speaker of the Senate would be determined by that committee. I think the precedent has already been established. We know that the Speaker of the Senate is appointed, not elected, as is the Speaker of the House of Commons. I think that this is quite clear in my mind.

So I say that I regret that this very moment was chosen to set up this committee. Whether we want it or not, it is all very nice to say that it did not come on account of the Giguère case—but who would have thought of setting up this committee had it not been for the question raised about Senator Giguère in this chamber? I have the impression that by proceeding hastily in setting up the committee to look into the immunities and privileges of senators, we are doing the Senate a bad turn. So let us wait until the Giguère case is closed, and after that we may have the committee we want to look into and define the privileges and immunities of senators.

[English]

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, I notice that the motion does not include the authority to hire counsel or staff, and I am wondering if there is some general authority that would permit that. It seems to me that most of this will require legal research. If there is no such authority, does the Leader of the Government conclude that the Law Clerk of the Senate has sufficient resources and staff available to him to undertake the amount of research required for this inquiry?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the committee would decide whether legal counsel is required or not. It may prove to be unnecessary. I want to provide an assurance to Senator Asselin, who has expressed certain concerns. I am not aware of whether Senator Asselin was present the other day when we had quite a lengthy discussion.

Senator Asselin: Yes, I was here. I remember that Senator Prowse raised the question.

Senator Perrault: Then you will remember the arguments invoked on that occasion. There would or should be no attempt made here on the part of the Senate to somehow provide a protective cordon around the Senate to make it immune from any kind of legitimate investigation. But I must commend the Leader of the Opposition for a most eloquent statement this afternoon. He set out in very cogent fashion the reason why it is appropriate for the Senate to examine some of its rules, traditions and customs, and some of the terms of reference which should apply should such a situation arise again. There is no attempt here either to conduct a witch hunt or provide some special protection for the Senate. This is a democratic body, and there is no attempt here to invoke laws, privileges or immunities which ordinarily do not apply to other Canadians. The fact is that until recent events no apparent need has existed for a clarification of the position of senators, the Speaker and the staff should law enforcement officers arrive here with warrants to search certain offices.

But, honourable senators, the question goes beyond a matter of simply searching offices. The whole area of privileges and immunities which exist here should be clarified. And when the honourable senator says that this is something that we should leave to the House of Commons, then I want to say that I do not think it is appropriate for the House of Commons to determine the kind of rules, procedures and terms of reference which should apply in the Senate.

Senator Asselin: I did not say that.

Senator Perrault: Well, I regret that I may have misunderstood your remarks.

Senator Asselin: I said that the Giguère case was raised in the House of Commons, and it should be judged in the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault: The facts and the allegations in the Giguère case are now under study by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the investigation should be left there.

It was agreed the other day that there should be no attempt by this chamber to conduct a parallel investigation, but we do have the right at any time to determine the rules of this chamber and to suggest how our traditions should be interpreted, and how our privileges and immunities, if any, should apply here. These are perfectly legitimate questions for the Senate to study, without any reference whatsoever to individual cases.

● (1520)

As I stated earlier, I am fully in support of the position taken so eloquently by the Leader of the Opposition on this issue.

On motion of Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 20, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1975—
REFERRAL BY COMMONS TO SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that Bill C-52, an Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, has been referred to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, later this afternoon I may seek leave to move that the Senate concurs in the reference by the House of Commons of Bill C-52 to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. It is a concurrent motion to extend the powers of the committee in question.

[Later:]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the statement made by the Deputy Leader of the Government respecting the referral of Bill C-52 to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service is not sufficient to clarify the whole problem. I understand that that committee is scheduled to meet at 3.30 this afternoon, which would, I suppose, make this matter one of "urgency or importance," as is mentioned in rule 20.

I am wondering whether the motion will be made in time for the Senate members of that committee, or any other honourable senator who wishes, to attend with the authorization of the Senate.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, a motion of concurrence is in the process of being drafted. Hopefully, I will be in a position to request leave of the Senate to revert to Notices of Motions before 3.30 p.m., at which time I will introduce that motion.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act, for the fiscal year ended

March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 49 of the said Act, Chapter C-23, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1975-2599, dated November 7, 1975, amending Part II of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said Act, Chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Carter, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, November 24, 1975, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put I should like to give the house a word of explanation. In proposing the adjournment of the Senate until Monday evening at 8 o'clock, I have taken into consideration the work to be done in the committees and in the Senate itself before the Christmas adjournment. In fact, it may well be that for the next few weeks it will be necessary for us to commence our week's sittings on Mondays, although consideration will be given to the suggestion that we do so on Tuesday afternoons instead. No decision has been taken so far in this respect.

On Tuesday, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the chairman has advised me that if Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2), has been referred, the committee will deal with it first. Then it will continue its study of Bill C-2, the Combines Investigation Act, and then commence its advance study of the subject matter of Bill C-73, the anti-inflation legislation. The committee will continue in the afternoon at 2.15, if the Senate so agrees. The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is scheduled to meet at 9.30 a.m.

● (1410)

The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has planned a meeting on the Green Paper on Conflict of Interest for 2.30 p.m., this also, of course, being subject to approval by the Senate. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 8 p.m.

On Wednesday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue with the subject matter of Bills C-73 and C-60. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has scheduled a meeting for 3.30 p.m. There may also be a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region at 11 a.m., but this is not yet definite.

In the Senate, we shall continue with the items on the Order Paper, and it is expected that Bill C-41, the Western Grain Stabilization Act, will come to us by Wednesday of next week.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I merely wish to put on the record that in my opinion the workload coming to us next week is concerned mostly with committee meetings. It is not quite obvious to me why we should meet on Monday night, as I believe it would be sufficient to meet on Tuesday. I say this, although personally I cannot be here next Monday night. However, in my opinion the Senate has not such a workload as to cause it to meet before Tuesday evening. I will be present on Tuesday morning due to the committee work. I do not insist on this point at all, but it seems to me, from the way the deputy leader explained the program, that a Monday night sitting of the Senate is not necessary.

Senator Asselin: Is there any reply? No, no reply.

Motion agreed to:

[Later:]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to make a slight correction with respect to the statement I made earlier on our workload for next week. I have just been informed that it would be difficult for the reporting staff to cover two committees and the house sitting at the same time on Tuesday afternoon. Therefore, I have asked the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to hold his meeting when the Senate rises on Tuesday, instead of at 2.30 p.m.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday, November 25, and Wednesday, November 26, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Langlois.]

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday next, November 25, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: The house has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

AID TO CHILE—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government another of those questions of mine which I am afraid he will have to take as notice.

Is Canada now providing any aid, direct or indirect, to Chile, by grants, loans, re-scheduling of debts, technical assistance or otherwise?

If so, what are the terms of such aid or assistance?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret I do not have that information at my desk. I must take the question as notice and I shall endeavour to obtain the information as quickly as possible.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, Senator Forsey's question prompts me to point out that something should be done about our rules to distinguish between oral and written questions. Oral questions should be used only in matters of urgency that can be replied to, under normal circumstances, immediately. Written questions are what we should provide for in our rules for instances which require statistical information.

I discussed this matter previously with the Chairman of the Rules Committee and the Clerk. In my view, something should be done about this, because there is quite a difference between a question that can be put during the question period and one that can be put on the Order Paper in written form.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, may I seek guidance on this? How can anyone put a question on the Order Paper in written form unless it's in the form of an inquiry? Is that what the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting?

Senator Flynn: I am suggesting that the rules be amended to meet the point made by Senator Forsey.

Senator Forsey: The new rules call it the "Oral Question Period," I think.

Senator Flynn: The rule speaks of urgent questions.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have served in two or three different elected forums. It is often a matter of determining at the moment whether or not a question may be appropriate as an oral or written question.

In defence of Senator Forsey, I would certainly say that a question asking whether we are extending any aid to Chile is one that might be known by the government leader in this or any other chamber, but a more detailed question asking for statistical information is certainly of the kind that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has discussed. I regret that I do not immediately have the reply to the general question whether aid is being extended to Chile, and certainly the statistical information will be more difficult to come by.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government may be right, but Senator Forsey trapped me into this question by saying it was one of his usual questions that could not be answered immediately.

Senator Forsey: I said I was afraid it might be. I do not like to suggest that the Leader of the Government does not possess the encyclopaedic knowledge that would be required to answer some of these questions.

I may point out in justification, honourable senators, that I didn't ask for anything statistical. I merely asked if there was aid being provided. If I had said, "How much money is being given by way of aid?" and so on, that might have been a different matter.

Senator Flynn: I will discuss my point with Senator Forsey in due course.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—STATEMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if there are no further questions, I have another report on the Post Office situation.

Letter carrier delivery of federal and, in some cases, provincial pension and assistance cheques began this morning with no apparent problems.

Offices opening in Kincardine and Port Elgin in southwestern Ontario and Barrie and New Liskeard in northern Ontario now mean that 160 staff offices, of a total of 446 staff offices, or nearly 36 per cent, are in operation. Manpower has now topped 2,200, or 10 per cent, compared with the 2,000 strikers back on the job as reported here yesterday afternoon.

Heavy picketing at the Alta Vista terminal in Ottawa—an estimated 200 are on the picket line—apparently has had some effect on manpower there, with only 164 on the job compared with 186 on Wednesday. Police have removed seven of the picketers, some of whom are believed to be from Toronto.

British Columbia-Yukon District reports this morning there are rumours of problems developing this morning at the Trail office as CUPW has asked all union personnel to prevent letter carriers from entering the post office to pick up the federal cheques.

The Vancouver local is reported to have met this morning to decide whether to allow letter carriers to cross picket lines. A later report from the Metro Toronto area, received a short time ago, shows that an additional six offices are open in Metro Toronto, Ajax, Richmond Hill, Agincourt, Westhill, Pickering and Thornhill, increasing the number open from the 160 I reported earlier to 166, and the percentage to 37.2 per cent.

Senator Choquette: We are getting there slowly.

● (1420)

UNITED NATIONS

ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION ON ZIONISM—QUESTION

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government can now instruct the Senate as to what action, if any, the government proposes to take as a result of the shameful resolution of the United Nations equating Zionism with racism.

Senator Perrault: I reported to the chamber on Tuesday last the position of the government on this question vis-à-vis the United Nations and Canada's assistance to developing nations. I refer honourable senators to Hansard of Tuesday, November 18, for the details of that statement. Beyond that, I have nothing further to add at this time.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND, (NO. 2)—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 18, the debate on the motion of Senator Hayden for second reading of Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2).

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, in resuming this debate on the occasion of this my first speech in this chamber, I humbly ask your indulgence while I make a few remarks of a personal nature before coming to the subject matter of Bill C-65.

It is, of course, a great honour to be given the privilege of sitting in this chamber in which so many great men and women have served in years gone by, and where such a group of highly distinguished and extremely able Canadians now meet to grapple with the affairs of this tremendous country and its people. It is an honour which I neither sought nor expected, but one which I appreciate deeply. Indeed, I hope I shall not prove unworthy of it.

I believe I am here as the first appointment made under a certain new policy. Although my opinion is not likely to be a disinterested one in relation to that policy, I think it is a wise one, and I wish to express to the Prime Minister my appreciation of it and, of course, my appreciation of its application to me.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wish to express as heartily as I can my thanks to all honourable senators for the warm and generous way in which I was made welcome, and for the many kindnesses which I have been shown.

In particular, I wish to express my gratitude to you, Madam Speaker, for your delightful welcome and your generous hospitality.

Honourable senators, it is, I understand, traditional in most legislatures in our system of government that a new member is not expected to be unduly aggressive or critical when making his or her first speech, and I suppose that tradition is no stranger here. I hope my words and conduct today will not be in breach of it, but I do have to say that I cannot guarantee to be all sweetness and light.

Of course, I am happy to see a considerable number of old friends and acquaintances. I notice that this is a place in which it seems to be considered appropriate to gather politicians who have been first ministers in their own provinces. I must say that this is a practice which now commends itself to me much more warmly than it formerly did. I draw the attention of the power that is to the fact that there is still available material of high quality as yet unsummoned.

In this chamber I join two honourable gentlemen who preceded me as Leader of the Government of Nova Scotia—Senator Hicks, and Senator Harold Connolly whose health unfortunately keeps him away for the time being. The presence of the three of us here, and of a fourth in the other place, occasionally brings to mind the fleeting thought that the path to the Premier's office in Nova Scotia has a tendency to wind its way to Parliament Hill, though I must say it is indeed something of a novelty for me to find myself on the same side of the Speaker as Senator Hicks.

May I now turn, honourable senators—and briefly I hope—to Bill C-65. I say at once that I intend to vote for the motion that it be read a second time, though there are some things about it which I believe could be improved, and one thing that I think could be improved very substantially indeed. I do not propose to discuss every clause of the bill, and those that I do not mention I am quite happy to accept as they are.

My first comment, which will be of no novelty to honourable senators, of course, is that this bill is in very considerable part a most technical and complicated bill, written in the technical and difficult-to-understand manner which has become typical of all tax legislation. Indeed, it has to be written that way to fit into the act it is intended to amend, but that does not make it any easier to follow. To know what it means one must not only understand its words, but be able to fit them properly into the right places in the present act, and then see what the whole amended sections mean and try to ascertain the intention of the amendment, the object it is designed to achieve.

Though I say so hesitantly, knowing again that it is not the subject of any novelty to honourable senators, and with due respect for my recent arrival here, it does seem to me that quite possibly this situation might be substantially improved. I know that what was printed in the version of the bill when it was first introduced into the other place, and even what was in the bill when it came before us, would indeed be of considerable help in trying to understand it. However, that explanation itself does not do anything but fit the proposed amendment into the existing section. It does not explain what is being achieved by the amendment, what is the object of the amendment.

It seems to me, with all due humility, and with all respect to existing customs, that it would be a relatively easy task for the draftsmen to draw up a brief explanation as well as something which indicates what the new section will read like, and it would not be a great task to include that explanation in at least the first version of the bill as it comes to this chamber.

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

As Senator Hayden said on Tuesday night when he moved second reading of the bill, some of the most important parts of it are left to be implemented by regulation. He referred to the fact that we do not have these regulations before us in draft form, and remarked that this is a regrettable situation. I wish not only to agree with him but to say even more vigorously, if I can, that when the regulations deal with such fundamental matters, as is the case here, it is completely unsatisfactory to be asked to consider the bill without the draft regulations before us.

• (1430)

It also seems to me, honourable senators, that this sort of thing displays a feeling that Parliament can readily be taken for granted, and that is not a course of action that should go without criticism.

Clause 2 of the bill deals with the deduction of $1,000 per taxpayer in respect of interest and dividends. I believe it is a good provision and mention it only to seek clarification. When I read this clause, I thought it meant that each spouse was entitled to claim $1,000, and that if one spouse did not have enough income to claim the full $1,000, then the unclaimed balance could be added to the $1,000 of the other spouse.

I further thought that this extended even to the situation where one spouse had no income and filed no income tax return, so that the other spouse could claim the full $2,000 if he or she had sufficient income to do so. I thought, and still think, that is what Senator Hayden said. I still think that is what he means. After reading the exchange between some senators, which is to be found at page 1422 of Hansard for November 18, 1975, it seems prudent to me to seek assurance on that point and I mention it for that purpose.

Clause 9 deals with a variety of matters, which seem rather strangely lumped together. Among them is a provision for a tax credit, which is called an investment tax credit. This is a credit of 5 per cent of the capital cost on a rather long list of what are called qualified properties. Undoubtedly, this will be a useful provision because it will encourage investment in productive facilities. The list of eligible kinds of properties is fairly wide.

As I understand it, however, any portion of property used by the taxpayer for storing his product on the premises at the completion of processing or manufacturing, or whatever he has to do with it, is not eligible. The same is to be true in respect of property used for necessary administration.

It is certainly not obvious to me why there should be such an exclusion. Surely, satisfactory facilities for storing the product until it can be shipped, and for the administration of the enterprise, are just as necessary to production as the building that houses the machinery. Perhaps it would not be thought presumptuous of me if I were to suggest that the committee to which this bill is referred take a look at that situation.

Clause 10 of the bill deals with registered retirement savings plans. The existing provisions of the Income Tax Act are certainly very helpful in this respect, and a real encouragement to saving. As I understand it, the changes proposed in the bill are intended to remedy a situation in which, by some manipulation, a taxpayer may gain some tax advantages which the tax authorities think he should not have. I am not by any means convinced they are justified in thinking that, from what I have heard, but perhaps they are. The amendment will also have the effect of reducing the number of taxpayers who can properly take advantage of such a plan, and the amount which taxpayers can pay into it. I hope the committee to which the bill is referred will satisfy itself that the alleged abuse exists, and that in searching for a remedy the authorities have not put forth a proposal which will adversely affect deserving people. I must say it looks pretty heavy-handed to me.

I should like next to consider the question of the "resource allowance" to taxpayers engaged in the petroleum and mineral industries, which is dealt with in clause 1 of the bill. This is the matter in respect of which Senator Hayden made reference to the fact that we had no draft regulations before us. He told us, however, that he believes, on what seems to be pretty good evidence, that this allowance will, in fact, be set out in the regulations yet to be made—yet to be made, I repeat—although this matter was referred to in the budget speech of June 23. He said the allowance will be set out in regulations yet to be made, and will be "25 per cent of the profits of a petroleum or mineral industry, determined after all the operating costs and the capital cost allowances have been deducted," but before any deductions for costs of development and exploration, interest and depletion.

Senator Hayden pointed out that if the regulations do so provide, as he believes they will, the result will be that taxpayers will benefit substantially because tax will be levied on a lower amount of the profits. Of course, that is correct. He also draws attention to the lowering, from 50 per cent to 46 per cent, of the rate of income tax levied on such corporations, and to the lowering of the Alberta royalty. Based on these projected changes, he gave us certain figures to illustrate the improved position of such corporate taxpayers. He demonstrated that the taxpayer actively engaged in exploration and development, out of an increased price of $1.50 per barrel of oil, would, under the proposal, retain 71 cents as opposed to 21 cents, which is an increase to the taxpayer of 50 cents on every dollar.

However, you will note, honourable senators, that of this the federal government would contribute 20 cents and the Alberta government 30 cents, to make up the total of 50 cents. I believe we should certainly welcome these changes—and I do. Senator Hayden believes that they will help to expand the tremendous capacity of Canada in this field. I hope he is right, but I could not help but note particularly his comment to the effect that industry is in a difficult position. Let me quote him, according to Hansard:

If there are two phases of industry in Canada that are in an almost impossible position at the present time, they are petroleum and oil, and the mineral resources industries.

I think he is right, but I must then ask, "Who put them there?" I suppose it is possible to argue that the federal government is not entirely responsible for it, but I do suggest it is impossible to argue that the federal government does not have to bear a heavy share of the responsibility for putting those companies in the position so accurately described by Senator Hayden.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Smith (Colchester): It is therefore necessary, I think, to temper our rejoicing by keeping in mind that these changes at best represent an apparent change of heart on the part of those who have caused the trouble. Who is to say how deep this change runs, or how long it will last. Is this conversion from the path of sin a real one based on true repentance? Or is it a passing deviation into righteousness to be followed sooner or later by the back-sliding that has spoiled so many conversions? Who can tell?

I cannot help but think of a farmer I know who had developed a habit of looking much too often upon the wine when it was red. After some unhappy episodes, his wife persuaded him to promise to give up drinking. He did so—with great vigour! But, just in case, he had a bottle of rum in the barn.

● (1440)

On this point, let me refer to the fact that either the amount of the so-called resource allowance, or the formula for applying it, appears in the bill, so far as I can tell, and I think Senator Hayden feels the same way. Let me read from clause 1 of the bill:

(1) Subsection 20(1) of the Income Tax Act is amended by adding thereto, immediately after paragraph (v) thereof, the following paragraph:

"(v.1) such amount as is allowed to the taxpayer for the year by regulation in respect of oil or gas wells in Canada or mineral resources in Canada;"

I emphasize those words, "such amount as is allowed . . . by regulation".

The amendment contained in subclause 1(2) contains the following words:

—The Governor in Council may prescribe the formula by which the amount that may be allowed to the taxpayer by such regulation shall be determined.

It is therefore perfectly clear that the amount of the credit under the formula used to calculate how that credit shall be applied is to be left to regulation at some future time, presumably before the first day of January 1976. It is also clear that the government intends to reserve to itself the right to fix, by regulation, the amount of the allowance and the formula by which it may be applied. I repeat that for the sake of emphasis.

I cannot help but recall that one of the characteristics of a regulation that the government finds very appealing is that it can be changed at any time the government takes a notion to do so.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Senator Smith (Colchester): In this case, honourable senators, what other reason can the government possibly have for not putting the basic provisions into the bill, except that it wants to be free to change the amount of the allowance, and the formula for applying it, whenever it wishes to do so?

Senator Flynn: Unless it does not know where it is going?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, sometimes one wonders about that, too.

The reason cannot be that the government, when the bill was introduced in the other place, did not know what it wanted to do, because the amount in the formula given to us by Senator Hayden is the same as the one set out in the budget speech by the Minister of Finance on June 23, as anyone can see by referring to House of Commons Debates of that date, where it appears at page 7033. It is also set out on page 36 of the budget highlights, as Senator Hayden said.

We are forced to conclude, as long as these provisions are not in the bill, that that is clear evidence that the government desires to keep itself in a position of being able to change them at will, without reference to Parliament. And I cannot help but ask, honourable senators, what sort of basis this is for even short-term planning, much less medium- or long-term planning. How can this be the basis of planning the expansion of Canada's tremendous capacities unless taxpayers can rely on its having a better foundation than a mere government notion?

It is true that a majority government can very likely persuade Parliament to pass legislation to change the law if it sets out to do so, but it can only achieve this object after its wish has been subjected to debate and the scrutiny of Parliament and its committees, and, at the same time, exposed to the sobering light of the publicity which that process involves. Such a fundamental basis for encouraging the development of our resources should surely rest upon the will of Parliament, and not merely on the will of the government of the day. Only then can it be truly said, I submit, that this is the basis for the kind of medium- and long-term planning that is necessary if the provision is to bring to our country the substantial beneficial effects of which it appears to be capable.

As I understand the legislative process of Parliament, it is not yet too late to make this improvement to the bill, and I respectfully, and with all humility, urge the committee to which it is referred to recommend such an improvement.

Honourable senators, I close by thanking you for the attention you have given me.

Senator Flynn: No reply? No reply is possible.

Senator Langlois: In due course.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois, for Senator Hayden, moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

AMBASSADOR OF POLAND AND MRS. CZESAK

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would like to welcome some distinguished visitors in the gallery, His Excellency Jozef Czesak, Ambassador of Poland, and Mrs. Czesak.

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1975—
SENATE CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS REFERRAL TO SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the Senate concurs in the reference by the House of Commons of the Bill C-52, intituled: "An Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act, and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act," to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, the Senate members of this committee should be warned again that there is a meeting of the committee at 3.30 this afternoon, so there is no time to lose.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the reason why this motion of concurrence was moved so late is that although the motion referring the bill to committee was passed in the other place some time last week, it was only today that the message from the other place was received. I wish to take this opportunity to inform the Senate that I believe that the wrong procedure was followed in this case. Even though no message had been sent to the Senate in connection with this referral to the special joint committee, instructions were given to our committee clerks by the Clerk of the other house to call a meeting of the committee this afternoon. That is most irregular, and that is why I have insisted on moving such a motion today—just to indicate to the other place that we are not to be dictated to by anybody outside this house.

Senator Flynn: There is no criticism of the Leader of the Government, or the Deputy Leader, here. We have both been in agreement from the beginning on this matter, and we are in agreement still.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to mention that I have the honour of being co-chairman of this committee. My point in rising at this moment is to say that this bill has some significance for members of this house. It amends the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and I, as co-chairman, and I am sure other members of the committee, would be pleased to hear any representations, comments or instructions. I say that because I presume that this will be the committee study made by the Senate of the bill, and that when it does come before us here it will not again be referred to committee. Therefore, this is our opportunity to make sure that our interests are properly represented.

Motion agreed to.

● (1450)

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 13, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, first of all I want to congratulate our colleague, Senator Smith (Colchester), on the excellent presentation which he made in the Senate this afternoon. We are very happy to have among the ranks of the Official Opposition a man of such vast experience. In welcoming him to the Senate, let me say that I am sure that he will always make a very useful contribution to our work.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I had put down my name to speak this afternoon on the White Paper introduced by the government leader in the Senate on the anti-inflation guidelines. I listened carefully to the comments made by the government leader and feel that he did not introduce that paper in his usual way. He seemed to me less enthusiastic, more diffident. I thought he was introducing that paper without much conviction and only to discharge a responsibility entrusted to him, obviously with reason. When one knows that the same government during the 1974 campaign fought fiercely against the anti-inflation program of the Conservative Party, it is not surprising to note that throughout the country the government's credibility is seriously challenged. But in 1974 it was a different matter. We were in an election campaign. The Liberals wanted to win the election, whatever the economic and social consequences. The main thing for the Liberals, as always, is power at any cost. To gain that power, they will even promote unacceptable economic arguments. We remember the Prime Minister's statement on the 1974 budget, when he said:

This is not an easy budget. We do not want the easy solution of the NDP nor the salary controls of the Conservatives; we want a policy enabling our economy to remain the best in the world.

Referring to Hansard for October 20, 1975, we see that the Prime Minister had also this to say on May 7, 1974 about the problems related to inflation:

It is true that our attack on inflation is not a simple one. It is a complex one. It is a complex solution to a complex problem. We certainly reject the simple, and perhaps simple-minded, approach that has been brought to bear by the Opposition on this question.

And he added:

These Tory controls would control the wages of the working man. Prices have already risen very high, and controls will not bring them down. If you freeze high prices, there are still high prices; but if you freeze wages, there are still low wages.

The same statements were made by the Liberals during the 1974 campaign. You will remember how the Prime Minister, during a long speech delivered in Toronto, went all out to mock the anti-inflation program of the Conservative Party. He was taking pleasure in repeating to workers: "The Conservatives do not want to freeze prices mostly, but what they do want is to freeze your salaries." Besides, we still remember the Liberal Party slogan for 1974: Canadian workers do not want the salary freeze, so vote Liberal.

Honourable senators, how is it a government which, in my opinion, knowingly misled the Canadian people during the 1974 campaign, is still governing the country today? Such about-face on such serious economic matters cannot and will never be accepted by Canadians. Besides, if one looks at and studies the White Paper outlining the guidelines against inflation as brought in by the government House leader, one is led to raise various questions. What are the general causes of inflation? Personally I think it results first of all from an overly high, unjustified and extravagant money supply. It is obvious that governments, both federal and provincial, put too much money in circulation. We are told that by stopping we would restrict the money supply and create unemployment. There is a wide gap between the application of restraint and an unduly extravagant policy with regard to the money supply.

But I also think that inflation these last few years has been the result of wasteful spending by governments, especially the federal government.

● (1500)

[English]

Honourable senators, under this government, spending has increased by 192.8 per cent in seven years, and this year alone, according to the June 23 budget, expenditures are forecast to rise on a year-to-year basis by 11.2 per cent. According to spending patterns during the first four months of the current fiscal year, the Honourable Mr. Turner's June forecast of a $3.1 billion budgetary deficit appears to be low by 50 per cent or more.

In short, this government's appetite for spending has been boundless, an appetite fed both by ever-rising tax takes from Canadians and by continuing heavy demands upon the capital markets of the country.

The government said in its White Paper on inflation that it would keep federal spending this year in line with the trend in the gross national product. In other words, federal spending increases would not exceed, over the year, the GNP growth for 1975-76.

The growth in the GNP, by the end of the 1975-76 fiscal year, is not expected to exceed 11 per cent, but government spending, by comparison, is already 14 per cent higher than it was last year. The first of a possible three supplementary spending estimates showed a $1.7 billion federal government spending increase over the main estimates, or a $995 million increase over the June 23 budgetary forecast—and this when the government is asking all Canadians for restraint, and in some cases enforcing it, in support of a policy to contain inflation.

If the supplementary spending estimates to come are as high as the $1.7 billion increase recorded on November 12, it will reconfirm the possibility of a $7 billion budgetary deficit for 1975-76. That is unprecedented.

Then there are examples of outright waste of taxpayers' funds:

The recent opening of Mirabel Airport, at which the government spent something in the order of $20,000 on liquor alone.

Consultants' fees, such as the $11 million the Department of National Defence paid to two United States companies for a study it does not intend to use.

The case of Microsystems, a company in which the government invested $36.7 million, and for that money received no equity or any appointments to the board of directors. The company folded, and the government lost at least $30 million of its original investment.

The government's decision to purchase $3 billion worth of aircraft when, at present, $47 million worth of CF-5s are mothballed.

Salary increases to civil servants in the $50,000 to $60,000 a year range, granted by Cabinet on the very same day it decided on a limit to all other salary increases.

The 105 or so contracts awarded by the Department of Transport since 1968 for consulting services and feasibility studies for Mirabel Airport, at a total recorded cost of $41,022,658.34.

[Translation]

In view of such exorbitant and senseless spending, honourable senators, how can you expect the Canadian people to believe in the good faith of such a government which claims to want to fight inflation?

I, for one, do not believe in the effectiveness of the scheme devised by the government to control prices. Corporations in general, but certainly the multinationals will find loopholes in the control scheme. Retailers and wholesalers will not be compelled to follow the general rule, although it would be essential if we wanted a price control program to succeed. There is no ceiling on corporate profits, and when no such ceiling exists there can be no true price control because there are no regulations at all.

The wage control program is certainly more likely to succeed as it relates mostly to low-income earners. As a matter of fact, the official Opposition has claimed, both here and in the other place, that a great many people the government had not contacted when it tried to sell its guidelines to fight inflation objected to the government imposing a $600 ceiling on the maximum wage hike for low-income earners.

If profit controls do not enable us to stay on the heels of multinational corporations, again it will be the small wage earners limited to $600 who will pay for that fight against inflation. We hope that before Bill C-73 gets to the Senate, the government will have changed its mind and raised this limit from $600 to $1,000.

Indeed, the government should not discourage the small wage earner by limiting his salary, if we do not want him to be the only one to pay the price of the fight against inflation and if we want this program to work.

During this debate we mentioned the constitutional aspect of the legislation. We said that the government referred to the omnibus clause of the Constitution in establishing the guidelines to insure peace, order and good government throughout Canada—the omnibus clause which allows the federal government to get involved in any federal or provincial legislative field—and this is why we said that this measure was constitutional. However, if we refer to the White Paper or the bill, the terms “emergency” and “exceptional” are often mentioned in those measures. We even say that it is an extraordinary, extremely serious situation.

[Senator Asselin.]

I think that rather than referring to the clause of the Constitution that I have just mentioned, the government in trying to legalize its legislation and its guidelines in this bill referred mainly to the National Emergency Act of 1945 when we talked about national emergency in wartime, and that included security, defence, peace, order and the well-being of Canada.

● (1510)

How do you expect the government to say in 1975 that it is an urgent matter, that the economic situation has come to a deadlock, that we must pass legislation to control wages and prices when a year earlier, in 1974, they said there was no point, no necessity in doing so? Now, a year later, they seem to be wanting to take their stand on the statute I have just mentioned, to say that the situation is extremely serious, that we have an emergency situation, and that drastic steps should be taken to restore the balance of our economy.

Honourable senators, I think if those provisions were considered seriously we would have doubts as to the constitutionality of the guidelines in the White Paper, and also of Bill C-73 which is now being dealt with by the House of Commons and which we shall be debating later on.

To enforce such legislation, the government obviously needs the cooperation of every economic sector of Canada. Most of all, they need the cooperation and contribution of the provinces. But the provinces should not be misled. Respecting the wage and price control policy, they should never accept to handing over to the federal government the exclusive jurisdictions which are their sole responsibility to try to enforce that wage and price control legislation. I am extremely worried that provincial governments may have accepted federal moneys to try to set up a rent control board, when they have full jurisdiction within their territory. The provinces should use their own money to establish such rent control boards or other provincial regulatory bodies. They should not accept any federal subsidy. The minute the federal government starts giving moneys, I feel it will in exchange get its hands on provincial jurisdictions, never to return them.

In my view, this legislation could hardly meet its goals, for the reasons I have already stated and a number of others I could give at length. I know other senators wish to participate in this debate. Others have already made a fine contribution. However, I wish I could share in Mr. Pepin's optimism when he appeared yesterday before a Commons committee. He had every hope concerning the bill's objectives and the aims to be achieved.

Unfortunately, I cannot share in his optimism because there are too many contingencies, too many unforeseeables, that may hinder the act's operation.

I want this to be clearly understood. This government fought the Conservative proposals to fight inflation in 1974. Even if the government did an about-face, recognizing its error, the Conservatives were right. I submit that we in the Progressive Conservative Party want this bill to bring the results and achieve the aims that were put forward. Of course, it is not our intention to prevent the passage of such legislation unless the government refuses certain amendments which are quite reasonable and which the Conservative Party will be moving in the House of Commons during the debate on third reading. The leader of the official Opposition suggested in very clear terms—yesterday, I think—that he was prepared to vote in favour of that legislation, provided the government would bring in amendments to cut the range of application of the act down from three years to 18 months, and to raise the maximum increase for small wage earners from $600 to $1,000, as well as other minor amendments that the Conservative Party would like to have accepted before agreeing to the legislation.

Of course we are going to cooperate so that the legislation will bring all the good results the government expects from it. But we also say that the main beneficial, psychological effect of the White Paper and Bill C-73 will be to make Canadians aware. That might be the purpose, the objective this legislation will attain. It might make all Canadians aware of the perils and dangers this country is facing if we continue to live beyond our means. It is obvious that for several years Canadians have been living on the cuff and if you look at the average Canadian, he owns one or two cars, a snowmobile, and he spends left and right. So it is obvious that Canadians live beyond their means. Even if that legislation has only one effect—making Canadians aware of the fact that we have to face an extremely difficult economic situation caused by various factors—I hope it reaches its goal. Furthermore, as I explained earlier, if we are to overcome inflation, it is not enough to rely only on measures taken by the government or the private sector, but it is a challenge for each and every Canadian to make sure they do not overspend and to curb their search for goods which has run unchecked for several years.

● (1520)

[English]

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Lang, debate adjourned.

Senator Perrault: Je propose l'ajournement de la Chambre.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That can't be very good French because I can understand it.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): I hope your English is as good as your French.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 24, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, November 24, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS
MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. McKinnon had been substituted for that of Mr. Dinsdale and that the name of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) had been substituted for that of Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Petten tabled:

Report of the National Energy Board entitled: "Canadian Oil—Supply and Requirements," dated September 1975.

Report of the Advisory Committee on Food Safety Assessment, dated November 1975 and issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Report of the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board appointed under the Official Languages Act, dated October 1, 1975.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Petten moved the third reading of Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 20, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Perrault calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action," together with a booklet giving the highlights of the government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 21, 1975.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, we are all too familiar now with the substance and the possible effects of the White Paper tabled by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on October 14 last. I believe that very shortly we will be equally as familiar in this chamber with the bill that followed that White Paper two days later when introduced in the House of Commons.

This bill, as we know, establishes the machinery for administering the government proposals as set out in the White Paper and legislates the basic anti-inflation program relating to prices and incomes, which will be in effect in this country for probably the next three years.

As honourable senators are aware, although the guidelines imposed apply to everyone on a voluntary basis, certain groups within the country will be subject to legal enforcement of those guidelines. These are, for example, firms of more than 500 employees, contracting firms of more than 20 employees, the federal government and the participating provincial governments and all their employees and, last, but not least, those in the professions. Prices and profits must be restricted to whatever is required to recover net increases in costs. Incomes—meaning all forms of compensation, including directors' fees, fringe benefits, bonuses and stock dividends—are restricted to increases of 10 per cent, 8 per cent and 6 per cent respectively over the next three years. Professional fees will fall under both prices and incomes guidelines.

● (2010)

It goes without saying that this legislation will impose upon all Canadians a system of restraints and controls which has no precedent in this country except in time of war.

Honourable senators, apart altogether from the dawning recognition throughout the world of the destructive effects of inflation, of the impetus given to it by the action of the OPEC countries in raising oil prices, and the fact that succeeding countries have had only limited success in applying controls, it is pertinent for us to examine why this government has introduced this massive program at this point in time, only 16 months after a general election in which Canadians endorsed its stand against such a program.

Undoubtedly there have been major changes in this country in the last 12 months. On the one hand, there has been, over the years, a gradual build-up of factors, both domestic and foreign, productive of inflation. That realization has been brought home to Canadians very rapidly within the last 12 months, and suddenly they have attempted, both individually and collectively, to rectify the destructive effects of this inflation on themselves personally. Two factors have suddenly coincided to produce a condition of great potential danger.

I suggest that inflation is not a disease in itself but rather a symptom of a disease, and any attack upon it, to be successful, must cure the underlying malaise. It is both self-induced and caught by contagion. In its primary stage, there is an element present of greed, sometimes more politely referred to as "rising expectations." In its secondary stage, it has in it an element of jealousy, sometimes called "catching up"; and in its final stage it is basically and predominantly an expression of fear.

We in Canada appear to have already passed through the first and second stages, and if we are to avoid the third, final and fatal stage, it is well that we should welcome the doctor and take the bitter medicine which is now proffered.

The governments of Canada—I use the plural—have for years followed economic policies which have allowed and encouraged the build-up of an inflationary environment. The long-term build-up and its effects can be realized and perceived by recalling some of the past circumstances, if only briefly.

The significance of Canada's absence from the Economic Summit Conference recently held in France should not be overlooked. I suggest it marks a new low point in how Canada is regarded by other nations, and a new low for Canada in the economic world order. From the end of World War II up until recent years, Canada would almost automatically have been included in such a conference.

It is not difficult for senators to remember that in the 1950s our per capita income was the second highest in the world, exceeded only by that of the United States. Today, our per capita income is fifth ranking in the world, behind that of the United States, West Germany, Sweden, and Denmark.

It is not difficult to remember that during that same period Canada enjoyed an international prestige and a small but real military presence, both of which ranked in the world second only to that of the great powers. Now, however, in the eyes of Dr. Luns, the NATO Secretary General, we rank scarcely ahead of Luxembourg, at least so far as our military significance is concerned.

While Canada is still one of the few countries on earth combining natural resources of an immeasurable quantity and a high degree of modern industrialization, our development has now almost come to a stop, and strikes of national significance are paralyzing our economy. Last year, only Italy exceeded Canada in time lost as a result of strike actions. It would not be surprising to any of us if we succeeded Italy this year to that dubious distinction.

Canadian governments at all levels have increased their spending by 300 per cent in the last decade; that is, from $14.9 billion in 1964 to $60 billion last year. In terms of the gross national product, that represents an increase from 31 per cent to 39.3 per cent. In other words, Canadian governments today at all levels control close to $40 of every $100 spent on goods and services in the country.

Statistics for 1973, being the latest available, show that such percentage government spending is only exceeded by Sweden and Holland, and statistics for 1975 will, in all likelihood, show Canada to be among the highest government spenders in the Western World.

I am not saying that this has been all bad or non-productive. We have in Canada an enviable system of social legislation, and governments at all levels have, undoubtedly, responded to the needs and wishes of the people in putting forward social programs, including, among others, the Canada Pension Plan, the Guaranteed Income Supplement, Old Age Pension, Unemployment Insurance, mother's allowance, as well as the costs of educational and medicare programs. What I do question, however, is how the Canadian public can assess the price it is paying for these programs and, in particular, how readily can the public of Canada know how much money for these programs is being produced by the mere printing of it. The mere printing of it represents no increase in productivity, but is indeed a basic cause of our present inflationary condition.

● (2020)

I know honourable senators are fully aware that along with the introduction of these programs there must inevitably develop a tremendous bureaucratic system, not only centrally but at the provincial level and in the municipalities. In fact, in Canada today there is one public employee for every six workers in the private sector. I think it should be borne in mind that while governments take resources from the public and use them for ameliorating the real needs of the public, they inevitably also take resources for the aggrandisement of government institutions which operate by and large for the benefit of those managing the institutions.

Only last week the recommendations of the Ontario Special Program Review Committee were tabled in the Ontario Legislature. They showed a spending program in Ontario running at an estimated cost of $11.4 billion, with the province heading for a deficit of $1.9 billion next year, the largest deficit in the history of Ontario. Among Canadian governments, Ontario's spending is second only to the federal government's spending of $35 billion for this year. Ontario is confronting a 1976 expenditure on education alone of $2.7 billion, half a billion more than Canada's defence costs last year. Ontario's expenditures on health delivery have gone up by 450 per cent in the last ten years.

At the federal level, last June's budget forecast a deficit of $4.3 billion for our next fiscal year. Indeed, it looks like $6 billion, and many economists are predicting that we will reach $7 billion. Canada's federal spending in the first half of the 1975-76 fiscal year is up a whopping 30 per cent over last year. Our net public debt has risen from $18 billion in 1975 to $25 billion in 1976.

I suggest that at the heart of this problem of inflation, which is occupying all our time, attention and concern today, is the problem of government spending. I think it is also worth noting that as such government spending spurs rising expectations of the average Canadian and increases the catch-up syndrome of the public in general, and in itself accelerates the inflationary cycle in the private sector.

It is interesting to note that within the last month the British Labour Government has accepted this fact. In his budget address, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

The government intends to give greater weight to the need for increasing the national rate of growth through regenerating our industrial sector and improving our efficiency. For the immediate future this will mean giving priority to industrial development over consumption and even over our social objectives.

Cuts in the United Kingdom's budget will adversely affect essential services such as hospitals, police, schools and housing, all in the face of 1.5 million unemployed and some 60,000 people homeless or inadequately housed. The Chancellor went on to say that continuation of present conditions in the United Kingdom, which is suffering a current inflation rate of 25 per cent per year, would plunge Britain's living standard to the level of that of a Mediterranean country in a few years. I suggest that today Canadians must curtail their demands of governments, and governments must radically curtail their demands on Canadian resources, human and otherwise, if we are not likewise to find our living standards reduced to the level of those of perhaps a South American country.

It is understandable when the Prime Minister of our country says there are no villains and no devils upon whom one can fix blame for our present inflation. He is enunciating the correct approach to involve every Canadian in a positive fight against inflation. Notwithstanding that, it would be the height of folly for us not to recognize that government expenditure itself is a major factor, and without a strong policy of government retrenchment the present program cannot be made credible to the rest of Canada.

On October 13 the Prime Minister stated:

There will be practically no growth in the Public Service. Strict economies will be imposed on the administrative and housekeeping aspects of the government's business. However, this does not mean that government spending will be absolutely frozen.

Again, in a recent interview, he stated that the government would not indulge in any acts of "symbolic martyrdom."

Honourable senators, for frankness and a disavowal of hypocrisy, neither of these statements can be faulted. Notwithstanding, I am satisfied that unless governments at all levels in Canada today set examples for the people by the severest retrenchment in their spending programs, we are not going to be able to make this program work. The government must by example—indeed, by the use of symbols—show to the people of Canada, in a way that every man, woman and child can understand, that they mean business. Unless they do so, I feel this program may be in serious jeopardy. And if it should fail, the results, I suggest, would be too disastrous to contemplate.

● (2030)

I might say that, in my opinion, by admitting in the White Paper that "there is little scope for the government to reduce expenditures," and by pleading the inflexibility of federal expenditures under the statutory programs, the government shows a lack of understanding of the motivating role it must play in this important area.

Honourable senators, let us not delude ourselves that by passing legislation here or at the provincial level we can thereby banish the evil of inflation; let us not delude ourselves as to the jeopardy into which this program will place some of our most accepted freedoms; let us not delude ourselves as to the fact that this program must, of necessity, spawn an oppressive bureaucracy. On the other hand, let us recognize the grave economic and political dangers into which we are moving if we are not prepared to accept the obvious sacrifices and attendant risks.

[Senator Lang.]

The government by its program and the ensuing legislation is asking the public to grasp the nettle. Every government in Canada must also do the same. Every government in Canada must not only practise what it is preaching but must walk a mile further than it requires of others.

The lead taken by the federal government and the responses of the provinces deserve the commendation and support of every Canadian. We can minimize the duration of this program, the life of the bureaucracy and the restrictions entailed by adhering not only to the letter of the law but to the spirit of the program, and by doing everything within our power to inculcate that same attitude in Canadians in every walk of life.

Self-discipline and self-reliance have always been characteristics of the Canadian people. If in an atmosphere of greed, fear, self-interest and strident confrontation we destroy that heritage, it will be to our eternal regret. The clearest evidence that we are now doing just that is our current rate of inflation. Now is the time for governments to set tough, self-imposed standards, and for business, labour and every individual Canadian to follow the example in concert.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if the honourable senator will allow me a question.

Senator Lang: Certainly.

Senator Forsey: Would Senator Lang be in favour of our setting an example in the way that I suggested when I spoke on this subject—by foregoing the increases which may come to us under the present legislation in the month of January?

Senator Lang: Are you referring to the increases to ourselves?

Senator Forsey: Yes.

Senator Lang: Yes, I certainly would be.

Senator Forsey: We appear to be somewhat of a minority.

Senator Lang: I think it would be a rather significant symbol.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to intervene for any great length of time in this debate, but I do have a responsibility to speak on a subject that is as important to every Canadian as this one is.

There is no doubt in my mind that we face two alternatives. Either we rise to the occasion and exercise, individually and collectively, the restraints necessary to put a stop to the continuing cycle of inflation, which is the whole purpose of this White Paper, or we allow inflation to run away completely, destroying everything of value in this country, so that an absolute government would have to step in and take complete control of every aspect of Canadian life. If anyone thinks for a moment there are any other alternatives he is kidding himself. What concerns me is that, in spite of the fact that everyone complains about prices, Canadians as a whole accept the alternatives I have enumerated as being the only ones available.

The labour unions are going to spend $500,000 to make the government's proposals fail. So help me, I cannot, by any stretch of my imagination, understand what they expect to achieve unless it is to destroy our society with the idea of building a Utopia out of its ruins. Surely it ought to be completely obvious, as we approach the end of the twentieth century, that there is no need and no room for confrontation between labour and management. The interests of labour and the interests of management, the interests of the public and the interests of government, must be identical. If labour imposes restrictions on business profits, it makes it impossible for management to replace its machinery and maintain its plants. If productivity is to continue and to improve, business must be allowed a reasonable profit. At the same time, of course, business must provide workers with a fair and decent income. In the final analysis, management and labour working together will produce the goods which society needs, and in the quantity and at a price which society can afford to pay.

● (2040)

These statements are so basically simple that one wonders why it is necessary to utter them. Nevertheless, when I see the stuff I read in the newspapers, and when I listen to what I can only call garbage expressed by some commentators, and when I hear some of the speeches that are being spewed out, I wonder where we have left our brains. Obviously no one is using them.

Surely this chamber should send forth the message—and this should have come from the other chamber and been urged all across the country—that it is nonsense to think someone can sneak a bigger share and stick it in his pocket without anyone seeing it. There is just no way that anyone can get away with that today. Management, labour, consumers, producers of raw materials—all have equal interests. We should be taking a serious look at legislation which would end the confrontation system, a system which costs us so much in lost time, trying to devise ways in which all elements having a common interest can work together. This idea is not my own, and it is not new. I read about it first 30 years ago when it was put forth by a man named Ruml. It was he who devised the pay-as-you-earn income tax idea for President Roosevelt, the same idea which now makes it possible for governments to impose the levels of taxation they are able to get away with. He also predicted that the day had to come when boards of directors could not be limited to shareholders or capital representatives, or just management, who were in fact the people who had hijacked the company from the original owners. He said that shareholders, management, suppliers, and consumers would have to be represented on every board of directors of every company in the country.

Honourable senators, this kind of cooperation and this kind of working together, if we have gumption enough to use it, will give us a chance to get out of the mess we have got ourselves into as a result of everybody's saying "Me first." We must take this opportunity; there will not be another one.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

CRIME AND VIOLENCE

PROPOSED SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE
CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator McGrand, seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes:

That the Senate considers it desirable that a special committee of the Senate be established at an early date to inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: I yield to the Honourable Senator Rowe.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, first of all I congratulate our esteemed colleague, Senator McGrand, for initiating this inquiry. I have re-read in recent days the statement he made here some months ago, and I must again congratulate him on his very modest, yet penetrating, approach, and on his very reasonable suggestion that a committee be established to inquire into and report on crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.

I have also re-read the statements made in this debate by a number of other senators, and I congratulate them. I was particularly interested in the contribution made by my seat-mate, Senator Norrie, because she gave an account of the situation in what I consider to be one of the most civilized countries in the world, namely, The Netherlands—or Holland, as we usually call it. I say this because Holland is a country I have some little familiarity with, and I was very much interested in hearing her impressions of the approach that the authorities in that country have made to the problems of our society, and in particular to crime and those things related to crime—because crime does not exist in a vacuum, to use a truism. I was interested in hearing some of the inferences she drew from the Dutch experience. I shall not go further into that now because she has already gone into it in some detail.

I support Senator McGrand's motion, honourable senators, but inherent in it, if it should be adopted by this chamber, is the very important element of time. We cannot make a three-week investigation into crime. If we are going to go into it at all, and I think we should, then we are talking in terms—and this may, perhaps, astonish some honourable senators—of anywhere from one to three years. A study of shorter duration would be, in my view, a waste of time.

In the interim, we have to face up to certain facts of life. I do not think we can continue to delude ourselves. One of those facts is that there has been not just a disconcerting but a frightening—and one might almost use that term literally—increase in crime in Canada during the past decade. This situation is not peculiar to Canada. It is to be found in practically all, if not all, other countries. I understand there has been some evidence in this past year of what is termed a levelling off. This is not unexpected, because if crime were to continue increasing at the rate of 15 per cent or 20 per cent per year, without a levelling off, then civilization as we know it would simply collapse within a comparatively short time. But, as I have said, there has been this frightening increase in crime during the past decade or so, and that is another way of saying that there has been—and this is something we often overlook, I think—a proportionate increase in the demands we have to make on our protective resources. To say that there has been a proportionate increase is another way of saying that we have had to make in these last few years, disproportionate demands on our protective agencies—the police, the courts and various other institutions of one kind and another.

● (2050)

At this stage I am going to add a third premise. I realize that there are some who would disagree with me, but, in my view, the resources of our society—I do not think we can think wholly and solely in terms of Canada; after all, Canada, like crime, does not exist in a vacuum either—the resources that we do have, the protective resources, are being diverted in many cases to what I consider to be frivolous and totally unnecessary activities of one kind and another.

I interject here that I saw an example in a ridiculous form two or three weeks ago. As many senators do, sometimes I leave my car at the airport, but many times I do not and I arrange for a member of my family to pick me up when I go back home. Two or three weeks ago I went back, and one of my sons came to meet me. The plane, which goes from Halifax to St. John's, as usual was late. It has been on time once in the past two years, to my knowledge. My son had to put a coin in the parking meter and again a second time, and his change was exhausted. He said, "I dare say we have a ticket." We did have a ticket. Okay; that is fair game. As we were pulling out I asked, "Who is that over there?" My son replied, "That is a Mountie. He is putting tickets on the cars, and he put a ticket on this one." I do not think I should say another word.

I mentioned this to a friend of mine, who happens to be one of the senior men in the RCMP, and asked him how he rationalized it. He told me it is done at the request of the Department of Transport. I said, "Do you mean to say that this man, in whom we have invested tens of thousands of dollars . . ." and he interjected to say, "He has not had the full training; he has not spent as many years as some of the others in training." He was a partly trained constable but, of course, the principle is the same. This man, in whom we have invested tens of thousands of dollars, was spending his time putting tickets on cars, when any 16-year old high school youngster could probably do the job more expeditiously than he was doing it. I cite that as one bizarre example of the frivolous way in which we are dissipating the resources that we have.

I could enlarge on that, because this is perhaps as good a time as any for me to say that in my view most of the so-called vice squads we have throughout Canada are relics of nineteenth century puritanism, a waste of time. A friend of mine, who is on one of these vice squads, said to me, "Do you not know that the massage parlours are connected with the underground; do you not know that prostitution is controlled by the gangsters?" My answer to that—and I realize the risk I run in saying this—is that the massage parlours and prostitution in Sweden, Germany, Holland and other countries I could name, among the most civilized countries of the world, are not part of organized crime, for the same reason that the sale of alcohol today is not part of organized crime as it was in the 1920s. God knows I am not in favour of massage parlours or prostitution. I am an advocate of more effective measures to counteract organized crime in Canada and in other places, but I do not believe that vice squads are the answer. I am told that in one relatively small Canadian city, which I will not name, nine policemen constitute a vice squad, and they are out day and night trying to—well, you know what they are trying to do, and I do not think we can afford that.

[Senator Rowe.]

Assuming that this motion is adopted, in the period that must elapse of necessity between now and the time a report is brought in, there are steps we can take, and I am going to suggest a few of them. I regard the police forces of Canada—the RCMP, the provincial police forces and, certainly, those municipal police forces with which I am familiar, including the police force of my home city—as being among the superior police agencies in the world. I hope no one will take what I have to say now as indicating a criticism of those forces per se. In my opinion, we need more and better trained police officers and security officers, and those police officers and security officers require—I know there are those who will turn up their noses at this idea, especially those who think the answer to a 19-year old criminal is the cat-o'-nine tails, or a bludgeon of some kind or another—those police officers and security officers need and must be given more training in psychology generally, and particularly in pathological conduct and behaviour.

We must exert even greater selectivity in our police forces in order to weed out the sadists who, inevitably, as things are now, get themselves into the police and security forces. There is a percentage of them, I suppose, in any police force. It is a small percentage, thank heaven; nevertheless, there is a percentage of sadists who get into these agencies, bodies and institutions. One sadist in a penitentiary can do more to create anti-social behaviour, to create criminals, than 99 sensible and moderate men can do to prevent criminal behaviour.

I believe also that in any country a police force needs to be watched. I repeat that I regard the RCMP as one of the great police forces of the world. In my opinion, we have been extremely fortunate in the quality of the personnel of that organization, but I believe we must keep in mind the lesson that only now some of our friends in other countries are learning, that there is always a potential danger inherent in any police force. In the United States, for example, there are three great agencies—the FBI, the CIA, and the National Security Council or the NSC, which only now millions of Americans are hearing about although it was established nearly 30 years ago, and which admits to spending $11 billion last year. I mention that fact to indicate the tremendous power which such an agency has in money alone.

● (2100)

So far as I know, Canada does not have a CIA and, so far as I can ascertain, we do not have an NSC. It could be argued that the counterpart of the FBI is the RCMP. My point is that if we have an intelligence agency—and I am sure we have—the work of such an agency is being carried out by the RCMP. We have to remember that the RCMP carries out the responsibilities undertaken by those three great U. S. agencies I have mentioned. That is worth thinking about.

To return to those measures which we can take in the interim, we could and should reduce our prison population. Canada has, I am told, one of the highest prison populations per capita in the world. That is unnecessary. We could reduce our prison population by eliminating a number of those crimes for which we impose jail sentences.

Senator Norrie, in referring to the experiment carried out in Holland, mentioned the crime of non-violent robbery. There is a big distinction between a 45-year old woman who steals articles from a supermarket and places them in her handbag, and the psychopath who, when I was in New York last year, attacked a 70-year old woman who was sitting on a park bench at 2 o'clock in the afternoon within three blocks of my hotel. The woman, who had $7 in her handbag, resisted, and the psychopath drove a knife between her shoulder blades and killed her. Obviously, there is a world of difference between those two acts of robbery. I repeat, we could decrease our prison population by eliminating jail sentences for many offences. I do not propose to go into further detail. Other countries are experimenting along those lines, and so far the results have been most encouraging.

Our society is the prime agent for creating criminals. I myself have seen young people sent to jail for periods of one, two or three years for selling a couple of marihuana joints to their college companions. We are not doing as much of that now, but we are still doing it. Those young people were not criminals before they went to jail, but they were by the time they came out, and thereafter their lives were spent in criminal activities. We have seen that happen over and over again. Many of these young people should not be sent to jail.

Another way of reducing our jail population is by completely re-examining the Criminal Code. I realize that I am on dangerous ground in that what I have to say could be misrepresented. The Criminal Code should be revised with regard to all penalties imposed for sexual deviation. I am not referring to assaults on children or women. I am referring to sexual deviation which, in some cases, involve only one person or consenting adults. We have made some progress in this area in recent years, particularly in the field of homosexuality, but I invite honourable senators to take another look at our Criminal Code and this whole matter of sexual deviation.

We could reduce our prison population by revising our thinking on marihuana. I refer honourable senators to two recent publications. The first is Newsweek of October 27, which, on page 28, contains an article on drugs. That article says:

For the past six years the Federal war against drugs has been waged on two main fronts: against imports of heroin and of marihuana. Now a White House White Paper, released last week with President Ford's support—

Let us think what that means. President Ford is one of the most conservative-minded men in the United States today:

—recommends that the government concentrate its fire on "those drugs which pose the greatest risk."

I said that three years ago, and honourable senators thought at the time that I was crazy. I do not draw this to the attention of the house in any "I told you" attitude, but merely to indicate what was the thinking of most Canadians on this subject just three years ago. The article continues:

It stops short of suggesting the decriminalization of marijuana but... "between the lines, it tells the states to go ahead and do what they want about it."

Six states have already, for all practical purposes, decriminalized marihuana. Among them are Alaska, Oregon, Maine, and areas of the State of California. "Of course," honourable senators might say, "we know what happened. There was a tremendous upsurge in the use of marihuana, no doubt." I have to say that no such thing has happened, and I would not be surprised to find that there has been a decrease in the use of marihuana.

None of my conservative critics—I do not use the word "conservative" in any partisan sense—have been able to supply an answer to my next statement, which is that in the 1700s and early 1800s, when liberal-minded thinkers in England—I use the word "liberal" with a small "l"—advocated the removal of the death sentence for the crime of stealing sheep, poaching rabbits and birds, and pickpocketing, they were told "If you do, no one's sheep or rabbits will be safe and we shall have an increase in highway robbery." The latter was a serious affliction of those times, a very common offence. Eventually the death sentence for those crimes was eliminated and concurrently there was a decrease in sheep stealing, rabbit poaching, pickpocketing and highway robbery. What is the answer? I repeat, therefore, that the time has come when Canada should revise its entire approach to the drug problem.

● (2110)

As it happens, I have never used marihuana. I do, however, have nine grandchildren, and I am as much concerned about the future for my grandchildren as I could be about anything in this world. I have spent some years going into this whole area of drugs, and I am convinced that the time has come for Canada to follow the pattern already set by some other countries in revising its whole approach to marihuana.

I have here the November issue of the Good Housekeeping, which is a family magazine published in the United States, in which there is an article by Art Linkletter. I recommend this article even more strongly than I did the article in Newsweek a few moments ago. As it happens, Art Linkletter was born in Canada. I think most honourable senators are aware of the fact that he is one of the best known radio and, to some extent, television personalities in the United States, and a great deal of his radio and television work has been with children.

I would ask honourable senators to cast their minds back six years. Six years ago, Art Linkletter's 20-year old daughter, a very intelligent and promising young woman with everything going for her, committed suicide while under the influence of drugs. As a result of his daughter's death, Art Linkletter, who is a very wealthy man, decided that he would take it on himself to examine the whole drug situation, which is what he has been involved in over the past six years.

The article in question appears on page 89 of the November issue of Good Housekeeping, and is entitled: What I've learned About Drugs Since My Daughter's Death. Mr. Linkletter opens the article with the following:

My beloved 20-year-old daughter, Diane, committed suicide in 1969 in the frenzy of an LSD flashback.

It is not my intention to read this whole article, but there are several pertinent paragraphs which, with your indulgence, I should like to read. These are Art Linkletter's words—a man, incidentally, who has three other children:

In the years since—

That is, since his daughter committed suicide.

—I've found the only way I could deal with Diane's death was to devote most of my time, energy and money to educating first myself and then the public to the facts about drugs. Today my revulsion at the use of drugs has not changed. But my understanding of who uses them and for what reasons, and my feelings about what can and should be done have changed drastically. That's why, when last spring my home state of California was considering a law to make the possession of marijuana a misdemeanor rather than a felony, I sent a letter to State Senator George Moscone in Sacramento urging that it be passed. (It was).

In this article he goes on to say:

I've spent the last six years facing those facts and now I strongly believe—

And this is what I want to emphasize, because I think the people of Canada should know what this man, a man who has every reason to hate and fear drugs, believes.

—that no good purpose is served by making criminals of the millions of Americans who use marijuana.

Mr. Linkletter goes on to rationalize those statements.

In all sincerity, I urge any honourable senator who is interested in the drug problem specifically, and in crime in Canada generally, to read this article.

Another step that we can take—and some efforts, I know, have been made in this direction—in the interim between now and the time that any report might be brought down, is to urge still more segregation of criminal psychopaths. Many of the young men and, to some extent, young women, who are sentenced to our penitentiaries find themselves in association with, and are very frequently, as we know, abused by, criminal psychopaths. There should be no connection in the world between the young man or woman who commits an ordinary misdemeanor— young people who are at this moment in our jails for bringing marihuana into Canada, young college students—and the criminal psychopath.

A few months ago one of my honourable friends expressed the hope that he had heard me speak for the last time about the young woman in Gander who was sentenced to seven years in prison for bringing marihuana into the country. My honourable friend expressed that hope in a jocular fashion, of course, but he has not heard the last of it. Since then two other young women have been sentenced to jail for the same offence, one of them receiving a seven-year sentence the same week as a man in my home town of St. John's, a man who was later found to be intoxicated, got into his motor vehicle and, driving it at twice the speed limit on a city street, struck and killed two children, one of whom, according to the police report, was thrown 60 feet by the impact. The man was picked up by the police and, as I said, was found to be driving while intoxicated. In sentencing that individual, the judge imposed the full force of the law, which was two years in the penitentiary. Of course, had he done something really serious, such as arriving in Gander with some marihuana in his possession, he would have received a seven-year sentence, but what he did was not very serious; it was only worth two years.

[Senator Rowe.]

Another step we can take is to tighten our gun control laws. We do not have to wait for any report before making a move in that direction. I am well aware of the great amount of opposition that has been mustered against any tightening of our gun control laws. As Senator Cameron has already dealt with this subject much more adequately than I could ever do, it is not my intention to go into the arguments for such a step at this time, but there is no reason in this world why we could not eliminate the use of hand guns.

The critics, of course, will say that such a tightening of our gun laws will not keep guns out of the hands of criminals. The fact of the matter is that the murder rate in almost every country in the world is in direct proportion to the availability of guns. That is a fact of life.

I do not for one moment argue that we should restrict the legitimate use of rifles and other types of guns. I come from a province where a gun is often a necessary means of livelihood, or a partial means of livelihood. I would be the last one in the world to advocate such a move. However, I do know that the majority of the murders committed in my province were committed because, for example, a 19-year old man, drunk, having a row with his girl friend, could reach out and grab a rifle or a loaded shotgun. In my view, guns should not be as easily available to everyone as they are.

● (2120)

Honourable senators, there are several other items that I wanted to bring to your attention, but time is getting on and many of you, like myself, have probably been on the go all day travelling and are tired. However, I do want to end with this thought. I do not presume to know what causes criminal behaviour, and I have not yet met any person who does know. Maybe someone does. However, I think I know some of the things that cause or help to cause criminal behaviour in our society, and I believe there are steps we should take. I have named a few, and there are many more we could take.

In saying this I am perhaps expressing something analogous to what my friend Senator Prowse said in another context half an hour ago. Our society is one of a minority in the world today in the sense that we have a democratic society. With all its imperfections we do have a democratic constitution, a constitution based on democratic principles. Yet we are in a minority in the world today in that respect. I regret to say that most people do not appreciate that fact. The majority of the countries of the world do not practise democracy. Most of their constitutions are not democratic. A great many countries which on paper have a democratic constitution are not democratic in practice. We in Canada are in a declining minority. Scarcely a month passes without a country that we thought was on the road to democracy regressing, often, of course, with the help of some of the so-called democracies, notably our friends in the United States.

Although it is a truism, we have to remind ourselves that democracy is a very fragile thing. There is no guarantee at all that democracy will persist. Historically we have seen democratic institutions overthrown. Democracy is vulnerable. We assume a great many things about democracy, but what is not sufficiently recognized is that it is highly vulnerable. It is vulnerable to excesses by those making up the democracies. This can be manifested in a variety of ways. It can be manifested by automobile manufacturers producing a car which has lethal characteristics, which statistically will kill 700 persons in the next twelve months. There are manifestations in the corruption we have seen in some of the heads of labour unions. Over and over again people insisting on the rights of labour have gone to excesses that have in some cases threatened the very bases of democracy. There are excesses in democratic society typified by crime of various kinds, by criminal behaviour which almost inevitably leads to criminal organizations of one kind or another.

Honourable senators, I leave you with this thought, although there is nothing original about it. We must remind ourselves that if we cannot control those excesses, if we cannot control the depredations being made on the democratic process, in some cases by big business, in some cases by big labour, in some cases by organized crime, in other cases by almost the anarchy which results from individual criminal behaviour, if we cannot control the onslaughts being made on the rights of individuals and the rights of our democratic society, democracy as we know it is in danger of being destroyed.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I do not want to speak at any length on this subject, but the more I examine this motion the more I find that it is vague, and that it would be difficult to deal with. It says that there should be a committee:

to inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.

That is a large order. As Senator Rowe said, it is not something that can be dealt with in a few months or a year, or even perhaps two or three years.

Exactly what type of directives will this committee have? Will it endeavour to find the causes of crime and violence? There can be more than several dozens, or several hundreds. To cite only a few, it might be a boy becoming a criminal because of poverty, poor surroundings, atavism; it might be a question of bad companions, older boys fraternizing with younger boys and setting a bad example; it can be heredity and so on. That is part of the inquiry that I think the committee will be asked to conduct.

After hearing my good friend Senator Rowe making his very able speech, I think there is a second task the committee will have, which is how to deal with those who commit crime. That again, as will be readily understood, is quite a large order. Then there is the definition of crime or a criminal offence. If we are to believe Senator Rowe, some things that are considered as criminal or crimes today should not be so considered.

Finally, there is the consideration of how to eliminate crime. We go in a vicious circle. How can crime be eliminated until we know the causes? How can we eliminate the causes? How can we eliminate, for instance, poverty, poor surroundings, atavism, heredity and all that?

I am wondering what conclusion this committee, composed of I do not know how many senators, who will hear psychiatrists and psychologists, will arrive at. I fail to see in this motion any directive to the committee in that respect. I have given only four or five aspects. There can be many more. I am wondering how any committee can:

inquire into and report upon crime and violence in contemporary Canadian society.

Unless something is added to the wording of the motion, I think that it would be asking any committee that is appointed to tackle a terrible task.

On motion of Senator McElman, debate adjourned.

● (2130)

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the Senate.

Senator Grosart: For clarification, I wonder if the acting leader would indicate to what time the Senate stands adjourned? There was a previous motion, and I would like clarification of that.

Senator Petten: We sit again tomorrow at 2 o'clock.
The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 25, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND, (NO. 2)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2), and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS—
QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether the number of postal employees who are back at work has risen above 1½ per cent?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with the opening of five new offices today, a total of 181 are now open across the country compared to 176 on Monday. Manpower has increased considerably over Monday. About 11 per cent of the CUPW staff are now back on the job. Today's 24-hour figures, ending at 10 a.m. Eastern Standard Time, show that 2,469 employees are at work compared to 2,028 at work on Monday.

The most significant increase has been in the Metropolitan Toronto area where nearly 1,000 CUPW workers are in the various offices. Monday's figures showed slightly more than 600 at work. There were 182 full-time and 98 part-time employees at work in Terminal A in Toronto.

North Bay, although not offering wicket service yet, plans to have letter carrier service tomorrow as there are now eight full-time employees on the job, including four railway mail clerks.

• (1410)

CUPW employees in Edmonton are expected to take part in a closed vote on returning to work and accepting the government's wage offer, starting at 4 p.m. Eastern Standard Time today. The vote is being sponsored by a local radio station.

Nova Scotia District reports 17 highway services and 15 stages services operating in the province today. New offices opening today in addition to Charlottetown were Mont Laurier, western Quebec; Dryden, northern Ontario; Burns Lake, British Columbia, and St. Albert in Alberta. It was erroneously reported earlier that Newcastle in New Brunswick District had reopened. To all intents and purposes, mail service is back to full operation in Prince Edward Island today.

There have been reports from across the country that there may be votes held in a number of postal centres across Canada to enable the membership to express their views on returning to work, although this again is reported to be only on a local basis at this time.

Senator Walker: It is certainly working in Toronto. My wife says she got 29 bills this morning.

Senator Perrault: Interestingly enough, honourable senators, I have had two reports this morning that a number of bills have been received in the Ottawa area, which may indicate that the postal workers are being selective in their sorting practice.

Senator Walker: Unfortunately.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—A program of national action", together with a booklet giving the highlights of the Government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 21st October, 1975.—
(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate yesterday on behalf of Senator Flynn, and I ask that he be allowed to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, on Monday October 13, 1975, Thanksgiving Day, at 9 p.m. while I was before my television set, we were advised that the Prime Minister had asked the national broadcasting system to make some time available to him for a most important statement.

Mr. Trudeau appeared on the screen with a somber but resolute look reminding us of five years ago when he had announced the enforcement of the War Measures Act to control the apprehended insurrection in Quebec. You no doubt remember that famous crisis which with time seems to have been imagined if not grossly exaggerated.

What is the recent important event which makes him feel that anxiety clearly visible on his face? What is he going to say? And now he begins to speak and I quote:

Tomorrow, the government of Canada will ask Parliament for the authority to impose severe restraint upon rising prices and incomes. This program of restraint is the heaviest imposed upon Canadians since the Second World War.

Under this program, a selected number of powerful groups in Canada will be required by law to obey strict guidelines on any increase in prices they charge, and incomes they earn.

The price and income guidelines will take effect at midnight tonight. They will be enforced on the federal government and all its employees, on the 1,500 largest companies in Canada, including virtually every company in the construction industry, and on all the employees of all those companies. The guidelines apply as well to all professional people, such as doctors, lawyers, accountants and engineers.

And a little further, he said:

That is the only anti-inflation weapon which offers hope of permanent success. That weapon is in your hands; I am appealing to you to use it.

Is it really Mr. Trudeau speaking? My eyes and my ears cannot deceive me. In this respect, I am well equipped.

It is truly the face and the voice of Mr. Trudeau, but what he says, is it coming from him? Is it really he? I would have thought that these words were spoken by Mr. Stanfield. I continue to listen attentively. I recall what Mr. Trudeau was saying not so long ago, during a question and answer period at the Lindsay Collegiate and Vocational School, at Lindsay, Ontario, on May 23, 1975. Someone asked Mr. Trudeau what was the difference between his program and that of the Conservatives. He answered and I quote:

● (1420)

[English]

Well the point is that it doesn't resemble it at all. You will recall that they were in favour of compulsory, statutory, price and wage controls, they wanted a law which would freeze everything and control everything. We've taken exactly the opposite approach. We've said rather than, perhaps, it's a good distinction of a difference between Liberalism and Conservatism, when there is a chance of appealing to people's freedom and common sense rather than forcing them to do something by the law we prefer the first course if it is at all workable. And our approach, has been, I repeat, exactly the contrary to the one that you say, it has been to talk to the labour unions, talk to the management groups, talk to the professional groups of landlords, to groups of producers, and try to explain to them that they must show voluntary restraint rather than submit to state controls of their every action, of their every move, whether it be in the area of prices or of wages. So, that's basically the two distinctions; we are still hopeful that a democracy can work and that citizens, your parents, can freely accept some form of restraints which are necessary for the economy.

[Translation]

As I said, that statement by the Prime Minister dates back to the month of May. At that time the government, mostly Mr. Turner, was seeking a consensus. The statement indicates only a slight evolution of the Liberal Party since the 1974 campaign, when the Conservative program was ridiculed, said to be inefficient, useless and dangerous, that inflation was assumed to be caused by external factors over which the government had no control. Yet, strange to say, about ten days before his famous statement of October 13, the Prime Minister had said that he would not touch price and wage controls with "a 10 foot pole."

Before the end of his speech, and I am listening attentively, he will surely explain what happened since the 1974 electoral campaign, since May 1975 and in the last ten days that impelled him toward this incredible or at least surprising reversal of his position.

He completed his address simply with the following remarks, quote:

I believe that Canadians will respond to the program. Together we can make it work. Together we will make it work.

I wonder if my surprise is greater than my scepticism. We would no doubt obtain explanations within the next few days. The following day, the new Minister of Finance tabled in the House of Commons his White Paper entitled "Attack on inflation, a program of national action" which he turned over to the news media. This document is certainly not a product of spontaneous generation. It was not prepared within the previous 10 days. It was elaborated before Mr. Trudeau stated that he would not touch controls with a 10 foot pole. Yet there was nothing in the government's attitude over the past year to indicate that it would adopt or seem to adopt the program it is proposing to us now and which is made up of four main parts; namely:

(1) Fiscal and monetary policies aimed at increasing total demand and production at a rate consistent with declining inflation.

(2) Government expenditure policies aimed at limiting the growth of public expenditures and the rate of increase in public service employment.

(3) Structural policies to deal with the special problems of energy, food and housing, to ensure a more efficient and competitive economy and to improve labour-management relations.

(4) A prices and incomes policy ...

—this is new—

... which establishes guidelines for responsible social behaviour in determining prices and incomes of groups, together with machinery for administering these guidelines and ensuring compliance where necessary.

There is no question that this is an impressive program which can appeal to people who did not believe in it, not so long ago.

Those guidelines are, there is no doubt about it, the program submitted to the electorate by the Progressive Conservative Party in 1974. It is indeed the program which, at least as a whole, Mr. Trudeau, his government, and the Liberal Party rejected.

Senator Langlois: And the Canadian people.

Senator Flynn: That is indeed the program that was scoffed at openly, which was said to be useless, inefficient and dangerous. That is the very program Mr. Trudeau convinced the people, the electorate, to reject.

A few days ago—

Senator Greene: There was no program.

Senator Flynn: Who had no program? The Liberal Party! I agree on that, it has never had any, in fact. It has always adapted to the circumstances. Opportunism is its trade mark.

A few days ago, goaded by the adverse reactions of a considerable part of public opinion, Mr. Trudeau said, courageously:

● (1430)

This program is necessary, although it is most possible that as a result the Liberals will lose the next election.

Ah, it may be that, between losing the 1974 election and the next one, it was safer to wait!

In his text, the Minister of Finance will undoubtedly explain the change in the government's view, from a strong opposition to any kind of control to the sudden decision to impose such controls at all levels.

The document is long and detailed. Once again, I presume that it was prepared a long time ago and many think it was planned before the 1974 election. And why not, as it does not show any change of position. The inflation rate itself, even if it is now at an extremely dangerous level, has not changed much during the past year. We have to wait for more explanations, which will be given by several ministers but which will all be contradictory or childish.

I clearly remember that one minister said among other things:

The type of inflation we had in 1974 before the election was due to foreign pressures whereas now it is due to domestic factors.

One could infer from the minister's statement that there were no domestic inflationary factors in 1974 and that all external ones have now disappeared.

The Hon. Mr. Chrétien explained that the government was prepared to pare expenses, was ready to adopt restrictive policies that it was not ready to put forward previously. On the other hand, the Hon. Mr. Macdonald is telling us that the budget deficit will be larger than expected. It is odd. The more you save, the more you have to pay.

Therefore, this government is asking Canadians to tighten their belts and telling them it is a matter of life and death, that our economic survival depends on it.

Let us go back to the points made by the Minister of Finance and examine the first, namely:

Fiscal and monetary policies aimed at increasing total demand and production at a rate consistent with declining inflation.

We were first told it was vital that financial policies should not allow an excessively rapid expansion of our money supply. This is indisputable and was true in 1973, and 1974 at the time of the general election, and this year, 1975.

[Senator Flynn.]

However, ever since the Right Hon. Mr. Trudeau became Prime Minister in 1968, money supply has increased by 111 per cent, and by 15 per cent during the last twelve months. A genuine about-face! What explanation is given to justify it? None at all. At the same time, and notwithstanding that statement in the White Paper, the observers foresee an increase of 18 per cent in the money supply in 1976.

What kind of financial policy is being proposed? Generalities. Will the government reduce income tax in order to bring about a growth rate that will result in a decline in unemployment? It is yet to be decided upon, but the experience of the last two budgets introduced by Mr. Turner shows that the government does not know where it is going, that it tears down with one budget what it has tried to build up in the previous one.

Let us discuss the second point of the program:

Government expenditure policies aimed at limiting the growth of public expenditures and the rate of increase in public service employment.

Here, at least, one must admit that the government has always claimed to apply restrictions and make substantial cuts in its spending. The bad part of it is that the results were never in line with its claims. You remember the announcement, last Spring, of a reduction of more than $1 billion in the estimates, made by Mr. Turner in his budget speech.

At that time I asked, when the first supply bill was being considered here, whether the government intended to reduce the estimates on which it was working. No. We were told that all that would be cut were the estimates for potential projects. Then, this is mere humbug! Window dressing for the public at large! We were certainly not going to reduce the rate of growth of expenditures.

Not so long ago, Mr. Chrétien said when tabling the last supplementary estimates: "I think I shall be able not to exceed a 15 per cent increase, which is the rate I forecast from the outset." He says 15 per cent except for imponderables.

The Minister of Finance said last week that we would have a budget deficit of $5 to $6 billion. He rectified this, saying it would be only $3 to $4 billion. Well, if you call this an accurate program for the reduction of expenditures, I wonder who has illusions, or to whom we want to give illusions?

I said earlier that this reduction should have been reflected in the public fund appropriations asked by the government but there is no cut in the estimates for the fiscal year 1975-76. The responsible ministers pointed out, as I said, that the cuts concerned projects which were not included in the estimates for this year. A red herring. Another red herring!

Furthermore, Mr. Macdonald warns us with his statement:

Although the possibility of reducing expenditures is limited, the federal government has decided to make supplementary savings wherever possible.

Of course, what assurance are we getting from these experiences and figures I just quoted? Until now it has seemed to be impossible. Then, why should we be confident now?

We can find the same thing, the same restrictions, in the statement made by the Honourable Mr. Chrétien when he introduced his supplementary estimates of $1,751,000.

Now, the third point of the program:

Structural policies to deal with the special problems of energy, food and housing, to ensure a more efficient and competitive economy and to improve labour-management relations.

Here again there is nothing really new. There is a reference to the energy policy. By the way, is the energy crisis another situation that has been entirely dreamed up by the government?

Assuredly, Canada is not facing a shortage and the only result of the government's policy has been a substantial price increase for all forms of energy.

In the housing field, a program to promote the construction of a million low rental dwellings in the next four years has just been announced.

● (1440)

On Monday November 3, the Honourable Mr. Danson said, and I quote:

The commitment of the federal government is to ensure production of the kind of good quality housing that lower and middle income Canadians need and can afford and, through these measures, to dampen inflation in the housing sector and stimulate economic growth and the creation of employment opportunities.

He said:

In order to achieve these objectives, the government will require private lending institutions to direct mortgage financing to lower and moderately priced new housing. In 1976, this will require an additional $750 million...

It is not the first program of this kind. The results of the previous ones are not a cause for great optimism. And until now, from what we have seen in this field, the government keeps launching new programs only to realize after a certain time that they did not work and that they have to be revised or revamped.

I come to the main point:

A prices and incomes policy which establishes guidelines for responsible social behaviour in determining prices and incomes of groups, together with machinery for administering these guidelines and ensuring compliance where necessary.

No one here will doubt that my party supports that policy in principle, but, of course, it has very serious doubts as to the suggested avenues. What is sure is that the success of that program will above all be based on the credibility of the government and this is now lacking. You cannot reverse your policy as Mr. Trudeau just did without any justification.

You cannot talk about inflationary expectations. You cannot steal a program you have been opposing without first beating your breast, becoming humble, apologizing. You cannot, if you expect nationwide support, fail to admit that you have been wrong, and that you have misled the nation, if not deliberately, at least unknowingly.

Of course, that is not a very natural attitude for the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and his government. Being humble is not their main characteristic. The Liberal Party cannot within a few days rid itself of its complex of superiority, infallibility and, why not, indispensability—and I am thinking here of Mackenzie King whose philosophy and mentality are still leading and haunting the Liberals. Still, I repeat that is the first condition for his control program to be successful.

I said that was the first condition, but it is not the only one. The government's credibility is also belittled by the confusion, the indecision, the procrastination and, in some ways, by the inflexibility inherent in the program.

First of all, the straitjacket they intend to force upon our economy for a period of three years, at least, frightens all the sectors of the economy, employers as well as employees, because people think that after a three-year period our whole system might be shattered and find it difficult to resume its cruising speed, and the results after three years might be disastrous for our free enterprise system. The government should therefore consider the Hon. Mr. Stanfield's suggestion to reduce that period to a maximum of 18 months.

Second, there is confusion due to the fact the board cannot say how and to what extent revenues may rise.

Third, the suggestion that there will be a freeze on dividends is unrealistic, discriminatory and unfair to a large number of fixed income earners. It also contradicts the need to promote capital expenditures, thereby stimulating the economy.

Fourth, the government cannot assure the Canadian people that the same rules established under this federal statute will be used by the provinces in their fields of jurisdiction, indicating hesitations that are bound to cause extremely dangerous reactions.

Generally, the government is creating a definite impression that although it had intended for a period of time before imposing controls, it could do nothing but improvise when time came for action.

Mr. Trudeau said on the evening of October 13 he hoped the people would accept his program because all Canadians working together could make it succeed. There is no question the government needs the support of all the people, but to date I suggest it has not been very convincing. It must bear the major responsibility for adverse reactions in every sector of the economy and the Canadian people.

Despite all this, I have no doubt that when Bill C-73 is enacted, hopefully with the amendments needed, Canadians will want to comply. The business community, although justifiably concerned, promised its support. There remains the attitude of labour unions, which is really disquieting.

I do not contest labour's right to fight the bill and above all to improve it, as long as it has not been enacted by Parliament. However, it seems unacceptable that we hear threats of a general strike and illegal action.

Although concerned by this possibility, I am not surprised. In the last few years, illegal strikes have become frequent, regular, and virtually accepted by public opinion. There have been teachers' strikes blatantly disguised as study sessions or other manifestations. The student population is no longer surprised by the fact that those in charge of their education flout the law. Groups of workers have refused to obey court orders to go back to work.

Parliament has even passed legislation ordering a group of workers to obey the law. Is this not completely absurd?

It is true that the government has sometimes given a very bad example in this regard. I am thinking of the present government which, for more than eight years, has systematically refused to apply the law providing the death penalty for murderers of policemen and prison guards. At the present time I do not want to pass judgment on this issue, but simply point out the defiance of the law which exists nearly everywhere, and under the most misleading pretexts.

It remains that whatever the cases of defiance of the law, and even if the government itself has been guilty of it on occasion, it is totally irresponsible on the part of labour unions to take the demagogic attitude that some of their leaders would want them to take. I could give as an example of such types of cases the fanatic Michel Chartrand. Others are a little less fanatic, but not less irresponsible. For these people, the opportunity is, of course, much too good not to attack our free enterprise system and suggest that the legislation studied by Parliament aims simply at protecting the private sector of industry and commerce. To combat this propaganda and to make the workers understand that it is as much to their advantage as it is to the other sectors of the population that we fight inflation, and that they must play their part like everyone else, the government will have to be extremely careful and above all suspicion. This is truly an occasion for the government to emulate Caesar's wife.

Not only will it have to be convincing but convinced as well, because people may and do wonder whether the government actually acts as it thinks, or whether it thinks as it acts—people are not sure.

In any case, I hope once the legislation is passed it will have the support of everyone. For the time being, we on this side of the house feel free to criticize the shortcomings of the program and even vote against the bill, which will be the expression of war against inflation if we think the bill is defective. But we assure the government right now of our support in its application and we ask each and every one in this country to do the same.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Flynn: Always, my honourable friend.

Senator Greene: Would the Conservative Party want to have an election on the issue of the government's program?

Senator Flynn: I do not know how the issue could be put to the people. But if the election were to be a vote of confidence in the Liberal government I have no objection because I know in advance what the result would be.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

[English]

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES OF SENATORS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon the privileges and immunities that apply to members of the Senate within the precincts of the Senate, and the powers of the Speaker in respect thereof.—(Honourable Senator Croll).

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand until December 9.

Senator Asselin: You aren't ready?

Senator Croll: I am ready.

Senator Grosart: Make it December 19.

Senator Asselin: Have you received orders not to speak?

Senator Croll: I have no objection. My own feeling is that our colleague is entitled to the courtesy of silence. I am trying my best to give it to him.

Senator Asselin: It is a question of diplomacy.

Order stands.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the Senate.

Before the question is put, I would remind honourable senators that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will sit as soon as the Senate rises.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 26, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator McIlraith be removed from the list of senators serving on the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament: and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS— STATEMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to give the house the latest report on the strike of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

The situation across the country continues to show a gradual improvement, with 187 offices fully operational today compared to 181 Tuesday. There is a slight improvement in manpower as well, with 2,518 CUPW employees on the job today. Tuesday showed 2,469 CUPW employees at work.

There is nothing to report as of noon on any resumption of negotiations, although the media continues to report that a meeting will be held today. Western Quebec reported another office open today—Ste. Agathe—with Hespeler, Hanover, Niagara-on-the-Lake and Ridgetown opening in southwestern Ontario, and Richmond Hill and Thornhill being operational in Metro Toronto.

Toronto's Terminal A reported 282 employees at work in the last 24 hours while nearly 1,000 are on the job in the Metro Toronto area. Control Centre reports picketing but on a much smaller scale than Tuesday.

Western Region reports some 400 members of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour walked the picket line in Saskatoon Tuesday for some 20 minutes before returning to a conference on the wage and price guidelines.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND, (NO. 2)—THIRD READING

Senator Hayden moved the third reading of Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE (TOTAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator O'Leary, for the second reading of the Bill S-23, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Defence Act and the Criminal Code (total abolition of capital punishment)".—(Honourable Senator Prowse).

Senator Petten: Stand until Wednesday next, December 3.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might rise on a question of privilege, or perhaps it is a "question of order." I introduced this bill in the Senate some months ago. On June 10 last, Senator Prowse moved the adjournment of the debate. It seems to me that when a bill such as this is in the hands of the Senate and is the property of the Senate, that honourable senators should be given every opportunity to take a decision on it. There should not be an endeavour, as there is now, obviously, to postpone debate indeterminately in order that a decision is not taken.

I would hope that whatever adjournment is moved today, that it be a brief one, and I would hope that the Senate will soon be given an opportunity to vote on the second reading of this bill.

● (1410)

Senator Flynn: Is there any motion?

Senator Langlois: No, it is a question of privilege.

Senator Argue: If there is no motion before the house, I claim the right to close the debate.

Senator Petten: There will be a motion on Wednesday next, December 3.

Order stands.

CRIMINAL CODE (COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion, in amendment, of the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Norrie, to the motion of the Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes, for the second reading of the Bill S-21, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (commutation of death sentence)".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would hope that Senator Petten would deal with this order as he did with the previous order.

Senator Petten: Stand until Wednesday next, December 3.
Order stands.

RULES OF THE SENATE

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 18, the debate on the motion of Senator Molson for the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was presented Wednesday, October 29.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, we have before the Senate today, and have had for some time, the report of our Rules Committee. This is an important report. It is certainly comprehensive, and will undoubtedly result in many changes to our rules. I have gone over the evidence given at the meetings of the committee. One thing that has impressed me from reading that evidence is that the chairman of the committee has an excellent grasp of our rules, and that he obviously presided over the committee in a fair and impartial manner. While I have some reservations about certain proposed rules, I think the report is in general a consensus of the views of members of that committee.

I should now like to make some comments on a few of the proposed rules. To me, the purpose of our rules and their interpretation should be for the discharge of the work of the Senate, for the improvement, if possible, of the work of the Senate, and they should be such as to encourage rather than discourage effective work by senators.

I first comment on the proposed rule 32, which commences:

A debate shall not be in order on an oral question—

I do not have any objection to that general rule, but I would point out it has been the practice in this chamber, certainly on some occasions, to interpret rule 32 with some latitude. If I, as a senator, raised a matter by way of a question and other senators wished to comment, that kind of thing was often allowed by the Speaker and by honourable senators. When someone has raised an urgent question on which a number of senators have wished to make brief comments, I think it has been found desirable that there be a liberal interpretation of the rule. I believe that practice should be continued.

The next rule I wish to comment on has to do with quoting statements from speeches by members of the other house. It is a rule which has been honoured more in the breach than in the observance.

Senator Grosart: What rule is that?

Senator Argue: Rule 34A. Certainly, I have from time to time quoted from speeches made in the other place, and have been called to order. I simply smiled and went ahead and kept on quoting, eventually placing on the record everything I had wished to when I commenced.

Senator Flynn: Some of us are expert in doing that.

Senator Argue: Senator Flynn and I have had this kind of discussion in years gone by. I must say I am a great admirer of Senator Flynn. He is most logical, and one of the best senators we have.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Argue: The indication here is that there is to be a new rule, which says:

The content of a speech made in the House of Commons in the current session may be summarized—

I can say, with respect, that the late Jimmy Gardiner would have enjoyed a rule such as this because he was adept at paraphrasing. I think this kind of rule would lend itself to that, perhaps getting us into more difficulty than if we had a rule which allowed us to quote what was said instead of merely giving by way of memory or summary what we say was said.

The rule goes on to say:

—but it is out of order to quote from such a speech unless it be a speech of a Minister of the Crown in relation to government policy.

I have tried to think about how a minister of the Crown would make a speech which was not in relation to government policy. It is pretty far-fetched to think that that could happen. For example, when the Prime Minister defends or champions his wage guidelines, that will certainly be a case of a minister of the Crown making a speech in relation to government policy, even though it may not in fact be an announcement of new government policy at the time. Certainly, if he were not talking about government policy he would be called to order.

So I welcome that rule. I hope I do not gum it up by welcoming it too strongly, but I think it is a good rule because inevitably we will refer to speeches made in the other place—we must from time to time in order to be relevant. Therefore, we should have in our rules some guide as to the manner in which we can make such reference.

The next point I wish to discuss has to do with the quorum. I have been involved in a number of meetings, both formal and informal, and I can say that the subject of quorum seems to pose certain difficulties. The proposed rule 70A reads as follows:

A quorum is required whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken by a select committee, but any such committee, by resolution thereof, may authorize the chairman to hold meetings to receive and authorize the printing of evidence when a quorum is not present.

That is just a practical suggestion. The chairman of the committee has already said that there was much discussion as to whether senators not of the committee might be considered members for the purpose of arriving at a quorum. I think this is preferable. As others have said on other occasions, you can pretty well trust the chairman—usually, anyway—and you can certainly trust senators generally.

I believe this new rule would be seldom used, in any event. We almost always have five members present at a committee meeting. Nevertheless, it is well to have the rule there in case there are important witnesses appearing before a committee which would not otherwise be able to sit, and also in the event that several committees are meeting at the same time, at which point it becomes a question of whether or not the committee can, in fact, function. I believe this is a good suggested change in our rules.

● (1420)

I have some doubts about rule 67(1), having to do with the operation and work of committees. It reads:

(g) The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which, if there is a motion to that effect, shall be referred bills, messages—

The rule as presently constituted reads:

—to which shall be referred on motion all bills—

I believe what was troubling the committee was the fact that sometimes this rule is not honoured. The Senate at present does not refer all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, et cetera, to a given committee. It is as well to have in our rules the statement that these things are, in fact, referred to committee, unless the Senate decides to forego the rule or overlook it.

It somewhat weakens the insistence that bills, messages, petitions, et cetera, be referred to committee. I have been assured that this is there merely to point out the fact that they are not always referred to committee. No senator has any wish to restrict in any way, because of this change, items that may go to committee. Any senator can move that one of those items shall be referred to committee.

Senator Flynn: It could be the decision of the house. The majority could say no.

Senator Argue: That is right. To that extent it does weaken the provision. In any event, I would hope that in actual practice this change will not be used to reduce the number of measures that go to committee. It is pretty easy to restrict the number when we are under great pressure towards the end of a session or approaching an adjournment, because of the amount of legislation that comes to us. We would be better to retain the present rule which protects decisions of the house against the majority who wish to skip sending something to committee. In any event, I hope my fears are not well founded and the practice of sending all these items to committee will be continued, because doing so is in the best interests of the Senate.

I wish now to refer to the proposed rule 77(6), which is:

Except as provided in these rules, a select committee shall not, without the approval of the Senate, adopt any special procedure or practice that is inconsistent with the practices and usages of the Senate itself.

On the surface that looks pretty sensible, and quite harmless. It says that a committee shall not do something which is inconsistent with the practices of the Senate.

I do not think we have encountered difficulties with our committees, despite the fact that we had quite a lively debate in the house as to whether the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs should be permitted to televise its proceedings. I do not think there has been any move on the part of committees to do things which are wild, irresponsible, and inconsistent with the practices of the Senate.

There is a danger, if we say to the committees, "You have to be consistent; we are watching you; do not improvise; do not do things in committee which are not consistent with the practices of the Senate," that we may place the committees in a difficult position.

Committees do not function exactly like the Senate. In committee there are witnesses of whom questions are asked. I may not have had very much experience and I may not be the best committee man in this chamber, but I have read the evidence presented to our various committees.

The Special Committee on Mass Media, for example, had some high-priced counsel—legal assistance—who undertook a substantial part of the questioning. That is a procedure which is not generally followed in the chamber. I do not see anything wrong with that. If experts, working for the committee, are in a better position to bring out the evidence at a given time, then I do not see anything wrong with using them. However, we should be careful that we do not hamstring the committee.

At one of the meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, a new technique was used—at least, it was a new technique for me. Present at the committee meeting were some very fine witnesses from the Universities of Laval and Moncton. The committee was discussing agriculture education in the French language, so that graduates who had taken the agriculture course and who were fluent in the French language could do a good job in the field of agriculture in certain parts of the country. At the conclusion of the more formal part of the hearing, it was suggested that there should be a kind of round robin, and it was agreed that anyone could make a statement or ask questions. Some of the very competent witnesses from one university were questioning those from the other university. In my opinion, that was an excellent exercise, an excellent procedure, but it might not have been strictly consistent with the practices of the Senate. Therefore, we should be cautious in not laying down too rigid rules for committees to follow.

Perhaps I can be pardoned for quoting from the record of one of our committee hearings, as it is one way of emphasizing my point. At that particular committee hearing I brought forward this matter to which I have just referred and, in reply, Senator Grosart said:

The Senate itself would decide whether it was consistent or not, but in this case I am quite sure the Senate would decide it was not inconsistent. If there is any doubt, why not find out whether the Senate wants it or not.

SENATOR COOK: Are we not just raising a red flag? Any committee chairman has to be looked at as a reasonable, rational person.

I thanked him for that comment.

SENATOR LANGLOIS: I think you have to trust your chairman.

SENATOR GROSART: You have to go on the basis that you cannot trust anybody, or you would not need rules.

He may have put it in a nutshell, and this may be exactly the way it is. I have operated on the basis that you must trust most people. Perhaps I am naïve, and perhaps Senator Grosart is quite accurate.

In my opinion, our committees should be given substantial leeway in performing what has been and will be a useful work for the Senate, and for all Canadians generally.

There is another rule to which I should like to make reference. Rule 67(1)(f) deals with the Internal Economy Committee, and says:

The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of twenty members, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

There has been some suggestion that this is going far afield, that this committee should not be given such a self-starting power. The reasons for proposing this rule have been stated, and it seems to me that they are valid reasons. It would seem to me that when the Internal Economy Committee has to deal with so many of what have been called "housekeeping" matters relating to monetary and administrative matters in respect of the Senate and its committees, it is impossible and impractical to have every item referred to that committee by the Senate itself. It would seem to me that there is a good deal of control now—I would think ample control—under our rules, as I understand them, although I am really no authority on them. I just try to get as good an understanding of them as I can.

● (1430)

For a select committee to function, its work, its authority, has to be provided by the Senate. Also, its proposed budget has to go before a budgets subcommittee of the Internal Economy Committee, and the Internal Economy Committee itself. I think Senator Forsey will agree with me when I say that that committee is tight-fisted, is careful. When you go before it with a budget, you are on edge. You do not know whether you will succeed in getting the budget through, even though in your own heart you know that it is a modest budget and, if anything, on the cheap side. But that committee looks at it very, very carefully. Its members are like the late Ross Thatcher. I often said to him, "I think you are more careful with public money than you are with your own," and those who knew him will acknowledge that that meant he was exceedingly careful with both. The Internal Economy Committee is careful, it is responsible and I think that being able to operate in the way suggested would certainly be an improvement.

Whatever is passed by the committee, of course, has to be reported to the Senate, so that I do feel there is good control over expenditures by the Senate and its committees. I should think the Internal Economy Committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Laird, would not abuse any authority it is given by the Senate, and will conduct itself in a businesslike and rational way.

For those reasons, I very warmly support this addition to our rules.

There is one other matter I should like to deal with before resuming my seat. In my view, the Senate should give some consideration—and I say this in a humble and sincere way—to what I believe is a problem. I refer to very long, protracted adjournments of debates which, to my mind, sometimes become not just adjournments for the convenience of some honourable senator by way of allowing him sufficient time to prepare a speech, but part of a technique by those who have a greater influence in this chamber, if I can put it that way, to see that certain things are not dealt with by way of the question being put on the motion. To alleviate this problem, I would suggest a change in our rules whereby a senator may adjourn a debate, but, if the item is called on four occasions and he is not present to continue the debate on the fourth occasion, then he automatically relinquishes his place to someone who is prepared to continue the debate.

[Senator Argue.]

I realize that if it is wished to keep on delaying debate on a question, that can still be done simply by lining up honourable senators to adjourn the debate. However, by so doing it would be a bit more embarrassing, and I would think that in the Senate we really do not have that much to fear, if we have anything to fear.

I feel the pressure when it is applied—and it is applied—by the administration in another place. I feel it when it is applied in the Senate, and I am embarrassed when I start to feel it. Many honourable senators are on record that they do not like being boxed in at the end of a session and presented with all kinds of legislation from the House of Commons that they are expected to rubber-stamp. It is a bad thing when we are expected to rubber-stamp legislation, and I do not like to be a rubber stamp.

Senator Choquette: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: I am guilty of being a rubber stamp, along with everybody else, when we are in the mood to rubber-stamp.

I would urge on the house, particularly in respect of bills and motions standing in the names of honourable senators—items that are not government measures—that at least to that extent there should be no endeavour to block or change the normal course of events in the Senate, and that all honourable senators, even though they may be in a minority at times, be allowed to take a decision on a question before the Senate.

I do not have a definitive answer to this problem, but I do think it is a real one. I believe it to be a real problem. I think some thought should be given to changing our rules so that matters of a private or public nature standing in the names of honourable senators as individuals might be expedited and brought to finality.

Honourable senators, I repeat, this report, by and large, is a good one. The chairman and the Rules Committee have performed, in an efficient and businesslike way, a very useful service for the Senate, and I am delighted to have been able to make these comments on the report.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to make a few comments on what Senator Argue has said, because in many ways I find myself in agreement with him.

Senator Flynn: Is that the best reason?

Senator Grosart: I am not always in agreement with Senator Argue, so I hasten to say that on this occasion I find myself in agreement with some of the remarks he made. This stems particularly from his comments on rule 32 which, at the present time, prohibits extended debate on an oral question. A few days ago something like 12 senators participated in a debate on an oral question. In other words, the rule is not being kept by habit. In the discussion in the Rules Committee I did raise the whole matter under rule 28 which, in the revised version, says:

A senator shall not speak more than once to a question before the Senate—

The view I expressed at that time was that this is a rule we do not need. In fact, as Senator Argue has just indicated, it may be the kind of rule that circumscribes the kind of debate most of us would like to see take place in this chamber more often. I do not think we need a rule that a senator may not speak more than once on a question before the Senate, for the simple reason that if we have any problem in this chamber in respect of dealing with bills or questions before the Senate it probably is that we do not have enough debate. Occasionally, of course, we use the device of referring a particular bill or subject to Committee of the Whole, in which case this rule does not operate. It has been my view that if we used that device, the practices and procedures of Committee of the Whole, in all our discussions here, we would not find ourselves in the position where we had too much debate or too much comment on a bill or question before the Senate.

In much the same area, Senator Argue mentioned rule 34A. I have spoken to this before. Here is a rule that is not kept. Certainly, it is honoured far more in the breach than in the observance. The committee has amended it to give perhaps more latitude in quoting or referring to the proceedings of the other house.

As we all know, we use the device from time to time of saying, "I heard this in another place," or, "This was said in another place." We have sometimes fallen into the rather odd habit of saying, "in the other place," which, of course, is meaningless, because this is a definite reference to the House of Commons. The phrase originated in the British House of Commons to get around this very rule in the case where the member speaking was obviously quoting and he was asked what he was quoting from and he would say, "I heard it in an other place," and this somehow degenerated into "the other place."

● (1440)

It is obviously impossible for the Senate to discuss a bill without having before it the statement made by the minister on government policy and the intent of the bill. Very often it is the only place where anybody discussing a bill can find out what the bill means. It is true that we often have a statement here, sometimes a very short statement. However, usually such explanations assume that the material from the House of Commons is available to any senator.

I can see no reason why we should have the rule, even in its enlarged form, which is the suggested amendment to rule 34A. We will go on and on quoting exactly what was said in the other place in spite of the rule as it stands. As I have indicated before, I am in favour of either having no rules at all or keeping to the rules as they are.

Senator Argue commented on a group of paragraphs under rule 67 (1). He mentioned, referring only to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, that we have changed the rule. The present rule provides that "on motion all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters" and so on, be referred to the appropriate committee. We have not, of course, been keeping this rule, and it would be absurd to ask that all papers be referred to the appropriate committee. When the Leader of the Government has tabled documents, under the rules as they have existed, those papers would have to be referred to the appropriate committee. That is one of the reasons for the change.

I am aware of the danger that at times there might be difficulty in persuading the government or the sponsor of a bill to refer it to a committee. There was an instance of that here some time ago. I do not think the rule changes that situation much, because the normal practice is for Her Honour to ask: "When shall this bill be read a third time?" and then a motion is usually made that it be referred to a committee. We therefore already have the procedure to take care of any possible loophole. On the other hand, if a majority in the Senate for any reason wishes to refuse to send a bill to a committee, that is the end of it, the majority will so decide.

Senator Flynn: Closure.

Senator Grosart: I am not suggesting that a majority would always be on the government side, but it is most likely it would be. If ever a non-government majority in this Senate made a major decision on government policy, I think it would begin the revival of consideration of necessary reform of the Senate.

Senator Argue had some problem with the rights of select committees to engage in innovations that are inconsistent with the rules, practices and procedures of the Senate. I would draw to his attention that the word is "inconsistent," which is not quite the same as saying "not consistent." "Inconsistent" suggests almost a deliberate difference; to be not consistent is not quite the same thing. This again, of course, would always be a matter for the Senate to decide. It is a rule that I think we all agree would be interpreted very liberally. Obviously the Senate must control the practices and procedures of its committees. I think the only point of this rule is to warn chairmen that any innovations they may make should not be clearly inconsistent with the procedures and practices of the Senate. Some years ago we had a ruling on that, with which I did not agree, but I do not think it involves the situation too much at the moment. Senator Argue quoted me as saying that in this connection I had said, "You cannot trust anybody." I would certainly repeat this immediately, because this is the basis of all rules of procedure and practice. If you could trust everybody you would not have any rules, not only in procedure and practice but in all our affairs. We have rules only because we cannot trust anybody, even the distinguished chairman of a committee.

Senator Greene: Are you speaking for your own party?

Senator Grosart: I am not speaking for any party. Did you ask if I was speaking for my party?

Senator Greene: I took it you were when you made the statement that you cannot trust anybody.

Senator Grosart: The honourable senator may be right. There may be some relevance in the fact that I belong to a political party which does not at the moment happen to form the Government of Canada. If he sees some relevance in my comment that you cannot trust anybody in that respect, I would not go out of my way to deny it.

Senator Argue also mentioned the subject of the adjournment of a debate. I find myself in agreement with him here, that the present practice is not one that we should condone. Perhaps I should say to Senator Argue that if my reading of the rules is correct, we do not have to condone it, because the motion is merely to adjourn the debate. Nothing in our rules says that any senator adjourning a debate has the right to prevent any other senator from speaking. When the subject comes up on the Order Paper before the Senate, the debate is merely adjourned. In the case Senator Argue was concerned about, there was nothing to stop him rising and saying, "I want to carry on the debate."

Senator Argue: That is what I did.

Senator Grosart: It may be said to be a practice or convention but it has no authority that I know of in the rules. We did discuss whether there should be a limitation, but I think we came back to the fact that if a senator adjourns the debate, any senator can rise when the subject comes up before us on the Order Paper in due course.

Those are my comments, honourable senators. I again say that I am glad Senator Argue spoke on this subject. Although I was a member of the committee and agreed in general with the recommendations, some of them were contrary to my suggestions, and others contrary to the suggestions of other senators. I agree that on the whole the chairman of the committee did an excellent job in arriving at a consensus of what at the moment is the best presentation of our rules, and he expressed the hope, as I do, that perhaps some consideration will be given to keeping them.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Grosart would permit a question arising out of his remarks?

Senator Grosart: Of course.

Senator McIlraith: When you were discussing the proposed rule 34A and that part of it permitting a senator to quote from a speech of a minister of the Crown in relation to government policy, you gave certain reasons why there should be that right to quote from such a speech. However, I note that the proposed rule does not provide for quoting the speech of, for example, the Leader of the Opposition in the other place in reply to a proposed bill, setting forth his alternative proposals dealing with the subject matter of the bill. How does the honourable senator reconcile being able to quote from the speech of the minister and not from the Opposition spokesman in opposing the bill and putting forward alternative proposals?

● (1450)

Senator Grosart: Actually, it is quite simple. I do not try to reconcile it because I believe it to be irreconcilable. The position I took in the committee was that there should be no restriction whatever on quoting from Hansard of the other place. The amended rule we have before us is a compromise. Compromises—and I think this is such a case—do not always make sense.

I agree entirely with Senator McIlraith that the present restriction to the effect that we can quote only a minister, and only quote him when he is discussing policy, just does not make any sense. We have long lived with rules that do not make any sense, and we will continue to live with a few. However, as I have said, our rules, in general, will now make much more sense than they did before the chairman brought in his report.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator McIlraith: Thank you.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a motion that the house adopts the report of the committee is not a substantive motion. Senator Molson's motion is not a substantive motion and, according to our rules, he has no right of final reply. I am in the hands of the house, however, and if no objection is raised he may proceed with his remarks, and close the debate.

Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, this is not the first time I have been caught by the rules. I shall try to be brief.

I thank honourable senators for their various comments and suggestions, first of all, because they are right, of course, and, secondly, because their suggestions will be helpful in any further consideration of the rules. As we all know, rules are not a particularly popular subject. We would probably be happier if we had none. But, as I said earlier, they are rather necessary, and we could not really operate without them.

If I may, honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments on the points raised in the debate. I shall be as brief as I can.

In the first place, Senator McIlraith did not like the way the report was presented, and I understand exactly what he meant. From what he said I gathered he was more concerned that there should be a wide-ranging discussion or debate at this stage about possible reform of parliamentary procedure. I think the idea of such a discussion is excellent and I agree with him in that respect, but I cannot agree that the right moment for such a discussion is during the debate on a motion for the adoption of a report of the Rules Committee. In my opinion, the two subjects are completely separate. The committee is simply trying to tidy up the rule book so that we can, from day to day, deal with our sittings as effectively as possible. The reform of parliamentary procedure is a wide-ranging subject which needs ample time for full debate. In that respect I, for one, would be delighted to see Senator McIlraith introduce the subject by way of a formal motion.

Another quite valid suggestion by Senator McIlraith is that when a bill receives first reading, it would be of more help to the Senate than otherwise if the sponsor were to give his initial explanation at that point. We should consider that suggestion carefully, and see if it can be put into effect. Without giving it careful consideration I cannot, of course, simply agree with it absolutely and suggest that we make the change, but, at first glance, it would seem to make good sense. It would aid the understanding of honourable senators if the initial explanation were given when the bill is introduced.

Another point raised by Senator Argue and others had to do with the Internal Economy Committee's being empowered to deal with matters without reference. I feel that point has been met fully. It seems obvious to me that if a committee is required to run the affairs of the Senate, its meetings and consideration of matters cannot be restricted solely to those times when matters are referred to it, because our sessions are far too short and time simply goes by. It must be a committee in being.

I found the discussion concerning the principle of a bill being "usually" debated on second reading interesting, in that for the first 90 years of the Canadian Parliament the word "usually" was in the rules. If you look at the 1952, 1964 and 1969 editions of the rule book you will see that word. It was taken out at the suggestion of a member of the Senate, and then after later discussion was reinstated. Actually, it was felt that the rule was not really a hard and fast rule, so "usually" reappears in this report. It is arguable, but I do not think it does the slightest harm.

In connection with rule 7, Senator Benidickson raised the question of whether the Senate was doing the wise thing in always meeting at two o'clock in the afternoon. In fact, the rule does not necessarily require the Senate to meet at two o'clock in the afternoon of each sitting day. The Senate is in its own hands as to when it will meet, because the rule states that the Senate will meet at two o'clock unless otherwise previously ordered. If the Deputy Leader of the Government moves that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until 2.30 or 3.00 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, that matter is in the hands of the Senate, just as is everything else.

Unfortunately, the other day I made a rather mixed-up reply in connection with the matter of budgets and the report of the Internal Economy Committee. It is quite clear that the Internal Economy Committee, when dealing with any matter, is and always has been empowered to submit a report to the Senate. It submits a budget or a statement, but what it does not do is invite the Senate to go over those figures in detail. It submits the report and, as Senator Bourget pointed out, it gives an opportunity to any senator, who, for any reason, objects to some part of the report, to raise that objection at that point. In that way every member of the chamber has the opportunity to object to a financial matter which is the subject of a report of the Internal Economy Committee.

Let me turn to the remarks made by Senator Argue today. I found them very helpful and I am most grateful to him, not only for his kind words about our committee but also for the salient points he made with respect to matters in the report.

His first point, with respect to a debate not being permitted on an oral question, has been discussed already by Senator Grosart. Here we have to let practice and tradition have sway. The rule does state that a debate is not permitted on an oral question, but, as was mentioned, there have been many occasions on which, owing to the interest taken in a particular subject, we have proceeded rather out of order. On such occasions the matter seems to have been cleared up quite satisfactorily with considerable debate taking place, albeit against the rules, but with most pleasing results and with no objections from anyone in the chamber. I do not think the rule is going to affect that.

Senator Argue's next point was also raised by Senator McIlraith, namely, the question of quoting from Hansard of the other place. This rule is similar to one in the House of Lords, and, by tradition, it has existed in both the British Parliament and the Canadian Parliament for a very long time. The fundamental reason is to avoid unnecessary conflict between the two chambers, and between individuals. A secondary purpose is to avoid the continuation of a debate of one house in the other house. In other words, in modern terminology, we do our own thing; we have our own debate. As Senator Grosart pointed out, the rule is for the purpose of discussing the government policy involved, without which we really cannot discuss the principle of a bill.

● (1500)

With regard to Senator McIlraith's point about the Leader of the Opposition not being included with the ministers, I would say there have to be exceptions to rules. If government policy was opposed in the Commons by the Leader of the Opposition, perhaps some senator would object to the quoting of his words in Hansard, although I doubt it. I am sure the speaker would be allowed to continue. As Senator McIlraith said the other day, very often policy is not discussed in the other place by the minister, but by his parliamentary secretary. When we speak about a policy statement by a minister, or a policy statement appearing in Hansard of the other place, there could be a fairly loose application. The Leader of the Opposition or a parliamentary secretary could be included under that heading. At least, there is no great danger of being called to order in the Senate.

Senator Argue referred to the question of a quorum at committee meetings. We are all well aware of the problems which exist, particularly those of the Opposition, in getting reasonable representation at any committee meeting. This rule, like all compromises, is the best we can do. So long as there is a quorum for the votes, we should let a committee carry on and hear evidence. I think the procedure is sound.

With regard to the point about committee procedures being indistinguishable from those in the chamber, there is no intention here of reducing the powers of, or the generation of ideas in, committees. If the Senate is to present a new image to the world, to do things differently and adopt new practices, any change should be decided here. We should all have a say in the matter. It is better to do it that way than have one committee do something that is perhaps original. Other committees would have to decide whether they want to do it in a similar way, or they may have reasons for not doing it. Any change in policy affecting our public image should be decided in the chamber. That is the objective of the rule.

I do not think I need comment on the tight-fisted attitude of the Chairman of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee. Attention to the use of public moneys is a good quality to have in a chairman, and we hope he applies that same attention to his own affairs. The way that budgets have been submitted and handled is, I believe, satisfactory to both the members of the committee and the chairman.

Senator Argue raised a point about adjourning a motion and leaving it on the Order Paper with the definite intention of delay. I am not sure that we have any rule which fully covers that situation. All I would say is that if something arises which suggests that it is a proper subject for a new rule, or change of rule, and if a proposal is put to the Rules Committee, the committee will follow the proce-ture it has followed in the last three years—that is, it will collate all suggestions and sooner or later will get around to seeing whether an improvement can be made. In that way I hope we shall reflect, to some extent, the wishes of all honourable senators.

May I add that it would certainly make the chairman and members of the committee extremely happy if, when the committee meets, all honourable senators who are not otherwise engaged were to attend and join in the discussion. It is much easier for the members of the committee to know in advance the views of their colleagues than to bring in a report and find that it is not in accord with the opinion of the majority. I remind the house that the purpose of the committee is to try to establish a set of rules which meets the wishes and views of the majority. It is the committee's intention to carry out the wishes of the Senate. It does not wish to impose its own views. It feels very much the obligation to provide the kind of rules which the Senate wants. The committee, as always, is completely in the hands of the Senate.

In conclusion, I should point out that when our rules seem too tight or too binding, we in the Senate can do anything we wish, provided we obtain leave. Over the years that has often been the way we have done things. It is rare that an honourable senator is refused leave after he has submitted a reasonable request, and we may count on that continuing in the future.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Basha, that this report be now adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FINAL ACT OF HELSINKI CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Forsey:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, in spite of what Senator Argue has said by way of criticism of people asking that items stand, I think at this hour of the afternoon, when there may be committees that are going to meet, it might be better if I asked to have this inquiry stand until a later date.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 27, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENTS—CONSIDERATION
NEXT SITTING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill with the following amendments to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

Page 1, lines 20 and 21. Strike out lines 20 and 21 and substitute the following therefor:

"(c) for the purpose of preventing or correcting nutritional disorders of livestock;"

Page 3, line 6. Strike out line 6 and substitute the following therefor:

"10. (1) Every person who"

Page 3, lines 18 to 30. Strike out lines 18 to 30 and substitute the following therefor:

"(1.1) Where a corporation commits an offence under this Act or the Regulations, any director or officer of the corporation who authorizes or acquiesces in the offence or fails to exercise due diligence to prevent its commission is guilty of an offence and liable to the punishment provided for in subsection (1)."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that these amendments be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

KING GEORGE V CANCER FUND WINDING-UP BILL FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-76, to wind up The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund for Canada and to authorize the sale of the assets and securities of the Fund and to transfer the sale proceeds and the balance of moneys to the National Cancer Institute of Canada.

Bill read first time.

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Langlois tabled:

Statement showing Classification of Loans in Canadian Currency of the Chartered Banks of Canada as at September 30, 1975, pursuant to section 119(1) of the Bank Act, Chapter B-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of The Fisheries Research Board of Canada for the year ended December 31, 1974, pursuant to section 12 of the Fisheries Research Board Act, Chapter F-24, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of Transport for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 34 of the Department of Transport Act, Chapter T-15, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Minister of Finance respecting Olympic coins for the six months ended September 30, 1975, pursuant to sections 13(1) and 13(3) of the Olympic (1976) Act, Chapter 31, Statutes of Canada, 1973-74.

Report of the Federal-Provincial Committee on Foreign Ownership of Land to the First Ministers, dated September 21, 1975.

Copy of the James Bay Agreement.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 2, 1975, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put on the motion to adjourn, I should like to give the usual short summary on what we can expect for the next week. I shall deal first with the committees. On Tuesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will sit at 9.30 a.m. and again at 2.30 p.m. That committee still has before it Bill C-2, to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and the subject matter of Bill C-60, the Bankruptcy Act, 1975. In addition, it is now working on the subject matter of Bill C-73, known as the prices and incomes bill.

● (1410)

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet at 2.30 p.m. Tuesday to continue its consideration of the Green Paper on Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest, and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service has called a meeting for 11 a.m. The Foreign Affairs Committee will meet on Tuesday at 2 p.m. to consider its report on Canada-United States relations. In addition, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 8.30 p.m. on Tuesday.

On Wednesday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has scheduled a meeting for 9.30 a.m., and it is the intention of that committee to continue its sitting into the afternoon, if the Senate so agrees. Also on Wednesday, the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy will meet at 10 a.m.

On Thursday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the Foreign Affairs Committee is expected to meet, again on its report on Canada-United States relations, at the same hour. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m., and the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 3.30 p.m.

The Senate itself will proceed with consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, and with the second reading of Bill C-76, to wind up The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund for Canada. In addition, my information is that Bill C-73, the prices and incomes legislation, will be before the Senate when we meet on Tuesday evening. All senators are aware of the importance and urgency of Bill C-73, and in the light of this it may be necessary for the Senate to sit on Friday of next week, although no decision has been made in this respect. If the bill is before the Senate early next week, we shall announce the Friday sitting so that honourable senators will be in a position to make the necessary arrangements. In addition to the foregoing, it is expected that two or three other bills will be referred to us from the House of Commons next week.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to point out the importance of as many senators as possible being present on Tuesday so that none of the committees scheduled to sit that day will be short a quorum. It was decided not to convene the Senate Tuesday afternoon because there are three committee meetings scheduled for Tuesday, and it is impossible to get sufficient reporting staff to cover three committee meetings and the Senate itself at the same time. I hope all senators will bear in mind the heavy schedule for next week in making arrangements for their attendance here.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the only point I want to question the Deputy Leader of the Government on is the possibility of sitting next Friday in the event that we have Bill C-73 before us. I hope it is not the view of those on the other side of the house that if Bill C-73 should come to us next week it should be passed by Friday.

Senator Langlois: No, not at all.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps it would be in order to compliment the reporting staff on having found it impossible to cover three committee meetings at the same time. The reporting staff appears to have been able to accomplish what the Senate itself could not.

Senator Langlois: Three committee meetings as well as the Senate sitting.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Langlois.]

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS— QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, has the Deputy Leader of the Government any report on the number of postal employees who have returned to work or, perhaps, on the final settlement of this strike?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I was waiting to see whether there were any questions to be put to me before giving the report on the postal situation, which I can now do.

The erosion of the CUPW position across the country, especially in the Metro Toronto area, continues to grow today as nearly 2,700 employees, representing 12 per cent of the inside workers, are on the job. This is an increase of almost 200 workers since Wednesday.

Metro Toronto District today reports 1,100 CUPW staff on the job in the last 24 hours, in contrast to Wednesday's figure of nearly 1,000. Toronto also reports that a tractor-trailer containing some 900 bags of parcel post destined for Ottawa was dispatched this morning via regular contractor.

About 20 pickets manned a line at the Downsview office last night—they were not Downsview employees—and were harassing workers entering the plant.

Western Canada CUPW union leaders reportedly are meeting today in Calgary to assess the Western Region situation. Calgary is planning letter carrier delivery on Friday. In British Columbia, charges of assault against CUPW pickets have been laid by an employee roughed up in an incident earlier this week. Further charges are pending.

There is nothing new to report on possible resumption of negotiations.

Senator Flynn: Is there anything in the rumour that there are only a few very narrow points remaining to be settled, and that if both sides were to really try a full settlement would be reached? That would, of course, be more desirable than a gradual improvement, which will take us to Easter, as was indicated by the Postmaster General some time ago.

Senator Langlois: As honourable senators will have read in the newspapers this morning, both sides are trying to limit the scope of the negotiations, which are possibly to be resumed. I have no definite official information in this respect.

Senator Flynn: Any hope?

Senator Langlois: I always hope. Where there is life there is hope.

Senator Grosart: It is a hopeful government.

AGRICULTURE

CROP INSURANCE PROGRAMS—MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on crop insurance programs, which was presented Thursday, July 17, 1975.

Hon. Hazen Argue moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move the adoption of this report on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Senator Flynn: At long last.

Senator Argue: This is an interim report on the progress made by the committee in its study of crop insurance in Canada.

During the past year the committee has conducted a comprehensive study of crop insurance. On July 17 an interim report was tabled in the Senate, and printed as an appendix to Hansard of that day. I want now to outline briefly some of the main conclusions in that report, and inform the Senate of some of the progress that has been made in some provinces towards achieving acceptance of our recommendations. As a result of the work of the committee, improvement in crop insurance programs has been substantial.

Crop insurance is an important subject, and this is an important report. In view of this, I very much regret, on looking at the gallery, to see no member of the press present. Today, even the Canadian Press has failed to have a representative in the gallery. When senators are accused by the press of dereliction of duty, it should be noted that on this occasion the press has failed to show up for these important deliberations of the Senate.

● (1420)

In defence, they might say it was because of the weather that they could not make it, but the senators made it. They might also say in defence that the House of Commons is sitting, but that means that the committees of that house are not sitting, and having regard to the number of reporters I should think there are enough to cover one house, and still have enough left over to cover the deliberations of this chamber as well.

The Agriculture Committee met quite a number of times. It heard witnesses from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, and received a written representation from the Government of British Columbia.

There are some problems with crop insurance that the committee believes should be brought to the attention of the Senate, the federal and provincial governments, and the public, and about which the committee desires to make some recommendations. These include the variations between provincial programs, the rates of interest charged on the late payment of premiums, the existing spot loss coverage, and the lack of uniformity across provincial borders in respect of insurance programs for crops produced under similar conditions.

When the crop insurance agencies of Alberta, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick appeared before the committee, they recommended that spot loss coverage be widened to meet the needs of farmers in their provinces. The spot loss option covers damage by a specific peril to a portion of the insured's crop regardless of whether production of that crop exceeds the guarantee or not. Without this type of coverage, farmers can experience severe losses and not receive compensation.

It was pointed out to us that there might be a partial flooding, by the overflowing of a river in the spring alongside crops that had been planted. A farmer might lose the total production from 25 per cent of his acreage because of flooding, but because he had a good average crop, or a better than average crop, on the remaining 75 per cent of his acreage he received no payment at all.

The feeling expressed by the crop insurance spokesmen for many of the provinces was that spot loss, which prevails now for hail damage in many provinces, should be extended. The Alberta, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick crop insurance agencies believe that the farmers in their provinces would be willing to purchase, indeed, are desirous of purchasing, spot loss coverage for other perils. The Alberta Hail and Crop Insurance Corporation recommended that coverage for damage due to excessive early flooding of creeks, rivers and lakes, where the area affected exceeds ten acres, for damage by insects for which no control technology is commercially available at the time of the outbreak, and for damage by wildlife, be included in the approved list. The New Brunswick Crop Insurance Commission recommended that damage to potato crops due to washouts and flooding be included.

I turn now to the variations in the programs and the coverage that is provided. The committee has given particular attention to this problem in relation to the Prairie region, but it recognizes that variations do exist in the Maritimes. It will be giving further attention to those problems in the Maritimes in future deliberations.

I should point out that for the 1975 crop year, there was a very large variation between the Prairie provinces in the price coverage available to farmers. For example, a farmer in Saskatchewan had the opportunity this year of insuring his wheat to a value of just $2.25 a bushel. In Manitoba, a farmer had the opportunity of insuring his crop of wheat up to a maximum of $2.75 a bushel, and in Alberta to a maximum of $3.50 a bushel.

The variations are also great for oats—$1.25 in Manitoba, $1 in Saskatchewan and $1.20 in Alberta. For barley, a farmer in Manitoba could insure up to $1.75, in Saskatchewan up to $1.40, and in Alberta up to $2.

Since this is a federal-provincial program, obviously there was discrimination against farmers who live in my own province, Saskatchewan, and who were unable to have access to the same kinds of benefits which farmers receive in Alberta. Therefore, the committee recommended that within regions of similar soils, climate and production practices it is desirable that the producers of a crop should have access to crop insurance which is essentially the same, especially in the important areas of minimum and maximum coverage levels, premium discounts and dollar value options.

In discussing what has transpired since the committee's recommendations were published in July, I have had the opportunity to speak with Mr. Glenn M. Gorrell, the Director of the Crop Insurance Division of Agriculture Canada. Incidentally, I might say that Mr. Gorrell attended almost all of the committee meetings when we were dealing with crop insurance. On the couple of occasions when he was not able to be there himself, he had officials from his division in attendance. He and his staff were most helpful to the committee, and they cooperated in every way. I have a letter from Mr. Gorrell, addressed to me under date of November 21, 1975, and I should like to read one or two paragraphs from it:

As discussed earlier yesterday, there has been some progress towards standardizing coverages available under crop insurance programs on a regional basis.

Following the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, a joint meeting of the Board of Directors and senior management of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, together with representatives of our office, was held in Regina in July.

That was in accordance with our recommendation.

There was a general consensus at this meeting that standardized programs could eliminate certain criticisms and a general movement to that end would be desirable.

The first step in this direction was a decision to set uniform maximum prices for insurable crops across the prairies. A table showing the prices proposed for 1976-77 in each of these provinces is attached. A move towards a more uniform penalty for late paid premiums was also initiated, and has resulted in Saskatchewan... moving the date of their first surcharge on unpaid premiums back to September 16 from August 16.

This meant that there was one month's grace between the time the discount was removed for early payment and the time the penalty came into effect for late payment. Up until then the discount had been on one day and the penalty on the following day. In his letter, Mr. Gorrell goes on to say:

It was also recognized that there were other areas where a greater degree of uniformity would be advantageous... I am confident that wherever possible future changes will take into account what is being done elsewhere.

A similar regional meeting was held... earlier this month with representatives of the Maritimes and of this office. Again there was general agreement that uniformity was desirable, but no positive results can be reported at this time.

● (1430)

Mr. Gorrell goes on to point out:

Saskatchewan is considering the introduction of a forage program similar to Manitoba's, and a program covering field peas. British Columbia is adding a program on alfalfa, but apart from these, I am not aware of any other significant additions...

A study of the re-insurance provisions of the crop insurance program—

This concerns another of the committee's recommendations.

—has been undertaken by this Division through the Department of Insurance. No conclusions have been reached to date.

I would be pleased to discuss specific aspects of any... program with you at your convenience.

I do not know if a statement of the changes that have been brought about with regard to the coming 1976 insurance programs on the Prairies is available to honourable senators, but I have here a table, given to me by Mr. Gorrell, and I would ask that it be included in Hansard at this point.

[Senator Argue.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

COMPARISON OF 1976 PRICES FOR INSURABLE CROPS—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

| Insurable Crop | High Price Option/Bushel | Low Price Option/Bushel | |
|--------------------------|-----------------------------|----------------------------|--------|
| MANITOBA | | | |
| Red Spring Wheat | $ 3.00 | $ 2.00 | |
| Durum Wheat | 3.00 | 2.00 | |
| Oats | 1.25 | 0.90 | |
| Barley | 2.00 | 1.25 | |
| Flax | 5.00 | 3.00 | |
| Fall Rye | 2.00 | 1.25 | |
| Rapeseed | 4.00 | 2.75 | |
| Mustard | 4.00 | 2.75 | |
| Sunflower | 0.08/lb. | 0.06/lb | |
| Buckwheat | 3.15 | 1.85 | |
| Field Peas | 3.75 | 2.20 | |
| Grain Corn | 3.15 | 2.00 | |
| Mixed Grain | 1.75 | 1.00 | |
| Unseeded Acreage | 20.00/acre | 10.00/acre | |
| Forage | 1.20/cwt. | 0.80/cwt. | |
| Sugar Beets | 15.00/ton | 12.25/ton. | |
| Potatoes | 1.75/cwt. | 1.40/cwt. | |
| SASKATCHEWAN | | | |
| Spring Wheat | $ 3.00 | $ 2.25 | |
| Durum Wheat | 3.00 | 2.25 | |
| Utility Wheat | 2.75 | 2.00 | |
| Oats | 1.25 | 1.00 | |
| Barley | 1.80 | 1.25 | |
| Fall Rye | 2.00 | 1.40 | |
| Flax | 5.00 | 3.50 | |
| Rapeseed | 4.00 | 3.00 | |
| Mustard | 4.00 | 3.00 | |
| Sunflowers | 0.08/lb. | 0.06/lb. | |
| Unseeded | | | |
| Summerfallow | 20.00/acre coverage | | |
| ALBERTA | | | |
| Winter Wheat | $3.00 | $2.50 | $1.50 |
| Spring Wheat & Durum | 3.00 | 2.50 | 1.50 |
| Utility Wheat | 3.00 | 2.50 | 1.50 |
| Oats | 1.25 | .90 | .60 |
| Barley | 2.00 | 1.40 | .80 |
| Fall Rye & Spring Rye | 2.00 | 1.50 | 1.00 |
| Flax | 5.00 | 3.00 | 2.00 |
| Rapeseed | 4.00 | 3.00 | 2.00 |
| Mustard | 4.00 | 3.00 | 2.00 |
| Mixed Grain | 1.75 | 1.10 | .70 |

Senator Argue: As I have said, the committee's recommendations have resulted in some very important changes to date. The table shows that farmers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta can insure wheat up to $3 per bushel, oats up to $1.25 per bushel, and barley up to $2 per bushel in Alberta and Manitoba and up to $1.80 per bushel in Saskatchewan. Generally, these are substantial improvements in the program. Some further studies are being undertaken by the department in Ottawa and by provincial boards. The new programs being offered in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, which are almost identical, constitute, particularly for farmers on the Prairies, a substantial improvement in such programs.

Honourable senators, in summary I would like to say how pleased I am that as a direct result of this recommendation, crop insurance programs on the Prairies have been standardized. In particular, in Manitoba and Saskatchewan a very significant increase in coverage will be offered to farmers in the 1976 programs.

As a result of the committee's recommendation that joint meetings of boards of directors of crop insurance agencies be held from time to time, a joint meeting of the boards from the Prairie provinces has been held, and a joint meeting of the boards from the Maritime provinces has also taken place.

The committee found that penalties for late payment of premiums were, in some provinces, much too high, and recommended a reduction in such penalties. Some progress towards this reduction has taken place.

This study of crop insurance by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture is already a success story, since as a result it has achieved millions of dollars' worth of increased crop insurance coverage for Canadian farmers. I feel confident that the continuing work of the committee will assist in achieving many further improvements in this field.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in the unavoidable absence of the head of our Opposition bureau of agricultural expertise, perhaps I might be permitted to make certain comments.

Senator Bourget: You sound like Paul Martin.

Senator Grosart: This is the second time in two days that I have had occasion to agree with, and compliment, Senator Argue. I do not know whether this indicates a new role of his in the Senate, or increasing tolerance on my part.

Senator Forsey: Have you got a light in the window for him?

Senator Argue: I am not making any more moves.

Senator Grosart: I think it should be said that Senator Argue has introduced what is something of an innovation, although not entirely. This report was presented to the Senate for consideration on July 17, and in moving the adoption of the report today Senator Argue has been able to give us, particularly because of the delay since the report was presented, an indication of the degree of implementation that has been taken of the committee's recommendations.

I am sure that honourable senators are particularly concerned with this aspect of the work we do in committees and in the Senate. It is certainly refreshing to hear a report that the work of a Senate committee has resulted in the kind of implementation that Senator Argue has indicated, making available some millions of dollars' worth of insurance to farmers. It is not very often that we get this kind of report from a committee, and I suggest that it would be very much in our interest to have more such reports presented to us.

We had a similar report, also in great detail, from Senator Croll's Committee on Poverty, and my recollection is that we had a similar type of report from Senator Lamontagne on the work of his Science Policy Committee.

I would hope that this might become the practice here, that if the adoption of a report is not moved immediately after it has been presented by a particular committee, at some time thereafter the chairman of that committee might take the opportunity to report to us on the degree of implementation of recommendations made. In some cases this degree might not be very high, but even then it is information that we should have. If we were to find out that the hard work done by Senate committees was not having any effect on government policies, that might be just as useful information to have as to know that the recommendations have received favourable consideration and have been implemented. I think Senator Lamontagne might have something to say in the near future with regard to a similar innovation he is working on in his committee.

On motion of Senator Michaud, debate adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FINAL ACT OF HELSINKI CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

He said: Honourable senators, I don't think that I have previously addressed the house on any subject connected with external affairs. It is not a subject on which I feel myself, in general, very well informed, and I do not like to trouble the chamber with superficial and amateurish observations on matters which I have not had some occasion to give some study to. But this question of the Helsinki declaration is one where I think even a person who can make no claim to expert knowledge in foreign affairs may have something useful to say.

As far as I know, honourable senators, the declaration has not yet been tabled in either house. I understand that it is the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make a statement on the subject, but this apparently has been postponed. It might have been advisable for me to wait until that statement had been made although I might have found myself, I suppose, up against the rule against quoting from observations in the other place—in another place. I beg pardon for the lapse. However, honourable senators, the opportunity to speak on this may not present itself very soon again, so I decided I had better go ahead this afternoon while I had the chance.

In a good many quarters the Helsinki declaration has been received rather at face value as having produced something substantial on the subject of security and cooperation in Europe. I am afraid that on this I must confess myself to be, in the words of an old gentleman I met one time on a ship going to Leningrad, something of an old "septic". I am a bit sceptical about the value of this declaration.

● (1440)

I have no desire to get into the position where I shall be accused of being a cold warrior or anything of that sort, but rather long experience of the domestic variety of communists and long observation of other varieties has led me to the regretful conclusion that he who sups with the communist, domestic or foreign, must have a very long spoon. I am inclined to think that in this instance the statesmen of the Western powers, supping with representatives of the Soviet Union and other powers in Eastern Europe, were insufficiently careful about the length of their spoons. Putting it another way, I am inclined to think that in some respects they may have been led up the garden path or, if you prefer a different metaphor still, they may have been sold a pig in a poke.

On the face of it, the thing looks nothing worse, shall we say, than a succession of amiable platitudes. On the face of it, it would appear that the communist states have had a certain change of mind on certain questions of considerable importance, notably human rights in various forms. On closer examination I am not so sure that this is so, and on closer examination I think there are several features of the Final Act of the Conference which deserve to be looked at rather closely.

In the first place, there is the provision in section III, which appears at page 79 of the document which I have before me, which I was able to obtain thanks to the kindness of Senator Yuzyk. Section III is headed: "Inviolability of frontiers," reading as follows:

The participating States regard as inviolable all one another's frontiers as well as the frontiers of all States in Europe and therefore they will refrain now and in the future from assaulting these frontiers.

Accordingly, they will also refrain from any demand for, or act of, seizure and usurpation of part or all of the territory of any participating State.

Well, nobody wants to suggest that frontiers should be assaulted; this is not in question. On the other hand, I think it is very dubious whether any Western government should put its signature to a document which talks about the inviolability of frontiers in Europe. A great many of those frontiers were established by force and their establishment has never yet been recognized by the Canadian government. I think it is a pity that our government put its signature to a document like this, which appears to recognize the inviolability of those frontiers.

Now, of course, the answer to that is that this is not a treaty, that it has no binding, legal force. In that case, one can only say that a great many other provisions of this, which are touted as having some value for the protection of human rights, also have no legal force because they are not part of a binding treaty. But the fact remains that we have got here the seal of the Western governments on the statement that the frontiers in Europe are inviolable. I think this is highly unfortunate and will increase the despair which many refugees in our country feel about the frontiers in Eastern Europe in particular.

[Senator Forsey]

It is true, also, that there is provision later on for peaceful change in the matter of frontiers—rather, it is not later on, it is on the previous page, which appears to take some of the sting out of what I have been saying. This is under the heading: "Sovereign Equality"—section I of the declaration: "Sovereign equality, respect for the rights inherent in sovereignty." In paragraph 2 of that particular section you find that the participating states "consider that their frontiers can be changed, in accordance with international law, by peaceful means and by agreement."

Well, that is very nice. Of course, that is the only reasonable way in the modern world that they can be changed, the only acceptable way. But the fact remains that we have put our signature to this other section which talks about the inviolability of frontiers, and if we go then at some future date, when détente has progressed further, to the Soviet government and its allies and say, "What about changing some of these frontiers; what about doing something about the Baltic states?" which the Russians took forcible possession of, we shall be met with a bland smile and the statement, "Well, after all, we cannot agree on this; you have agreed not to assault the frontiers and we cannot make any agreement with you to change these frontiers," so we are completely stymied.

That is the first feature of this document which I think deserves attention. I think there is no question at all that this will strengthen the Soviet and other communist states' view that these frontiers are fixed and unalterable and now, in fact, the Western powers have accepted this, even though they have not signed something which gives it binding, legal force.

Then we have, of course, the remarks about self-determination in section VIII of this document, at page 81, very high-sounding phrases, headed by: "Equal rights and self-determination of peoples," as follows:

The participating States will respect the equal rights of peoples and their right to self-determination, acting at all times in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and with the relevant norms of international law, including those relating to territorial integrity of States.

Well, it is very nice, of course, to have this principle restated; it is down already in the charter of the United Nations. Then it goes on:

By virtue of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, all peoples always have the right, in full freedom, to determine, when and as they wish, their internal and external political status, without external interference, and to pursue as they wish their political, economic, social and cultural development.

I hope that that may indicate repentance by the Soviet Union for what it did in Czechoslovakia, but I feel exceedingly doubtful. I hope it indicates at least that the Soviet Union will never repeat what it did in Czechoslovakia in 1968, but again I am doubtful.

Judging by what I read of the situation in Yugoslavia, for example, I gather that the people in Yugoslavia, or a considerable number of them, are also very doubtful about whether this indicates a profound repentance on the part of the Soviet Union, or doubtful whether the Soviet Union would, in fact, refrain from interference if a certain situation arose in Yugoslavia after the death of the present president of that country. While I do not wish him any harm, nevertheless he has reached an age where he cannot count on any great prolongation of his physical existence. He is, I think, 82, or 83, and while there are many hale and hearty people of 82 and 83—some of them, perhaps, in this Senate, long may they flourish! My own mother-in-law is 103 and she shows every sign of going on indefinitely—nevertheless, when you get to that age you cannot really expect to go on very long. There is no certainty about it; no high probability and it is, indeed, perfectly possible that with the death of Marshal Tito there would be a situation in Yugoslavia fraught with danger, and a situation which would at least be tempting to the Soviet government and might tempt it to intervene there as it did in Czechoslovakia although, perhaps, by somewhat different means, because the physical possibilities of doing so would be more limited. As I say, I hope this indicates some kind of change of mind. I hope that it indicates that there will be no repetition of what happened in Czechoslovakia, but I have some doubts.

Then there are various sections dealing with internal affairs. I think you will find, for example, if you ever get hold of this document, that there is at page 83 an undertaking under the heading: "Matters related to giving effect to certain of the above Principles." You will find in the third paragraph an undertaking, or a declaration, that the participating states will do their best to:

—give effect and expression, by all the ways and forms which they consider appropriate, to the duty to refrain from the threat or use of force in their relations with one another.

The catch there, I think, is "by all the ways and forms which they consider appropriate". There are various phrases like this which are introduced into otherwise unexceptionable statements which give rise to doubts in my mind, at least, and, I think, in the minds of others as well and which I think ought to be drawn attention to.

● (1450)

Then there is, under the heading of "Exchange of observers", at page 86:

The inviting State will determine in each case the number of observers, the procedures and conditions of their participation, and give other information which it may consider useful.

Then, in the next paragraph:

The invitation will be given as far ahead as is conveniently possible through usual diplomatic channels.

Then we have, on the same page 1, under "Prior notification of major military movements":

Accordingly, the participating States recognize that they may, at their own discretion and with a view to contributing to confidence-building, notify their major military movements.

A little further on you have, under "Co-operation in the Field of Economics, of Science and Technology and of the Environment":

The participating States,

Taking into account the interests of the developing countries throughout the world—

And so on.

—reaffirming their will to co-operate for the achievement of the aims and objectives established by the appropriate bodies of the United Nations in the pertinent documents concerning development, it being understood that each participating State maintains the positions it has taken on them—

There is another qualifying phrase which will really take a good deal of the stuffing out of the apparent undertaking which has been given.

Then we come to the question of reunification of families and allied matters. This comes at pages 113 to 115 of the document, "Co-operation in Humanitarian and Other Fields":

The participating States,

Convinced that this co-operation should take place in full respect for the principles guiding relations among participating States as set forth in the relevant document,

Have adopted the following:

Then follows, under "Human Contacts":

The participating States—

And a series of what I think are referred to in the French legal language as "considéranrs"—"whereases", as we would say in English:

And conscious that the questions relevant hereto must be settled by the States concerned under mutually acceptable conditions.

That's another joker introduced into the thing.

In the next paragraph:

The participating States...

Make it their aim to facilitate freer movement and contacts, individually and collectively, whether privately or officially, among persons, institutions and organizations of the participating States, and to contribute to the solution of the humanitarian problems that arise in that connection.

That sounds nice enough as far as it goes.

Then we come to the next page:

In order to promote further development of contacts on the basis of family ties the participating States will favourably consider applications for travel with the purpose of allowing persons to enter or leave their territory temporarily, and on a regular basis if desired, in order to visit members of their families.

Well, some of you may have noticed some people at the top of the steps on the main walk here yesterday complaining of the attitude of the Rumanian government towards reunification of their families. Most of us, I imagine, received the document which I received—three letters from three of these people who have made repeated appeals to the Rumanian government that they be reunited with their families and be allowed to bring their wives and children out here, and they have met with a stony refusal. Deeds speak louder than words.

Under "Reunification of Families":

The participating States will deal . . . with applications in this field as expeditiously as possible.

On my one visit to Russia a great many years ago I discovered the interesting fact that the Russian expression for "immediately" is "se chas", this hour. This "expeditiously as possible" is very much in that category. It will be done as expeditiously as the various communist governments think possible; and judging from past experience, I should say that does not mean any exceeding of the speed limit.

Then you have, a little further down:

Persons whose applications for family reunification are granted may bring with them or ship their household and personal effects; to this end the participating States will use all possibilities provided by existing regulations.

That's a nice one too. You may have a perfect forest of regulations which amount to saying:

Mother, may I go in for a swim?

Yes, my darling daughter.

Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,

But don't go near the water.

That indeed might be a sub-heading for a great deal of discussion on this matter. A little further on, under "Travel for Personal or Professional Reasons," you have:

The participating States intend to facilitate wider travel by their citizens for personal or professional reasons and to this end they intend in particular:

—gradually to simplify—

"Gradually", observe; "se chas", this hour:

—gradually to simplify and to administer flexibly the procedures for exit and entry;

It might be interesting to have the observations of the Nobel prize winner, the academician Sakharov, if I have pronounced his name correctly, on that particular undertaking. It seems to have been honoured in his case rather in the breach than in the observance.

They also undertake to "endeavour gradually to lower, where necessary, the fees for visas and official travel documents." "Where necessary"—of course, they themselves will decide what the speed shall be and where there is any necessity for changing the existing regulations.

Then you find, a little further on, under "Improvement of Working Conditions for Journalists":

The participating States . . . intend in particular to:

—examine in a favourable spirit and within a suitable and reasonable time scale requests from journalists for visas.

And then they will:

—ease, on a basis of reciprocity, procedures for arranging travel by journalists of the participating States in the country where they are exercising their profession, and to provide progressively greater opportunities for such travel, subject to the observance of regulations relating to the existence of areas closed for security reasons.

And then they agree also to:

[Senator Forsey]

—ensure that requests by such journalists for such travel receive, in so far as possible, an expeditious response, taking into account the time scale of the request.

Then, over on the next page:

If an accredited journalist is expelled, he will be informed of the reasons for this act and may submit an application for re-examination of his case.

I think that pretty well sums up the comments which I should like to make on this. I have an enormous file of journalistic comments on this whole matter, but I shall not weary the Senate with those.

I want merely to quote one or two things from the very well-informed and very, I have found, over a long period of reading, reasonable, well-balanced London Economist. The issue of August 2, 1975 draws attention to some of the things I have already mentioned here, and it suggests that the Western statesmen have perhaps been unduly optimistic; that they have taken too much at their face value the undertakings which the communist states have given. They observe:

The process that has come to be called détente, which is really a period of east-west manoeuvring for advantage, opened in 1970. The first round, consisting of Herr Willy Brandt's 1970 treaties with Russia and Poland and the 1971 agreement about Berlin, was a clear success for the Russians: in return for accepting the status quo in the half-city of Berlin, they got Herr Brandt's acceptance of the status quo everywhere else in Europe east of the river Elbe. The second round, which has been centred on the security conference and the supposedly parallel negotiations in Vienna about cutting the Nato and Warsaw pact armies (and whatever happened to those?)—

The Economist asks that in parenthesis.

—has also gone well for Mr. Brezhnev. The third round is now starting. The hope that détente might yet begin to justify the optimists' original expectations depends on two theories about its possible long-term effects on Mr. Brezhnev's empire. They are the Gulliverisation theory, and the colanderisation one.

And the Gulliverisation theory is attributed to Mr. Henry Kissinger. It amounts to this: that any agreements, small agreements or large agreements, with the Soviet Union and its allies, even if they are very small, as most of them are likely to be, will gradually build up so that you will get a better feeling and you will get into a position where something more important may really be done, because the communist states will be getting more and more reasonable and sensible, and amenable to considerations which ordinarily appeal to Western states.

● (1500)

The Economist observes here:

But the trouble with the Gulliverisation theory is that it implies the Russians are gentlemen enough, having got their advantage in the present round of bargains, to return the compliment to the west in later rounds. It is very unlikely that they will; especially if, in the meantime, their economy and their military forces have grown stronger in relation to the west's partly as a result of the advantages they win now. It is far likelier that they will digest what they are getting now and then bargain equally hard next time round. General de Gaulle said, correctly, that all states are "cold monsters", without gratitude or permanent obligations. The Soviet Union is no exception.

Then the colanderisation theory: this "looks a bit more promising," says The Economist, "but this too needs examining closely." It goes on:

This is the idea that the "visible boundary between the two social worlds"—Mr. Gromyko's phrase for the dividing line across Europe—has had a number of pinprick-sized holes opened in it by the security conference, and that these holes can now be enlarged by patient prodding. Perhaps they can, but an inspection of the human-rights-and-freedom-of-movement part of the Helsinki declaration suggest that it will be very hard going.

It observes on the subject of the procedures for exit:

Does that mean that a Pole or Hungarian—to take the two most liberal countries in eastern Europe—can one day count on being able to go on holiday in the west, without having to leave his children behind, as routinely as a westerner planning a holiday in the east?

And it winds up:

Those are the hard questions, and the Helsinki declaration provides no answers. The only way in which the west can try to insist on a measurably greater amount of human freedom in eastern Europe is to draw up its own tests of what it thinks ought to be happening. In June, 1977, the 35 countries meeting this week—

This was written, of course, in August.

—are due to start planning a further meeting to examine what the spirit of Helsinki has achieved between now and then. The non-communist countries should go to that further meeting prepared to ask just what the communist countries have done in each category of the freedom-of-movement section of this week's declaration.

That whole freedom-of-movement section, of course, was supposed to be the quid pro quo for the acceptance of the inviolability of frontiers.

How many people have been allowed to marry westerners? How far have the exit regulations been liberalised, and how many extra people have been able to visit the west as a result? How many extra western newspapers have been allowed into eastern Europe?

It goes on to say that the Western powers "should also bring to the meeting their own check-list of what they think the answers ought to be, and compare the results." I think that is wise advice. I hope it will be heeded by the Government of Canada when its representatives go to the follow-up meeting in June 1977.

Up to the present, as far as I have been able to gather from what I have read in the newspapers and what I have heard otherwise, the implementation of the freedom-of-movement parts of this Helsinki Declaration has not been very impressive, to put it mildly. I am sometimes accused of using extreme terms. I hope in this case I shall not be thought guilty of that vice. It has not been impressive. I am afraid I am very doubtful indeed of how much further implementation there will be that would deserve the title of "impressive."

I have merely sketched certain things here, honourable senators, by way of indicating that I think we should be very careful not to assume that the Helsinki Declaration will mean in fact all that it appears to say. I think we should be very careful to keep a close watch on the results, or lack of results. I think we should be very careful to make sure that when our government goes to the follow-up meeting it is thoroughly briefed on this subject, and that it takes a stand which will make it at least easier to get from the communist countries in a second, or third, or fourth, or whatever it may be, round something rather more specific, something rather more practical, something rather more significant, than it secured when it signed the Helsinki Declaration.

I think probably that other honourable senators more thoroughly informed than I will comment on this subject further. Indeed, that is one reason, in fact, why I wanted to raise it—so that other senators, such as my honourable friend, Senator Yuzyk, might be able to contribute from their vast knowledge and experience the insights which they have on this subject. I hope that I may have at least opened the door to something of that sort, and that honourable senators—those who are present and possibly even some who are not present but who may read the Debates, and other people who may read the Debates; even, perhaps, some of our absent friends, the journalists—may take some notice of the kinds of warnings, doubts, hesitations and fears that I have expressed this afternoon.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I commend Senator Forsey for introducing this important topic for debate in the Senate. I do wish to speak on it and, therefore, I would like to adjourn this debate. However, I want to make it clear that I would first like to speak on Inquiry No. 1, the subject of which is the Twenty-first Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly. I am prepared to speak on that inquiry once Senator McDonald has introduced it, following which I am prepared to contribute to this debate.

For that reason, I am quite willing to yield to some other senator who may be interested in the meantime in continuing this debate, after having received due notice that I shall speak first on Inquiry No. 1.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 2, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 2, 1975

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE
OTTAWA

DECEMBER 2, 1975

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 2nd day of December at 8.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The sitting was resumed.
The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2).

An Act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment.

An Act to provide for the payment of superannuation benefits to Lieutenant Governors.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

● (2010)

THE SENATE

CHRISTMAS DECORATIONS

The Hon. the Speaker: All honourable senators must have noticed the super Christmas tree adorning the Senate entrance. Again this year we are expressing our gratitude to the Honourable Senator Jean-Pierre Côté for his generous gift, and to the Senate staff for the decoration of the tree.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we wish to thank most sincerely our colleague, Senator Jean-Pierre Côté, for this magnificent Christmas tree which will adorn the Senate entrance throughout the month of December.

We thank as well the Senate staff for helping with the decoration of the tree.

[English]

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

INVESTIGATIONS

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Desrousseaux: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to put on public record a Canadian Press report of November 28, 1975, respecting unjustified tactics used by a federal investigating agency. I will cite also related comments on what has been happening during these last few days in respect of investigations in Parliament.

The Supreme Court of Canada unanimously cleared Mr. W. W. Buchanan, who resigned as chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal in 1972, of any wrongdoing. The investigation, and the way it was carried out, destroyed him as chairman of that tribunal, and he therefore resigned. Allegations had been made that he helped make a decision for two companies with which he had done business in the past. I will refrain from any discussion of those involvements, but I will state that in discussing what had happened Chief Justice Laskin of the Supreme Court said that the federal investigation of Mr. Buchanan's records was a sordid and sloppy business. He said:

I resist the temptation to expatiate on the way in which the records were obtained from Buchanan... I say only unjustified tactics were used.

Chief Justice Laskin's criticism stems from the visit of the departmental examiner to Mr. Buchanan's office. I hope the Department of Justice and the Supreme Court of Canada will be requested to give their views on some of the procedures now in use, most recently in the Parliament of Canada, by departmental investigators. Normally investigations are made discreetly and, if warranted, accusations are made or indictments laid in the normal way, so that no innocent party is hurt. We have always prided ourselves that no one should be prejudged or made to appear guilty before a just trial is held. What happened appeared to some to be a trial by a kangaroo court—a political trial by the media.

More recently, we have seen, heard and read about investigations of certain persons, made in some cases in the presence of a whole retinue of press, radio and TV reporters, who somehow appeared to act as assistants to the investigators. Investigations have been conducted in such a way as to make the persons being investigated seem, in the minds of TV viewers and readers of newspapers, guilty of some wrongdoing. To some these investigations appeared to be political attacks, the goal being the destruction of certain personalities.

The procedures and methods used during parts of these inquiries were unorthodox. They incurred the displeasure of many. The investigations have been carried out in an unjust way, which has given the impression that a sort of kangaroo court is being set up, with the trial being staged by a biased press.

What is worse is the fact that the investigations were instigated by the very ones who should, at all times, stand above reproach, when it comes to law obedience and law enforcement. The only offence that the public saw was the manner in which our experienced investigators chose to do their work.

Considerable damage was done to those so investigated because the investigation was done by a federal police agency which had earned, and deserved, the respect of all law-abiding citizens of Canada, and on which we are accustomed to rely when it comes to fair play and justice. The objectionable scenario was given to the public in an investigation that should have been, at that moment, most discreet and fair. After all, none of the investigated had a dossier, and had not been charged, indicted or asked to appear before any court of law.

The investigations were made preparatory to recommendations as to whether or not someone should be indicted, and what charges should be laid. I did not think the way it was done was right or just, and it was with displeasure that I viewed the scenes on TV and the way they were presented.

To many who saw those scenes concerning these recent raids it appeared that the methods used, with the assistance of pressure press questioning and pressure publicity, were intended to destroy the reputation and the image of some of those visited before any charges or indictments were laid.

Who, in our federal police investigating agency, ordered these investigations conducted in such a way? Was it a political move, since it had deep political implications? Does the Department of Justice now intend to allow or support the use of such methods, and what is the department's policy on police searches with warrants within the Parliament Buildings? Why has the Department of Justice maintained silence?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I must rise on a point of order. I have not been able to detect any question of privilege in what the honourable senator has said up to now. It may be that he has a problem to deal with which would be suitable as a notice of inquiry or one which he could submit to the Senate, but it is—

● (2020)

Senator Desruisseaux: Indeed not.

Senator Flynn: Would you resume your seat while I am objecting. It seems to me that if he wishes to deal with a problem like the one he has raised, this is not the way to do so. Are we to engage in a discussion as to the subject matter he has raised? He has attacked the RCMP. He has attacked the Department of National Revenue. I might be in sympathy with him in certain respects, but I very much doubt that the Senate is involved, or that any member of the Senate is involved, in what Senator Desruisseaux is discussing now.

This is not a matter of privilege; but under the guise of rising on a question of privilege Senator Desruisseaux is bringing in these matters, and that is entirely contrary to our rules and to the orderly procedure of the Senate. I object vehemently.

Senator Desruisseaux: I am sorry, but I have to say that I disagree with you on those points.

Senator Flynn: I will ask Madam Speaker to rule on the matter since my honourable friend has no reply to my point of order.

Senator Argue: He is making his reply. You should hear him out.

Senator Flynn: I will hear what he says, but I am quite sure he will simply continue to read from his speech.

Senator Desruisseaux: I expected something of this sort.

Senator Flynn: Not from me.

Senator Desruisseaux: To be very frank, I would say to the Leader of the Opposition that I have only a few more words to conclude my remarks. If he is agreeable I will finish; if not, and if the Senate judges that I have gone beyond the bounds of decency in my remarks—

Senator Flynn: It is not a question of decency at all.

Senator Desruisseaux: —I will stand corrected, and I will sit down. Honourable senators, I am in your hands.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might say something on the point of order.

There is a certain validity in what the Leader of the Opposition has said, although I think it is quite possible Senator Desruisseaux has been laying the groundwork for a point he will be making. I am not certain that what has been said up to now on the general question does, in fact, affect the Senate or an individual senator in a particular way. All that aside, I cannot help seeing Senator Desruisseaux's notes in front of me, and I must say that since he has put on the record 99 per cent of his question of privilege, it would be tidier if he were allowed to conclude his remarks.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is a poor sort of answer.

Senator Asselin: Who decides these matters here—Her Honour the Speaker or Senator Argue?

Senator Argue: Surely I can rise on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. The question of privilege is not clearly apparent. Is the honourable senator asking a question of the government leader, or is he rising on a question of privilege? Unless the senator has leave to make a statement, perhaps he should resume his seat.

Senator Desruisseaux: I certainly have some questions to ask, but I did not wish to put them during the question period for the obvious reason that I am asking only for directions from the government.

Senator Flynn: That is a question, then. It should not be put at this time.

Senator Argue: Order. The Speaker is standing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable senator leave?

Senator Flynn: If he wants to conclude, yes.

Senator Desruisseaux: I am sorry if I am offending anyone.

Senator Flynn: You are not offending anyone. You are offending the rules.

Senator Desruisseaux: I cannot understand what you are saying. Would you repeat it, please?

Senator Flynn: I said that you are not offending anyone. You are offending the rules. If you make a speech and I cannot reply because you are not complying with the rules, I must object.

Senator Desruisseaux: I realize that I could be somewhat near the borderline, but I should like to say that when one of us rises on a question of privilege, he is usually allowed to finish his remarks. Perhaps I am to blame here in not seeing what is the right thing to do.

Senator Grosart: Go ahead and finish.

Senator Desruisseaux: I have only two or three sentences left. When I finish you will understand what this is all about.

Senator Flynn: You should have stated your point at the beginning.

Senator Desruisseaux: One usually does not do that.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead.

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

Senator Desruisseaux: It might not be a pleasant thing to say, but I honestly thought that when the Chief Justice of Canada made these remarks, they did connect with what was happening with regard to the investigations in the Senate. That was my only purpose in bringing up the matter. I am not looking for a fight here.

I thank honourable senators for allowing me to proceed, because I will be very brief.

Senator Asselin: It is about time.

Senator Molson: Go ahead.

Senator Desruisseaux: Why has the Department of Justice maintained silence? Is it their intention to investigate or indict people with the assistance of the press, radio and TV reporters? May we be informed whether the Department of Justice intends to redress the damages caused unjustly to innocent people by this kind of publicity, and the resulting insinuations in the media?

Could an answer to these questions, or some kind of statement, be considered by the Leader of the Government? The present official view of these matters would be helpful to the public, not only in my province, where all those involved reside, but everywhere else in Canada.

Thank you very much.

Senator Flynn: I think Senator Desruisseaux has proven my point. Is anyone on the government side prepared to reply to these questions? This is not a question of privilege concerning the Senate, quite obviously. I don't know if Senator Desruisseaux was referring to a certain incident which took place in the Senate. I don't think he was. I listened to him very carefully and I believe he was actually referring to something that happened on the other side of this building, which is of no concern to us. If, however, he was referring to something that happened here, there is a motion before this house to consider what privileges and immunities we possess and what practices should be followed in circumstances resembling those described by Senator Desruisseaux. It is quite obvious that this matter should not have been raised as a question of privilege.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Senator Flynn: You have permitted Senator Desruisseaux to speak, and to put questions. I am helping the government side in this instance. I want to point out—

Senator Argue: On a question of privilege—

Senator Flynn: No, not on a question of privilege. If you want to bring up a point of order, all right.

Senator Argue: On a point of order, then.

Senator Flynn: All right. I will listen to you, then.

Senator Argue: My question of privilege is this—

Senator Flynn: No—point of order.

Senator Argue: If you want to hear me on a point of order, all right. I will proceed in that way. I understand that the point of order raised on Senator Desruisseaux's question of privilege was settled.

Senator Flynn: It was not.

Senator Argue: I do not see how Senator Flynn can raise a second point of order on something that Madam Speaker ruled on, after which the Senate, by leave—

Senator Smith (Colchester): Not by leave.

Senator Argue: —allowed Senator Desruisseaux to conclude his statement.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Argue: That is the way it happened. Now Senator Flynn is on a double point of order, and I think that is out of order.

Senator Flynn: If I may speak on Senator Argue's point of order, he said that the Chair had ruled. The Chair did not rule. The Chair decided to permit Senator Desruisseaux to conclude his remarks, which he did; but the Chair has not decided whether he had a valid question of privilege. Since the matter has been raised, and improperly, I think I was right in speaking to it just to point out how this matter was raised under the guise of a question of privilege when in fact it was not. Now, if nobody will allow me to reply to the question put by Senator Desruisseaux, I do not mind. I was simply trying to help the government side stand on its feet in this matter, but if the government side does not want my help, then you know what you can do.

● (2030)

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I am making a note of what was said by Senator Desruisseaux and by the honourable Leader of the Opposition, and in the absence of my leader I will simply say that I shall see that it is brought to his attention at the earliest possible moment.

Senator Flynn: As an inquiry or as a question of privilege?

Senator Petten: We will debate that later, senator.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse) had been substituted for that of Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Petten tabled:

Copies of Ordinances passed by the Council of the Yukon Territory at its 1974 Second Session, pursuant to section 20(1) of the Yukon Act, Chapter Y-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (Part II, Labour Unions) for the fiscal periods ended in 1973, pursuant to section 18(1) of the said Act, Chapter C-31, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Textile and Clothing Board, dated July 8, 1975, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 19 of the Textile and Clothing Board Act, Chapter 39, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72, respecting broadwoven filament rayon fabrics.

Report of the National Film Board of Canada, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 20(2) of the National Film Act, Chapter N-7, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE), done at Helsinki, August 1, 1975, together with a statement thereon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Côtteau, on behalf of Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the sixth report of the committee as follows:

Tuesday, December 2, 1975.

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Sixth Report as follows:

In relation to its Orders of Reference dated Thursday, December 19, 1974: namely, "Guidelines for Motions for the Production of Papers" and "the subject-matter of Bill C-225, An Act respecting the right of the public to information concerning the public business";

Your Committee recommends that Members of the Committee, accompanied by the necessary supporting staff, be authorized to travel outside of Canada, namely, to Washington, D.C., U.S.A.

Respectfully submitted,

Eugene A. Forsey,
Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Côtteau, for Senator Forsey, moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION

AIR CANADA—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, may I register a complaint at this time.

Senator Flynn: Is it a question of privilege?

Senator Norrie: I do not know; you tell me. I do not intend to get into an argument. It concerns the transportation services of Air Canada.

On flight 616 on November 28, en route from Ottawa at 10.35 a.m., arriving at Halifax at 1 p.m., we were not served a dinner until we complained, which was after 12.30 p.m. Upon inquiry, the stewardesses told us that the dinners were put on the plane cold, and could not be heated in time for us to be served. They served us no coffee. One passenger, who is diabetic, needed his food desperately and was given orange juice. First-class passengers had hot dinners and coffee. After a while—perhaps 15 minutes—we were served a cool to luke-warm dinner, which was better than nothing. Until we complained no announcement was made with respect to the cold dinners, et cetera. The stewardesses blamed the personnel in the restaurant where the meals were prepared, or stored, in Ottawa. Sometimes as many as 20 meals for the passengers might be missing. Both Ottawa and Halifax are guilty in this respect.

On flight 627, on December 1, leaving Halifax at 8.30 p.m., Senator Inman and I had asked for pre-boarding and a wheelchair. Our assigned seats on the boarding passes were not suitable. I therefore returned to the counter to have them altered, where the officer in charge said that that did not matter, "Take any seat available." When pre-boarding was called, Senator Inman was taken to the door and told to wait until all had boarded, and then she would be taken on. I was told to go on at once. It is well that I did, because I found two empty seats in front and reserved them for us. Finally, Senator Inman was escorted on board. The young gentleman official at the door entertained her with ignorant, insulting comments about the Senate and senators. These gentlemen who work at government terminals should be made to keep their opinions to themselves, and told to express their feelings only at election times, when they can vote according to their choice.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENTS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to give a brief explanation of these simple but substantial amendments to Bill S-10, as passed by the Senate on March 6, 1975. The first amendment, which is to clause 1, on page 1 of the bill, is to strike out lines 20 and 21 and substitute the following:

● (2040)

(c) for the purpose of preventing or correcting nutritional disorders of livestock;

This is a simple amendment, reverting to the original wording in the act. It merely modifies the wording without changing the meaning.

The second amendment is to clause 3:

Page 3, line 6. Strike out line 6 and substitute the following therefor: "10.(1) Every person who"

The amendment has the effect of striking out the adjective "natural" before the word "person," for the simple reason that under the Interpretation Act, a "person" includes both a physical or natural person and a legal person. Therefore there is no need to have the adjective "natural" before the word "person."

[Senator Norrie.]

The second amendment to the same clause strikes out lines 18 to 30 on page 3. The amendment strikes out subsections (1.1) and (1.2) which read as follows:

(1.1) Every corporation that contravenes any provision of this Act or the Regulations is guilty of an indictable offence.

(1.2) Where a corporation has been convicted of an offence under this Act, the chief executive officer of the corporation shall be presumed—

I underline the word "presumed".

—to be guilty of an offence under subsection 10(1) unless he establishes that the offence was committed without his knowledge or consent and that he exercised all due diligence to prevent its commission.

The amendment is consequential in part on the second amendment to which I referred earlier, when the adjective "natural" before the word "person," was struck out. It is not considered necessary to have a special disposition concerning corporations, because "person," as I explained, covers both physical and legal persons.

The second amendment is to strike out subsection (1.2) and substitute therefor the new subsection which reads:

(1.1) Where a corporation commits an offence under this Act or the Regulations, any director or officer of the corporation who authorizes or acquiesces in the offence or fails to exercise due diligence to prevent its commission is guilty of an offence and liable to the punishment provided for in subsection (1).

This amendment is more substantial in that it corrects what to my mind was a contravention of both the Canadian Bill of Rights and the long-established principle of justice that no one is presumed guilty until and unless so proven.

There was a presumption in the wording, as amended by the Senate, that an officer of a corporation contravening the act would be presumed guilty unless he proved or established that the offence was committed without his authorization or that he exercised due diligence to prevent its commission. It is a substantial and important amendment which had to be made to correct the faulty wording of the amendment passed by the Senate.

Honourable senators, for those reasons I commend the adoption of the amendments.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak at this time, I shall speak for a few moments and then move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Greene was very active in our Agriculture Committee in promoting the initial amendments that went to the other place. I have some comments to make on what was done in the other place, but I think it would be better if I merely adjourned the debate for now.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

KING GEORGE V CANCER FUND WINDING-UP BILL SECOND READING

Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau moved the second reading of Bill C-76, to wind up The King George V Silver Jubilee

Cancer Fund for Canada and to authorize the sale of the assets and securities of the fund and to transfer the sale proceeds and the balance of moneys to the National Cancer Institute of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it is indeed an honour and a privilege for me to move second reading of this bill. It is the first time that I have taken part in a debate in this chamber on a public bill, and I am delighted to be able to do so in connection with this one.

Although the main purpose of the bill is to terminate the fund, it is, as I see it, an end brought about by the beginnings of others in the field of cancer research in this country, with the result that it has been largely supplanted in its original fund raising role, especially in its initial years after 1935. It must be a rare moment in the history of this country—indeed, it is an historic moment in the history of cancer research in this country—that this fund should now be wound up by an act of Parliament. In the light of the history of the fund, that is most appropriate.

How often, honourable senators, have we in this chamber had occasion to feel the presence, at the same time, of such distinguished Canadians as the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, the Chief Justice of Canada; the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Prime Minister; the Honourable Robert L. Stanfield, Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the other place; and the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of National Health and Welfare. I assume there is no rule of this chamber that would prevent those last three mentioned honourable gentlemen in particular from making their presence felt here today, albeit by mention in a bill which has come to us from the other place. They are, of course, acting in their personal capacities as trustees of this fund.

Honourable senators, Parliament has been asked by a number of truly great Canadians who are presently the trustees of the fund—namely, the four honourable gentlemen just mentioned, and Dr. W. A. MacLean, Chairman of the Canadian Medical Association Committee on Cancer; the late Dr. J. J. Lussier, a representative of the French Canadian Medical College; and J. W. Westaway, Esquire, Chairman of the Committee on Medical Scholarships of the Canadian Life Insurance Association—to enact appropriate legislation for the purpose of winding up the King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund for Canada.

Bill C-76 would authorize the trustees to sell, under the supervision of the Deputy Minister of Finance, as honorary treasurer of the fund, the remaining assets of the fund, and payment of all such assets to the National Cancer Institute of Canada. There is a provision for termination of the trust after those assets have been paid over to the National Cancer Institute of Canada, and a provision that releases and discharges the trustees from their obligation under the trust deed.

● (2050)

I must say, I find it most appropriate that there be a preamble to Bill C-76 which briefly outlines the history of the fund. You will note from the preamble that His late Majesty King George V consented to the inauguration of the fund to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his accession to the throne. It is said that his consent was in response to a request from His Excellency the then Governor General of Canada, Lord Bessborough. In actual fact, the fund was the inspiration of the Countess of Bessborough, the wife of the Governor General, although no doubt the Governor General made the official request to King George V.

Honourable senators, there is already on record in House of Commons Debates some interesting facts relating to this fund, and I refer to page 9484, November 26, 1975.

This fund had auspicious beginnings after 1934 when a public campaign for funds was launched. By December 31, 1938, $463,533.22 had been contributed to the fund. Over the years since that date, grants have been made for the purpose of stimulating cancer research in this country. There were annual grants of $14,000 to the Canadian Medical Association for the purposes of the trust.

After 1940, because of wartime circumstances, it was agreed between the trustees and the association that one-half of the annual grant would be paid by the association to the Canadian Society for the Control of Cancer, the name of which was changed in 1946 to that of the Canadian Cancer Society.

In 1946 the National Cancer Institute of Canada was incorporated as the coordinating agency in connection with cancer research, being representative of universities, agencies and organizations which are concerned with cancer research.

At their fifth meeting in February 1947, the trustees decided to make available to the newly formed National Cancer Institute financial assistance in the amount of $450,000 in three annual instalments of $150,000 each. Apart from the $450,000, it was intended that the national needs of the institute would thereafter be met through moneys raised by the Canadian Cancer Society.

It is a matter of record that after 1937, The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund for Canada was largely supplanted in its fund-gathering role by the Canadian Cancer Society. The Chief Justice of Canada at the time, the late Sir Lyman Duff, as chairman of the trustees, was of the view that his position as Chief Justice of Canada made it impossible for him to continue to be associated with the fund if it continued to be associated with the collection of additional moneys.

There were one or two small bequests to the fund after 1937, and in 1951 our present Queen, the then Princess Elizabeth, donated the sum of $7,000 to the fund. Apart from those amounts received, the main activity of the fund over the years since 1937 has been to make contributions to the National Cancer Institute of Canada.

Clause 10 of the trust deed reads as follows:

Until such time as the Trustees are satisfied that the mortality from cancer in Canada has been sufficiently reduced they shall always keep in their hands some residue of the trust moneys, so that the Fund may be kept alive and the work of the Trustees continued. If at any time the Trustees are satisfied that the mortality from cancer in Canada has been sufficiently reduced, the residue of the Trust Fund then in their hands shall be transferred by them to some other charitable trust, the purposes of which are as nearly similar as may be to the purposes of the trust hereby created.

Because of that clause, the late W. L. Mackenzie King, when Prime Minister of Canada, is reported as believing, in the immediate postwar years, that the fund should be kept in being in case of some special need arising and should not be wound up. Following the seventh meeting of the trustees in 1949, no meeting was held until March 13, 1964. In the intervening years, or at least until 1960, very little happened in respect of the fund.

By December 31, 1958, the fund had on deposit a balance of $92,540.57, and some concern was being expressed by the honorary officials that the trustees had not met since 1949. In 1960, the then Deputy Minister of Finance, as honorary treasurer of the Board of Trustees, expressed the view that he "would like to see the Fund wound up," but considered this inappropriate because of clause 10 of the trust deed which I have just read.

In respect of this, and clause 10 of the trust deed, the then Deputy Attorney General, as honorary solicitor to the Board of Trustees, in September 1960, expressed the following view:

It is within the powers of the Trustees to make the decision as to whether cancer mortality has been sufficiently reduced but their decision must, in my view, be on that question in order to conform with the Trust Deed. Clause 10 does not, for example, contemplate a power to wind-up the Fund on the ground that other competent agencies are active in this field. The word "sufficiently" is somewhat vague but would, I believe, relate to the need for assistance viewed in the light of the size of the cancer mortality rate.

The then Deputy Minister of Justice went on to say:

It is always possible to consider the enactment of appropriate legislation for the wind-up of the Fund.

I am told that the book value of the assets of the fund at this time stands at approximately $62,000. It is to be noted that the bill requires the honorary treasurer, the Deputy Minister of Finance, to submit a report on the sale of the securities and assets of the fund to the trustees, and requires the Prime Minister to cause that report to be laid before Parliament within 15 days after the receipt thereof by the trustees or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first 15 days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting. Therefore, honourable senators, full particulars of the remaining assets of the trust and their disposition to the National Cancer Institute of Canada will be made available to us in this chamber as well as to the members of the other place.

It is obvious that the purchasing power of the fund in terms of aiding the cause of cancer research in this country has been significantly reduced over the years. It is a fact that in the decade from 1964 to 1974, there has been a need for the fund to liquidate capital assets from time to time in order to make its annual payment of $10,000 to the National Cancer Institute. Therefore, when the trustees met in March of this year it was their unanimous view that the time had come to wind up the fund, and pay over the assets to the National Cancer Institute of Canada. Accordingly, the request was made to Parliament to enact the necessary legislation to enable the trustees to do so.

[Senator Côtteau]

● (2100)

Honourable senators, I feel my remarks have been rather lengthy, but I thought it would be of some interest to you if I outlined some further historical particulars of the fund. A lot of good work has been done through the fund over the years, not just by the notable Canadians who are its trustees, but also by many other Canadians engaged in the field of cancer research in this country. Lady Bessborough's inspiration and her fond hope that mortality from cancer in this country and throughout the world would one day be sufficiently reduced has not yet been achieved in this year of Our Lord, 1975. One day, honourable senators, it will be.

This concludes my remarks on second reading of Bill C-76. Personally, I do not see a necessity of referring this bill to committee. However, if it is the wish of the house, and if the bill receives second reading, I shall be ready to move that it be placed in the hands of a committee for further study.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I should like to commend Senator Côtteau for his clear explanation of this piece of legislation and the operation of the The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund.

Bill C-76, entitled "The King George V Cancer Fund Winding Up Act," was passed unanimously in the other chamber after a 20-minute debate in committee of the whole house. All parties endorsed the principle of the bill and the bill itself, which I feel sure will be the attitude in this chamber.

This is not a controversial measure. The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund was launched in 1934 during the depression years to raise funds on a national scale to promote cancer research, most of the money, about $500,000, going to the Canadian Medical Association. It was at that time a successful effort, contributing substantially to progress in research and in combatting this killing disease.

However, there arose internal and legal complications that made the fund inoperative and inactive. The establishment of the Canadian Cancer Society as a public charitable organization, which from 1946 financed the National Cancer Institute of Canada, concerned with cancer research, proved to be a much better arrangement to expand work in this vital field. Consequently, it was decided—and I consider wisely—to wind up the original fund and transfer the residue of, I believe, $62,000 to the National Cancer Institute. As has already been explained, this required the approval of Parliament by means of the bill now before us.

The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund has indeed performed a most useful service, which I am sure is greatly appreciated by all Canadians. It is recognized as the pioneer and the precursor of the larger and more successful activities which are apparent today. We pay tribute, therefore, to the Countess of Bessborough, the wife of the distinguished Governor General at that time, Sir Lyman Duff, Chief Justice of Canada and first chairman of the trustees, and to all the trustees and supporters of the fund. A tribute also goes to the medical officers and researchers who promoted the necessary research and education, as well as to the Canadians who volunteered their services and gave financial support to this worthy cause.

This debate also affords an opportunity for this chamber to express gratitude to the members of the Canadian Cancer Society and the National Cancer Institute of Canada, as well as to all men and women across Canada who have volunteered their services and work in the struggle to bring under control, and eventually to eradicate, this disease that has caused untold sickness, misery and death to so many Canadians and sorrow to many families and close friends.

Honourable senators, this bill deserves speedy passage. It has the wholehearted support of the Opposition. I see no need to refer the bill to committee.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable sponsor a question? In what form of security are the assets held at the present time?

Senator Cottreau: I am told the securities are in the form of investments and cash on hand.

Senator Buckwold: The reason for my question is that I should like to know, because of the depressed prices of securities, such as bonds and stocks—if that is what the fund is invested in—whether the net proceeds may be much less than they possibly could be at some later time. I am wondering whether any consideration has been given to transferring the investments to the National Cancer Institute, if that would in due course provide more funds. I pass this on as something that might be considered, although it may be too late.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Cottreau moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 5, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Greene calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of permitting complete television and radio coverage of the proceedings of the Senate and of the public proceedings of all Senate committees.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, on November 5 Senator Greene rose pursuant to notice that he would call the attention of the Senate to this matter. I support his purpose and the substance of his remarks. He said he wanted the Senate to have greater exposure so as to impress its relevance upon the Canadian people. I am reminded of the TV advertisement of the Ford Motor Company: "The closer you look, the better we look." I am hoping that that will be the net result.

● (2110)

Senator Asselin: Not necessarily.

Senator Grosart: Not tonight.

Senator Croll: You are quite right.

In his interesting speech, Senator Greene said that if the public saw more of us they would have a greater appreciation of our talents and capacity, and of the quality of our contribution to the political life of the country.

In May 1972 the House of Commons adopted the following resolution:

That the question of radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its committees, including the legal, procedural and technical aspects thereof, and the evidence collected by the committee during the past session in relation to these matters, be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

I have had copies of the report of that committee distributed. It is one of the better reports that have been written on this subject. You will note that it was presented in 1972. Nothing quite as good has come out of the House of Commons or the Senate. As a matter of fact, this report is considered a textbook by people who are concerned with this matter.

Honourable senators, let me indicate what is contained in the report. The committee starts out by dealing with the pros and cons. They give reasoned arguments, going through the subject most thoroughly for some 15 or more paragraphs. They detail all the arguments that could possibly be thought of, and then they go into something that we know very little about, namely, the broadcasting of parliamentary proceedings in other jurisdictions—what is happening in the United States, New Zealand, Britain, Australia, Austria, West Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland and Holland, and also in Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and Alberta.

You will be surprised to know that in the British Parliament, the House of Lords voted in favour of broadcasting, and the House of Commons voted against it. So, they are thinking about it.

In this report you will read of the experiences that these other jurisdictions have had. It is vital for us to understand what the problems are. The technical aspects in themselves are a great concern.

One paragraph discusses whether the televising should be done in colour, or in black and white. It is pointed out that colour television demands bright lights which generate a great amount of heat. The facilities for it are very expensive.

Senator Langlois: Red and blue would be better.

Senator Asselin: We would prefer blue.

Senator Croll: Of course, the big question is who is going to control it. Will it be controlled by the Speaker? Will it be controlled by the house? Will it be controlled by a committee of the house, or a committee of the Senate? These are all matters that need to be studied and considered.

Senator Rowe: Would the honourable senator permit a question? I am not sure what he means by "control." Would he elaborate a little on that?

Senator Croll: Yes, when I speak of "control" I am talking about—

Senator Choquette: "Control," in the event that we accept it. It has been a flop so far. We tried it once in relation to the committee proceedings on the marihuana legislation, and it was a flop.

Senator Langlois: Too much smoke.

Senator Croll: The matter of "control" embraces who will be responsible for the organization; who will be responsible for what is broadcast.

Senator Choquette: If and when.

Senator Croll: The question raised in the report, if you decide to proceed with it, is as to who will be responsible—will it be the television people who can pick up whatever they like and send it out, or will someone be appointed by the Senate to decide what should, or what should not, be broadcast?

Senator Molson: A good question.

Senator Croll: Or will bits and pieces be chosen, which may result in a distortion of the whole aspect of the proceedings? But that is a matter for discussion.

Senator Choquette: Who will jump in front of the cameras?

Senator Asselin: Do you mean that a committee of the house or a committee of the Senate might control the television broadcasting?

Senator Croll: What I very clearly said was that perhaps the first method would be direct control by the Speaker. The second method would be control by a committee specifically nominated for the purpose. This is what the House of Commons committee suggested.

Senator Grosart: To keep the cameras off the empty seats.

Senator Walker: It would be a great show tonight.

Senator Barrow: May I ask the honourable senator whether he considers "broadcasting" to cover both radio and television?

Senator Croll: I said radio and television. These matters are discussed in the report.

Then the aspects of law and privilege are dealt with. A member is protected by absolute privilege in respect of anything he says in Parliament, and you would have thought that this protection would be extended to anything said in Parliament and simultaneously broadcast by radio or television. But that is not quite so. They had to pass special acts in Australia and Saskatchewan to cover broadcasting. The Law Clerk of the Senate questions whether privilege extends fully in broadcasting speeches made in the House of Commons or in the Senate. The question has already been studied in England and is still under consideration there.

Honourable senators, this is a very good report. It can be used for reference purposes and it will enable you to answer questions asked about the subject by constituents and other interested people. It was not my intention to go into the details of the report but to point out that it suggests that the House of Commons not proceed without consulting the Senate, and that it invite the Senate to cooperate with them in a joint undertaking in whatever they decide to do.

● (2120)

With that in mind I spoke to Senator Greene, suggesting that it is premature to proceed at this time. Moreover, there was a recent outline for the House of Commons reform presented by the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons in which he pointed out that in 1947 the government announced in the Speech from the Throne that the House of Commons would investigate the possibility of having permanent radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings. Well, I asked them over there what they intend to do now, and they say that they are not ready to go ahead with anything at the present time.

As I said, in the circumstances I spoke with Senator Greene and he agrees that for the time being the matter ought to be dropped. Unless someone else wishes to speak on it, the matter ought to be dropped for now. We can come back to it some time in the future when the House of Commons is ready to proceed. I have no idea when that might be, but that is what I suggest we do now.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 3, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Postmaster General respecting Olympic coins for the period ended September 30, 1975, pursuant to sections 13(2) and 13(3) of the Olympic (1976) Act, Chapter 31, Statutes of Canada, 1973-74.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, Wednesday, December 3, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

KING JUAN CARLOS I OF SPAIN

ATTENDANCE OF SENATOR PERRAULT AT CORONATION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to welcome the Leader of the Government back to the house, and in doing so I would ask him whether he had a good trip to Spain.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the interest and concern in my visit to Spain demonstrated by the Leader of the Opposition. I have just returned from a most interesting and enjoyable brief official visit to Spain on the occasion of the coronation of King Juan Carlos I. It was a great pleasure for me to extend to His Majesty, to Her Majesty the Queen, and to members of the Spanish government, the very best wishes from all members of this chamber, all parties represented here—

Senator Flynn: And the government, of course.

Senator Perrault: —and, of course, the government—as Spain enters an interesting, important and perhaps even critical new phase in its history.

Regardless of events that may have occurred in the past in that country, it seems to me that this is a time for constructive initiatives on both sides. It appears to me that there may be countless new opportunities with the new government about to assume responsibility for the affairs of that nation. For example, an important trade show of Canadian consumer goods is now under way in a number of Spanish department stores. I am glad to report to the house that it is an outstanding success. I was gratified to be able to visit that fair and to witness literally line-ups of Spanish citizens purchasing Canadian goods of all kinds, ranging from Pacific Coast canned salmon to lobster and crab packed at the other end of our nation—

Senator Flynn: That was at the bottom of the list, I suppose.

Senator Perrault: There were many other canned goods, housewares, including barbecue sets manufactured in Canada, as well as coats, shoes, and garments of all descriptions. I would like to mention as well that at the trade display the Spaniards appeared to be purchasing significant quantities of Canadian wine.

● (1410)

Senator Flynn: Oh, la, la. I can hardly believe that.

Senator Perrault: I assure the house that I saw this with my own eyes. The test, of course, will be if they—

Senator Walker: Survive.

Senator Perrault: —purchase additional quantities in the months to come.

Senator Flynn: Did you try it yourself?

Senator Perrault: At least we have encouraged them to taste test our improving Canadian wines, and that is quite important.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps they will be sending it back to us.

Senator Perrault: I was informed by Spanish government officials that they would like to expand their trade with Canada in several directions. I understand that Spain will purchase some $180 million worth of Canadian goods this year—a significant increase over last year. As well as consumer goods, they seem to be interested in basic products such as pulp and paper and cellulose goods. In addition to Canadian technical know-how, I am encouraged that there appears to be a substantial opportunity for Canadian-Spanish trade in many goods and services—and, of course, trade must be a “two-way street.”

I believe, as I said earlier, that there are many opportunities at this important point in the history of the Spanish nation for new and constructive initiatives on the part of Canada and other nations.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENTS—QUESTION AND ANSWER

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, as one method of welcoming the government leader back to the Senate, I should like to pose a question and ask him to take it as notice for his consideration and that of the government. As the leader knows, the Commons amended Bill S-10 as it was passed by the Senate, and I wish now to refer to only one of those amendments.

The new section 10(1.1), as passed by the Senate, reads as follows:

Every corporation that contravenes any provision of this Act or the Regulations is guilty of an indictable offence.

As I understand it, if that provision became law, a judge finding a corporation guilty of an indictable offence would be able to set the fine at his discretion; in other words, the amount of the fine would be at the discretion of the court.

The thinking of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and, I take it, of the Senate itself, was that if a large company made a profit of, say, $1 million from some wrongdoing, that to impose a maximum fine of $2,000 would be somewhat ridiculous. It was felt that the judge should have authority to set a fine commensurate with the misdemeanour.

When the bill came back from the House of Commons, this particular clause was deleted and the bill was amended to read:

10.(1) Every person—

Which is defined to mean both individuals and corporations, so that it could also read "every corporation". Thus, every corporation that contravenes any provision of this act or the regulations is guilty of an offence and is liable on conviction upon indictment to a fine not exceeding $2,000.

I suggest that that is a bad amendment by the Commons, and I would like the Leader of the Government to consider its ramifications and see whether something can be done about it.

Senator Flynn: Is this a question of privilege?

Senator Argue: I would like to conclude, if I may. I am trying to lay the groundwork for something which the Leader of the Government, as a representative of the government, may want to consider.

Senator Flynn: You are trying hard.

Senator Argue: The Commons, by this suggested amendment, removed corporations from section 647 of the Criminal Code, which reads, in part:

... a corporation that is convicted of an offence is liable ...

(a) to be fined in an amount that is in the discretion of the court, where the offence is an indictable offence—

I would ask the government leader if he feels that the stand taken by the Senate, which was that a corporation found guilty of a major offence should have to pay a fine commensurate with that offence, is the right one. If he agrees, I would hope that he would help expedite a change along these lines both here and in the other place.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Argue has brought to the attention of the Senate some of his concerns respecting Bill S-10. He has asked the house to consider the merits of the remarks which he has made.

May I remind the honourable senator that he has adjourned the debate on the motion for concurrence in the

[Senator Argue.]

Commons amendments to Bill S-10. Perhaps it would be more in order for him to expand on his remarks when that debate is resumed, and at that time invite the views of other honourable senators. We can then consider the matter in detail.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I thought last night after I rose on the question of privilege raised by Senator Desruisseaux that Senator Argue would have understood the difference between a question of privilege and a matter for debate at the proper time. Apparently he has not yet learned.

Senator Argue: Well, I think my question was in order; in fact, I think it was perfectly in order. However, the Leader of the Government made a suggestion and I would like to reply to it, if I may.

Senator Flynn: In due course.

Senator Argue: The leader suggested that perhaps the best place to raise this point was during the adjourned debate and I just want to inform the house that I am not prepared to do that today.

Senator Flynn: Then adjourn it in due course.

Senator Argue: There is also a rule which says that a senator who has the floor may not be interrupted, and Senator Flynn interrupts more often than any other senator.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, I should also say that a senator who is out of order should know enough to resume his seat.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand the concern felt by Senator Argue about this matter, but I must concur with the view expressed by the Leader of the Opposition that there is a time and place for observations of the kind proposed by Senator Argue. In view of the fact that he moved the adjournment of the debate on Bill S-10, and will be given a full opportunity to express his views at a later time, I think at this time we should take his observations as notice of his intention to expand on them later.

Senator Argue: You took the words out of my mouth. I shall do so.

Senator Walker: That is as quick a switch as when you turned from NDP to Liberal.

KING GEORGE V CANCER FUND WINDING-UP BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Côtteau moved the third reading of Bill C-76, to wind up The King George V Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund for Canada and to authorize the sale of the assets and securities of the Fund and to transfer the sale proceeds and the balance of moneys to the National Cancer Institute of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENTS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hayden, for concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to the Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Feeds Act".—(Honourable Senator Argue).

Senator Argue: Stand.

Senator Flynn: You have already made your speech.

Senator Argue: You told me to make it in due course and now you are changing your position. You are on both sides of the question.

Order Stands.

● (1420)

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I should make a brief explanation.

As honourable senators are aware, the committee has under consideration by reference from an order of the other place the question of the guidelines in relation to the production of papers and the question of the secrecy of government information. In connection with this investigation we have already heard a considerable number of witnesses and the committee felt it was desirable to have information, as nearly as possible first-hand information, on the practice in other countries where that practice differs substantially from the practice in this country.

Two members of the committee, without expense to the committee I may add, visited Sweden in the course of the summer and procured a large amount of valuable information for us. In regard to Australia, we did our job of investigation there also very cheaply by means of Her Majesty's mails, and we have the results of that before us now in the form of documents kindly provided by the Australian government. In regard to the United States, it was felt desirable that members of the committee should go down to Washington for a couple of days to investigate the situation first-hand.

It is also hoped there to meet Mr. Ralph Nader and get information from him on how he feels their system is working down there. I should say in parenthesis that there is no intention of inviting Mr. Nader to offer any comments on the way we do things here, but simply to get information from him on the way they do things down there.

I believe the proposal is that nine members of the committee should make the trip. I am not anxious to make it myself, I may add, but the committee feels that it is essential that both chairmen should go. So I shall be an unwilling, a reluctant traveller next week.

The proposal is that we should go down on Tuesday morning and come back Thursday evening.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE SENATE

TELEVISION AND RADIO COVERAGE OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Greene calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of permitting complete television and radio coverage of the proceedings of the Senate and of the public proceedings of all Senate committees.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I do not intend to give the views of the official Opposition on this motion, since we never met to consider thoroughly its merits. However, last night I heard my good friend Senator Croll state his opinion on the matter. I told myself that it belonged to Senator Croll to make such an intervention owing to the fact he dislikes the lack of communication from time to time with the written and spoken press.

Incidentally and seriously, we know that Senator Croll does not need to have the Senate proceedings televised to appear as a very popular senator with the media, because we know that he always has a broad smile and that he is outspoken. We can say, I think, that he is the star of the Senate with the written press and on television when the time comes to make his point; if he does not succeed in the Senate, he does it through the media.

Now I was not surprised when I heard Senator Croll explaining the advantages of televising Senate proceedings. I was nonetheless comforted to hear him say at the end that he had advised Senator Greene the motion was a little premature and ought to be dropped. It is certainly possible that Senator Croll had already foreseen that he would not obtain the unanimous consent of senators for the adoption of that motion. Nevertheless, I think a very serious problem has been facing Parliament for many years. I remember that during the twelve years I was in the House of Commons, the subject kept coming up every session, namely: what would be the advantages or disadvantages of direct radio or television coverage of parliamentary proceedings?

Last night, Senator Croll referred to a House of Commons study on the subject. Of course, the study is not new; a similar one had been done in 1947. When I was in the House, an unofficial committee also considered the matter, but the various parties represented in the House never did achieve consensus.

Not that we were against the idea in principle that parliamentary proceedings should be televised and directly reported, but we never could find a formula which could be acceptable both to the people responsible for this television or radio-broadcasting and to members of Parliament.

Of course, the problem was more acute. It was emphasized when the time came to decide whether we should accept this means of communication with the public, especially in connection with the people who are sitting in the other place, because they are elected. A single speech made in the House of Commons by an honourable member, and aired as heard by the broadcasters, that is to say, in part only, could mean, after a few minutes, an end to the career of a member sitting in the other place. There are other shortcomings with which I could deal at length and which demonstrate that, from a practical point of view, broadcasting is impossible.

● (1430)

Is this possible here in the Senate? I will give you my own point of view, since I feel that the best way to get the Senate abolished is to permit television and radio coverage of our proceedings.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Asselin: I think that Senator Croll, when he told us last night that this debate was premature, had certainly anticipated the people's reaction if we were to let the proceedings of the Senate be covered by television. It is not that our proceedings lack seriousness; that is not the point. The point is that Canadians, in general, do not understand the role of the Senate. They do not understand the importance of our proceedings. Have not the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the official Opposition drawn many times the attention of the press on the important work done during our sittings? What I say is fully justified since, at the end of every session, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has to hold a press conference to acquaint the journalists and the Canadian people generally with what the Senate did during the session. I say that at the present time the Canadian people do not understand, or do not want to understand, the important and efficient role of our institution in our parliamentary system.

To my mind, the time has come—and several senators have been repeating it for many a year—the time has come to set up a committee of the Senate to give it a new vocation, not that its present role is not useful. Naturally, there has been some emancipation throughout the years. The Senate was set up by a Constitution now grown old and old-fashioned. The Senate could surely play additional roles which would bring it closer to the Canadian people who would then understand better its duties and responsibilities.

If Senator Greene had that in mind when he introduced his motion, it might be a beginning, and give us the opportunity of reflecting on whether a reform of our institution might not be timely—not a partial reform such as the one recently suggested but an in-depth reform through which the Canadian people might become more interested in our work.

Yesterday Senator Croll said there should be a control board. I asked Senator Croll whether, in his mind, that control board would be composed either of members of the other place or of members of the Senate. I shall immediately say, and I take as witness Senator Goldenberg, that when the Senate authorized the broadcasting of the proceedings of the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the problem of drugs, if I am not mistaken the chairman of the committee could not do what he wanted, because the press and the television were already authorized to broadcast our hearings. We were even accused of hiding certain proceedings at that time, because the chairman of the committee wanted to hold a meeting in camera to examine some problems, and the press and the radio and television criticized us.

[Senator Asselin.]

Moreover, if we imposed a control board, they would say immediately that parliamentarians are again restricting the freedom of the press.

On the other hand, we cannot accept this means of communication of our proceedings without making a selection. We cannot allow radio and television people to select themselves and broadcast any proceedings. A selection should be made and to do this, we should establish a joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons including representatives of television with whom we could set up the conditions for broadcasting our proceedings.

As Senator Croll said, I think that this motion, although important in principle, is premature. Of course, the Canadian people have the right to know what is going on in Parliament. They are entitled to know entirely, not just partially. As I have just said, we cannot select only one aspect of our work and say: "This is what we are going to tell the Canadian people." This would be too dangerous a practice for the survival of this institution.

I believe Senator Croll—and for once I give him credit—was wise in saying that this motion is premature. I go along with this view. However, this does not mean we cannot set up a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider this matter, because, some day, whether we want it or not, we shall be faced with a situation which we shall have to accept or clearly reject. Therefore, I agree with Senator Croll that the motion is too early but I urge the government leader to consider the matter of setting up a joint committee of the two houses, which may find a practical way to inform the Canadian people better about our work.

On motion of Senator Robichaud, debate adjourned.

[English]

● (1440)

THE HONOURABLE F. ELSIE INMAN

FELICITATIONS ON BIRTHDAY

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, with the consent of the Senate I should like to make a statement.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Asselin: Unless you want to revert to motions, or something like that.

Senator Norrie: No.

Senator Flynn: What is going on?

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator wishes to make a statement.

Senator Choquette: A statement on what? What is the purpose?

Senator Norrie: If you wait a minute, I will tell you.

Senator Choquette: You must have consent first.

Senator Flynn: We should know what the statement is about.

Senator Norrie: It is a birthday greeting.

Senator Flynn: Very well.

Senator Norrie: I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that our revered Senator Elsie Inman will be celebrating a birthday on Friday next, December 5.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Norrie: Since she will be away on official business for the next few days, I wish to take this opportunity of wishing her a happy birthday. I am sure all honourable senators join me in wishing Senator Inman many years of happiness and good health.

Her vital interest and participation in the work of the Senate and in her beloved Prince Edward Island will, we know, claim her attention for years to come.

So, dear senator, happy birthday, and may God always hold you in the hollow of his hand.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL SESSION, COPENHAGEN, DENMARK—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-first Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held in Copenhagen, Denmark, from 21st to 26th September, 1975, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to join in the birthday greetings to Senator Inman. I know that all of us wish her a very happy birthday and hope that she will be with us for some time, and that we will have the benefit of her guidance and advice for years to come.

Honourable senators, this inquiry standing in my name has been on the Order Paper for some considerable time—as a matter of fact, since October 23 last. I only hope that this long delay would have the same effect as that of a long delay before the drinking of good Canadian wine.

● (1450)

This is, I think, the sixth time that I have had the opportunity to report to the Senate on meetings of the North Atlantic Assembly. For the period September 21 to 26 we met in Copenhagen, Denmark, and that is the end of my remarks as far as the travelogue is concerned.

This meeting was attended by a large Canadian delegation consisting of three members from the Senate and 17 members of the House of Commons, accompanied by a secretariat of three.

My remarks are going to be brief this afternoon on two counts. First, I am recovering from a sore throat; secondly, I have had five previous opportunities to discuss this matter, and I have noticed, as a result of the efforts that I have attempted to make on those previous occasions, that little or no—I think “no” is more accurate than “little”—attention has been paid by the press to any remarks in this chamber or elsewhere on Parliament Hill with respect to the North Atlantic Assembly. Speeches that have been made both here and in the other place have had too little effect on government policy.

Senator Flynn: Try again.

Senator McDonald: A new format must be found for obtaining the views of Canadian members of Parliament who had the opportunity of attending the North Atlantic Assembly and its committee meetings. A new format has been established, in fact, because on November 25—that is, last week—a meeting was held by the Canadian branch of the North Atlantic Assembly which the Minister of National Defence, and, I understand, others, attended, on which occasion a report was given to the minister. Unfortunately, I was unable to attend that meeting. However, I think the proper format is for parliamentarians to report back to the people of Canada and to the Government of Canada if we hope to have a greater input into the policies that are followed by our government with respect to national defence, and especially with respect to our contribution as far as NATO is concerned.

This year, I was again a member of the military committee, and therefore my remarks today will be almost entirely confined to the military aspects of the North Atlantic Assembly. That is not to say that I do not recognize the important part played by the other standing committees, namely, the political committee, the committee on economics, the committee on science and technology, the committee on educational and cultural affairs, and the information committee. I know that all of these committees make a major contribution to the welfare of the North Atlantic Assembly, and they make a contribution towards the target which we are all aiming at, which is the maintenance of peace in western Europe in the future.

I think we all recognize that virtually every military move that is made has a political connotation. None of those moves can be made unless we have the wherewithal, namely, the money, to support them, so that the economic committee plays a very important role in making it possible for the military and political committees to do their job.

Science and technology are probably two of the most important elements in the development of new military equipment, and also in the sharing of science and technology between friends, not only in the military domain but in the total field of research and development. Of course, educational and cultural affairs and information are equally important in that, if we are going to have the support that is necessary from the general populace of those countries that are members of the North Atlantic Assembly, they must be informed and educated with respect to what NATO has been able to accomplish on behalf of the Western World, and what it hopes to accomplish in the years to come.

I repeat that I do not wish to downgrade any of the committees, but it is difficult, in the time at my disposal, to deal with all of them. To be honest and frank with you, I am not qualified to deal with committees that I have not had the opportunity of spending time with during their discussions.

In the past we have had, as a rule, at the North Atlantic assembly meetings in the fall of the year, three members of this chamber in attendance. It had been my hope that in the future we would be able to take five members of the Senate to the fall meetings of the North Atlantic Assembly.

Senator Flynn: Right!

Senator McDonald: That would provide us with enough representation to enable us to have one senator on each standing committee. I think this would have been worthwhile, and in the best interest of this chamber as well as in the best interest of Canadians generally.

My efforts in this regard, I understand, have been torpedoed, in that very recently a committee under the chairmanship of the Speakers of this chamber and the other place was set up to look into the number of Canadian delegates taking part in different parliamentary organizations travelling abroad. I note from the report of this committee that a recommendation has been made to the effect that each association be asked to agree that the maximum size of the delegation to an annual conference be determined on the basis of the number of votes it is allowed, plus officers or rapporteurs elected by their colleagues at international meetings, plus staff support. Supernumerary members of delegations should not be considered.

This, to me, means that we will not be able to send five delegates to the North Atlantic Assembly in the future, since the Canadian delegation is entitled to 12 votes. If the total Canadian delegation is confined to 12 and, in addition, those who have been elected by their peers as rapporteurs, then I am quite certain the Senate is not going to get five out of the 12.

I am sorry to have to report this to you. I am also sorry to have to report that there were no senators on the steering committee that was set up, and which brought in these recommendations. The steering committee was made up of Mr. Fairweather, Mr. Langlois, Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Trudel, all members of the other place. It seems to me that when decisions are made with respect to delegations, composed of members of both houses, to international meetings, and when decisions are made with respect to the provision of financing for those delegations by this chamber and by the other place, the Senate ought to be represented. I am not saying that we would have changed anything, but I do believe that we ought to have had representation on that steering committee. I regret very much that we were not able, because we were not represented, to put forward some of the ideas we have discussed previously in this chamber.

Senator Deschatelets: Is that the first year that the steering committee has had no Senate representation? How about previous years?

Senator McDonald: As far as I know, this is a new venture. The committee that was set up under the chairmanship of the two Speakers is a new one. This is not something that has been carried forward from activities of the past. It is an activity which was embarked upon this year, to my knowledge, for the first time, and it is the first time a decision has been made that the number of Canadian delegates is to be held down to the number of votes that the Canadian delegation is entitled to in the meetings abroad. This applies not only to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization but also to the Interparliamentary Union and to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, et cetera. So it is a new endeavour in that respect.

[Senator McDonald.]

● (1500)

At this point I should like to refer to the first speech I made on this subject in the Senate. It was on November 6, 1969, and at page 122 of Senate Hansard I quoted from remarks Senator Aird had made on the same subject on December 17, 1968, as follows:

As Canada's distinguished former Prime Minister, Lester Pearson, pointed out during his current series of Reith Lectures over the BBC, the strength of NATO's conventional forces would not be sufficient to resist for long an attack by the much more numerous conventional forces of the Warsaw Pact nations.

And here Senator Aird quoted Mr. Pearson's words, as follows:

If NATO wished to defend itself against aggression from eastern Europe, it could not do so successfully at present by the use of conventional forces against the same kind of attack. It could only make its collective will prevail by the threat or the use of nuclear force, which would mean taking the responsibility for beginning a nuclear war and destroying both sides in the process.

I went on to say after that:

I agree entirely with that statement, with the exception of Mr. Pearson's last few words, that it would mean taking the responsibility for beginning a nuclear war.

I said that I did not think that was necessarily so. I said that at that time because in 1968 the strategic nuclear strength in Europe of the American forces and of NATO forces was about ten times that of the Warsaw Pact countries and the Soviet Union. That situation has changed and today the strategic nuclear forces in Europe are virtually in balance. I do not think we should talk about NATO nuclear forces or Warsaw Pact nuclear forces; it is more accurate to talk about the United States strategic nuclear forces and the Soviet Union strategic nuclear forces. I repeat that in 1968 we had a superiority of about ten to one, but today that has fallen to about one to one.

I should like to refer to a report prepared by Mr. Patrick Wall of the United Kingdom, the general rapporteur of the military committee. This report was presented to the meeting in Copenhagen last September. On page 20 of Patrick Wall's report he outlines the strategic nuclear weapons allowed under the May 26, 1972, SALT 1 Interim Agreement, and to indicate to you why I have come to the conclusion that we no longer have nuclear superiority in Europe—but we have balance—I want to put a few figures on the record.

Today the United States has 1,054 intercontinental ballistic missiles, and the Soviet Union has 1,618. SLBM's are nuclear weapons fired from submarines, and the United States has 656 of these missiles on 41 nuclear submarines, and the Soviet Union has 740 missiles on 48 modern nuclear submarines, making a grand total of ICBM's and SLBM's for the United States of 1,710 compared to 2,358 for the Soviet Union.

Under the SALT agreement the number of these missiles to be fired from nuclear submarines will be allowed to grow to the point where the United States will increase to 44 submarines with 710 nuclear weapons from 41 submarines with 656 weapons. The Soviet Union will be allowed to expand its fleet from 48 modern nuclear submarines to 62 with 950 nuclear weapons. One might say that this is beyond a balance of one to one in that the Soviet Union have a greater number than the United States, but from the information we have we are led to believe that the imbalance in numbers will be offset by the striking power and accuracy of the more sophisticated American system. Don't ask me to prove that, but this is the evidence that we have been given by people who, I presume, are in a position to know what they are talking about.

So, honourable senators, we can no longer rely on a strategic nuclear force for our defence in Europe. We can no longer say, "Well, our nuclear weapon is so much superior to yours that you dare not start a conventional war." We have to build a conventional force which is equivalent to that of the Soviet Union and her satellites, and if we do not, then in my view and in the view of virtually everyone I speak to who is knowledgeable in military matters we are inviting trouble—we are inviting war.

Again I want to refer to Mr. Wall's report and look for a moment at the relative positions of the Warsaw Pact nations and NATO as far as conventional men and materials are concerned. In Central Europe today there are about 620,000 NATO armed forces personnel. They are faced by about 910,000 Warsaw Pact troops, 610,000 of them being from the Soviet Union and the rest from satellite countries.

● (1510)

What equipment do they have at their disposal? Some people argue, for instance, that the tank is an obsolete weapon, that perhaps it has no place in the armaments of a modern conventional war machine. Well, the figures on the number of tanks under the command of the Warsaw Pact nations certainly do not indicate that they believe that the tank is an obsolete weapon. The Warsaw Pact nations in Central Europe have 20,000 tanks at their disposal, 12,400 of which are manned by Russians. They are opposed by only 7,000 tanks. Indeed, there is some argument in Canada as to whether our troops in Europe need tanks at all.

In view of the fact that we are outnumbered now three to one, I ask you whether or not it is logical to supply our men with modern tanks. So long as the potential enemy has tanks, we must have tanks in our forces if we are to defend ourselves against them. The fact that the Soviet Union and her allies have almost three tanks to every one we have does not mean, however, that we are actually outfought by three to one. I believe that the Yom Kippur war proved that point. It proved that the old Centurion tank, with which our Canadian forces in Europe are equipped and which the Israelis refitted with broader tracks, a night capability, a new engine and a new power train, was able to outfought the biggest tank that the Soviet Union has today. But in all probability a refitted Centurion is not as good a tank as the Leopard, the M60, the CB30, the French tank or many others. So I do not want anyone to think that we should throw up our arms in horror because our tanks over there are outnumbered three to one. Nevertheless, the Canadian tanks ought to be replaced, and the sooner the better.

Again, in the same area of Central Europe the NATO forces have 165 light bombers. The Soviet Union and her allies have 250, of which 200 are manned by the U.S.S.R. Fighter ground attack aircraft: we have 1,250; the Soviet Union and her allies have 1,500, of which 1,100 are manned by Russians. Interceptors: we have 350; they have 2,100, of which 1,100 are manned by Soviet personnel. Reconnaissance aircraft: we have 275; the Warsaw Pact nations have 500, of which 350 are manned by Russians.

One can see, therefore, that not only have the Soviet Union and her allies grown to the point where they have at least equal power in terms of strategic nuclear weapons, but they have attained a vast superiority in terms of conventional weapons. It is my view that we in Canada must continue to play our part in supplying both manpower and modern equipment for the defence of freedom of the Western World.

Honourable senators, a year ago, on December 4, 1974, I made certain comments which are found at page 345 of Hansard for that date. I was talking about our troops in Europe and the fact that some of us had had the opportunity of visiting with our troops in Lahr and at the air wing at Baden. Let me read in part what I said:

Many Canadians are of the opinion that our troops are not sufficiently well equipped. In some respects, that is true, but in others it is not. Let us look at the Royal 22nd Regiment, the infantry battalion.

I will not repeat what I said a year ago. It is on record. But I think that by and large the same troops we had in Europe a year ago are there today. They have virtually the same equipment. Let me give you a quick rundown of it. The Royal 22nd Regiment are badly in need of rubber-tired vehicles, including everything from a jeep to a two-and-a-half tonner. Their vehicles ought to be replaced, and the sooner the better. The Royal Canadian Horse Artillery have excellent equipment. The Royal Canadian Dragoons, which is the armoured regiment, needs to have its tanks replaced.

A year ago I was of the opinion that perhaps the best thing we could do would be to refit our Centurion tanks in a manner similar to how the Israelis refitted theirs. That would have given us a pretty good capability into the mid-1980s. However, I have changed my mind during the last year. Rather than doing that, I think we ought to come to some arrangement with Germany so that Canadian troops, whether it be the Royal Canadian Dragoons or whoever replaces them as the armoured regiment, can use the Leopard tanks. Most of the troops in Europe today, apart from the Americans and the British, use the Leopard tank. There is little doubt that the Leopard tank is probably the best in the world. As a matter of fact, the great industrial nation to the south of us is at this moment wondering whether it should proceed with the design of a new tank or whether it would be further ahead to purchase the Leopard.

It is my hope that the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe can have their tank equipment replaced. If it is replaced, I hope it will be replaced by the Leopard. Moreover, I hope we are able to purchase some Leopards which can be used for training purposes here in Canada.

The Canadian air group are flying the F-104, and a year ago the personnel flying that aircraft told me and others that they were happy with it. They admitted that it was coming to the end of its days, but they thought it would see them through several more years. Nevertheless, we are facing a horrendous expenditure when that aircraft is replaced by probably the F-16 or similar aircraft in the not too distant future. This is not nearly as pressing a problem, in my view, as the problem with respect to the tanks.

I am happy to have read, as all of us have, the announcement made in the last few days with respect to the re-equipping of our naval air arm with a new long-range patrol aircraft. There is no doubt that one of the major responsibilities of Canada is the defence of the sea lanes in the northern and western Atlantic. That was one of our major responsibilities in the last world conflict. It is a responsibility which we have not only in wartime but in peacetime as well. It is our responsibility not only as a member of NATO but as part of our own home defence. Our home defence is not only a military defence but is the need to protect our fishing and mineral and other developments that we hope will come in the offshores of this country.

Some people have complained that the purchase of the new long-range patrol aircraft, the Lockheed P-3 Orion, is a mistake. As a matter of fact, Charles Lynch has called it the "million dollar baby" and the "old crate." The only thing old about that article is the person who wrote it. Certainly the Orion is really a military version of the old Lockheed Electra, but the P-3 Orion is nonetheless recognized as probably the best long-range patrol aircraft in the world today. It is recognized as such and probably will continue to be so for the next 20 years. Some old crate! The price of each aircraft, fully equipped with ground support, will be $53 million.

● (1520)

There is only one airplane in the world today that would cost more, and that is the new P-1 bomber to be built by the United States. It is an excellent aircraft. In my view, the ministry and the government deserve credit, and our congratulations and thanks, for having finally come to the conclusion to purchase it. I am convinced that it will do yeoman service in our role in NATO, not for a year or two, but for at least 20 years.

It is my hope that we will go on from this purchase to the purchase of other equipment. The Minister of Defence made the statement that over the next five years there will be 12 per cent real growth in each year, plus inflation, building up to the point where 20 per cent of our defence expenditures will be available for the purchase of new equipment.

Our main problem to date has been that we have had very little left out of our total budget to buy new military hardware. The government has now made a change. It has come forward with a program which, in my view, will meet the needs and wishes of the Canadian Armed Forces, and ought to meet the needs and wishes of the Canadian public generally.

[Senator McDonald.]

As I indicated earlier, we ought to buy the new Leopard tank rather than refit our Centurions. One of the reasons I have changed my mind on this matter is that if we refit the Centurion we will be the only force in Europe using it. In the event of a breakdown, you can look for help nowhere but your own maintenance base because no one else uses the Centurion tank in Europe. It seems to me that Canada should purchase the Leopard tank, because it is the type of tank being used by our allies in Europe. This, I admit, would be a large step, a very expensive step, but one which I think we should take.

One of the great problems confronting NATO is the variety of military equipment being used. For example, in Central Europe at the moment there are 23 different families of combat aircraft in use; seven different families of tanks; eight different families of personnel carriers; 22 different families of anti-tank weapons; 36 different types of fire control systems; eight different lines of air missile systems; six different anti-ship missiles; and over 20 different calibres of weapons of 30 millimeters or larger. Surely, all of us can understand the problems of logistics associated with a mixed bag of tricks such as the one I have just outlined.

Many people have come to the conclusion that the rationalization of our armaments in Europe would result in a 25 per cent saving on ground units, and a 30 per cent saving on air units. Those savings would be achieved simply by re-equipping the forces of the different member nations with the same equipment. However, every nation seems to have its own nationalistic views. Every nation wants to build airplanes, tanks, and weapons of one kind or another. If we can realize a 25 per cent saving as far as our land forces are concerned, and a 30 per cent saving as far as the air unit is concerned, through rationalization of our armaments, then I think it is time that all the member nations allowed these nationalistic views to take a back seat to a program of rationalization.

As honourable senators are aware, NATO has drawn a circle around a certain area of the world and has said, in effect, that it is responsible for that particular area and has little or no responsibility outside of that area. I want to indicate some of the problems—certainly, they are NATO's problems—that do not fall within that circle drawn on the map that I have just described.

Looking at a map of the world, it is not difficult to recognize that the first commodity a nation must have, not only in wartime, but in peacetime as well, a commodity without which you can do nothing, is oil. As I understand it, the supply of oil in Western Europe would last, in the event of a war breaking out, 30 days. This is a real problem when you consider that oil has to come from the Persian Gulf, down the Indian Ocean, around the Cape of Good Hope, up into the Atlantic Ocean, through the Bay of Biscay and into Europe. The problem we are faced with is how to defend those routes. The other alternative route, of course, is through the Suez Canal, down the Mediterranean and around Spain into Europe.

The British navy has virtually withdrawn from the Indian Ocean, and has a much smaller presence in the Mediterranean than ever before. This is offset, to some extent, by the re-equipment and rebuilding program of the Italian navy, as well as by the deployment of the French navy in the Mediterranean. In my view, however, and in the view of those I have spoken to about this matter, the Mediterranean today is no longer an allied sea. The balance of U.S.S.R. forces and those of the Western World is about the same in the Mediterranean as it is for land forces in Central Europe. With the opening of the Suez Canal, Soviet naval forces can get to the Mediterranean Sea and the Indian Ocean much more rapidly. I am left wondering who is supposed to be looking after those sea routes from the oil fields in the Middle East to Western Europe.

We have very few bases left in the Indian Ocean. Yet we have member countries of NATO, through their delegates, complaining of the fact that the United States has military bases in Spain. I am glad that the United States has military bases in Spain. I hope she is able to keep them there. With the situation that prevails in Greece, in Turkey, in Cyprus, in Portugal, how could we rely on activities from any one of those areas for the defence of the sea routes across the Indian Ocean, around the Cape of Good Hope, up the African Coast and into Western Europe? I repeat, I am pleased that the United States has bases in Turkey, and elsewhere. I hope it retains those bases.

I am a little tired of hearing people criticizing South Africa. South Africa was a great ally of ours on two different occasions when we were called upon to fight a world war. They have a very strategic role to play in the defence of the sea routes of the world today.

● (1530)

This is not to say that I favour either the past government of Spain, or the present government of South Africa. There are many governments in this world that I do not agree with, but some of them are members of the North Atlantic Assembly. Although I do not like the type of government—that is not my business—I am prepared to cooperate with them, as well as with the United States, Spain, South Africa, and any other country that is prepared to share the responsibility for, and play a part in, the defence of the freedom of the world. Let us make no bones about that.

Some people have been writing letters to editors recently about what Canada's defence policy ought to be. I read one on October 28 last, written by a Dr. J. E. Keyston—now retired, thank God—who is living in Ottawa. He was for seven years vice-chairman of the Defence Research Board, and for six years NATO's director of armament and defence research. I am not going to read the article to you because I do not think it is worthy of it, but here is a man who suggests that Canada should not spend any money on NATO abroad. He suggests that all we should do is build up our ability to defend the Atlantic sea lanes and ourselves against any conventional weapons that the Soviet Union may use against us in peacetime. How in God's name are we going to use conventional weapons to defend the sea lanes in peacetime, and not get involved in a war? Furthermore, if Europe falls, what interest would we have in defending the sea lanes from here to Europe? Who are we going to trade with? Fortunately, this letter was answered by E. M. D. Leslie, a retired brigadier general.

Senator Asselin: Perhaps we should say thank God for that too.

Senator McDonald: I do not know, but at least his reasoning is more along my way of thinking than Dr. Keyston's.

I want to conclude my remarks by referring to an article that I happened to read this morning. This article was not written by a Canadian. It was written in Europe, and it reviews the capabilities of the troops from the member nations of NATO in Europe. I quote as follows:

For the present, though, the honor of being the best troops in Western Europe belongs hands down to the Canadians.

The article quotes General Michael Davison, Commander of the American Seventh Army and head of the Central Army Group that includes contingents from the United States, West Germany and Canada, as pointing out why he thinks Canadians are the best soldiers in Europe. He says that one of the reasons is that they are an all-volunteer force. Another is that the average age of the Canadian contingent in West Europe is somewhere between five and seven years greater than the average age of the European defence forces. He cites the pay of the Canadians as another reason. A single corporal living in barracks gets almost $700 a month, which is the equivalent of the pay of 14 members of the French army. General Davison then goes on to talk about the number of our men, and the equipment they have.

There is no doubt in anyone's mind that the Canadians are the best soldiers in Europe, and have been for many years. In my view they are entitled to the best equipment that the world can provide, and I am happy, despite the fact that we are faced with problems of inflation—which we are taking steps to rectify—and despite economic setbacks, we have had the guts to spend a little more money on our armed forces.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps I might make a slight clarification in order to set Senator McDonald's mind at rest on the question of the subcommittee report that he referred to.

The background is that less than a year ago talks were begun between the two Speakers with the suggestion that an advisory council on interparliamentary affairs be set up, with the two Speakers themselves as joint chairmen. This was done, incidentally, in Her Honour's office a few months ago. There is no doubt whatever, therefore, that the Senate is fully advised as to the activities of that council and its subcommittee. However, I agree with Senator McDonald that it was most unfortunate that that particular subcommittee did not have among its membership a member of the Senate. I am quite sure that this was due to mere accident, because I happen to be a member of that council, which consists mainly of the chairmen of various interparliamentary associations and one or two others.

I am not sure that the report itself is a proper subject for discussion at this time, because it consists merely of some suggestions that have been made. That subcommittee has not even reported to the advisory council, so that any suggestions it may have put forward are not, as Senator McDonald seems to suggest, decisions that have already been made. There were no decisions made in the particular area that he mentioned.

I might also say that the report, in some respects, may be at variance with a resolution adopted some time ago by our own Internal Economy Committee, which said that the principle, as far as the sharing of costs of these interparliamentary associations is concerned—and that is a function of the Internal Economy Committee—would be to relate it directly to the number of delegates that the Senate has to the activities, and particularly the overseas activities, of any particular interparliamentary association.

Unfortunately, I was away at the time this subcommittee was set up, and I imagine that the other Senate member of the advisory council, Senator Macnaughton, may also have been away. That is probably how it happened that there was no senator on that committee. I emphasize, however, that its job—and I am sure Her Honour will agree with me—has been merely to look over the expenditures of all the interparliamentary associations, with the particular purpose of seeing if costs can be cut. Those costs are mounting very rapidly, not only with regard to the work of individual interparliamentary associations, but also as a result of the proliferation of interparliamentary associations, which is likely to continue at an accelerated pace in the next year or so.

The function of the subcommittee, therefore, was, first, to examine the adequacy or otherwise of the present expenditures of each interparliamentary association, and then to attempt to obtain some measure of co-ordination between the different types of expenditures and the different kinds of objects of expenditures of those various interparliamentary associations.

I should also like to say that the report to which Senator McDonald referred is, as I understand it, now before our own Internal Economy Committee, and I can assure him that to the best of my knowledge this subcommittee cannot tell the Senate what the level of its participation should be either with regard to delegates or with regard to the sharing of expenses. That is entirely a matter for the Senate itself to decide.

● (1540)

The Internal Economy Committee has suggested that the proper method of operation should be for each association to make a suggestion to the Senate as to what the Senate's share of the cost of its activities should be. Again, I say that any decision will be a decision of the Senate through its Internal Economy Committee, which consists of some 20 senators. I say that because Her Honour may have been involved—I believe she signed the presentation of this particular sub-committee's report to the Internal Economy Committee—and was probably not in a position, because of occupying the Chair, to make the explanation that I have made. I can assure Senator McDonald that his mind can be set at ease on this matter, because he, as a member of the Internal Economy Committee, will have a full opportunity to say whether this particular suggested participation by the Senate in the sharing of costs of the NATO delegation or any other interparliamentary association meets with his approval.

Senator Carter: Will Senator McDonald permit a question?

He gave us a rundown of the numbers of the various types of equipment on each side, that is to say on the NATO side and on the Warsaw Pact side, insofar as planes, tanks and other equipment was concerned. Do these figures include reserves? Is this front-line equipment, available almost immediately or within a reasonable time, and how do we stand with respect to reserves? That is my first question.

[Senator Grosart.]

My second question is with respect to the Leopard tanks. In view of our economic situation and need for restraint in expenditures, would he give us his views on the possibility of being able to rent these tanks from the German government, possibly on some sort of hire-purchase basis, but initially on a rental basis?

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, with respect to reserves, I should point out that when I was talking about the number of men involved—620,000 for NATO vis-à-vis 910,000 for the Warsaw Pact countries—I should have said that the 620,000 of the NATO forces do not include the French forces, which number some 50,000. I cannot say whether those forces are immediately available to NATO in the event of an attack or not. I presume these 50,000 French forces could be added to the 620,000 that I mentioned, but that is the only reserve included in these figures. Any other reserves, such as the national forces of either the NATO or Warsaw Pact countries, are not included. These are front-line personnel, and if the balloon goes up they are there and go into action.

As far as the Leopard tank is concerned, the last figure I have is that each one would cost in the neighbourhood of $700,000. That is probably higher today because the version of the tank now available is a new one which marks a great improvement over the original.

I would like to refer to the remarks I made with respect to the statements made by Mr. Richardson concerning his budgeting. The budgeting plan for the next five years is for 12 per cent real growth each year plus inflation, building up to where they have 20 per cent of the budget available for new equipment. I do not have the arithmetic that makes it possible to say that we are going to be able to pay the cost of the long-range patrol aircraft and the other equipment we are going to buy, and that there will be enough left over to buy the Leopards. I do not know that, but I understand there is a possibility of our making some arrangement with Germany with respect to the Leopard—not a purchase agreement, but a rental agreement. I understand there are some conversations taking place with respect to the Leopard tanks belonging to the German Army now stationed in Canada.

As you know, the German Tank Corps train at Shilo, Manitoba, and they have Leopard tanks there that they use in their training program. There is some talk about our being able to purchase or lease these tanks, which would remain in Canada and would be used for training Canadians on them, and then perhaps we could enter into a rental agreement for tanks for our troops stationed in Europe.

I am not qualified to say that we can or cannot do that, but I understand both these matters are being discussed—the possibilities of purchase and rental. Although I cannot say that one or other will be done, I think they are both worth looking at.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

TWENTY-FIRST GENERAL CONFERENCE AT NEW DELHI, INDIA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-first General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held at New Delhi, India, 28th October to 4th November, 1975, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I should first of all like to congratulate Senator McDonald on the address he gave this afternoon concerning the North Atlantic Assembly. I can assure honourable senators that the conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in India, while it did not become involved in the question of NATO forces, did involve other discussions of very great interest to the Commonwealth.

In rising to call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-first General Conference held in New Delhi, India, from Tuesday, October 28, 1975, until Tuesday, November 4, 1975, I wish to say that I was honoured to have been chosen as a representative of the Senate of Canada. Also present from the Senate was my colleague, Senator Grosart, who is a member of the executive of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Canada was also ably represented by a team, representing not only the Senate but also the other place. We had Mr. Maurice Dupras, M.P. for Labelle, leader of the delegation, who did an excellent job for the Government of Canada on that occasion. Also from the other place we had Mr. Marcel Roy from Laval; Mr. Alan Martin, Scarborough West; Mr. William Scott, Victoria-Haliburton; Mr. Robert Wenman, Fraser Valley West; and Mr. Max Saltsman, Waterloo-Cambridge. Also on the delegation was Mr. Ian Imrie, secretary of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, Canadian Branch, and his assistant, Mr. Bruno Lecci.

In addition to the delegates representing the Government of Canada and both Houses of Parliament, the provincial branches also had delegates. From Alberta we had the Honourable L. G. Young, M.L.A. for Edmonton Jasper Place; from British Columbia we had the former M.L.A., Mr. James Gorst, Esquimalt; from Manitoba we had the Honourable Edward Schreyer, Premier of Manitoba; from New Brunswick we had the Honourable Brenda Robertson, M.L.A. for Riverview; from Nova Scotia we had the Honourable Gerald A. Regan, Premier of Nova Scotia, and the Honourable Joseph Casey, M.L.A. for Digby, Deputy Speaker of the Nova Scotia Legislative Assembly; from Prince Edward Island we had the Honourable T.E. Hickey, M.L.A. for 5th Prince, Minister of Finance and the minister responsible for Cultural Affairs; from Quebec we had Mr. Jean Perreault, member of the National Assembly for L'Assomption, Mr. Noël St-Germain, member of the National Assembly for Jacques-Cartier, and Mr. Jacques Lesard, Assistant Secretary of the Quebec National Assembly; and from Saskatchewan we had Mr. David G. Stewart, M.L.A. for Prince Albert West, and the Honourable F.A. Dewhurst, Speaker of the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly.

● (1550)

With this delegation the Government of Canada—that is, both Houses of Parliament and the provincial legislatures—was ably represented. The delegates from both houses represented Canada well and participated in the discussion on all topics on the agenda. The delegates were able to place new ideas and proposals before the conference and to bring to the attention of the other Commonwealth states their personal feelings on many matters, as well as the feelings of the Canadian people.

On the morning of Tuesday, October 28, we had the honour of being the first people to use the new annex of the Parliament of India, which was constructed this summer, being completed just in time for the conference in October of this year.

The conference was officially opened by the President of India, Ali Ahmed, who welcomed us to India and gave us the assurance that the people of India welcomed the delegates from the 35 participating member countries, and would do all in their power to make the conference a success and our stay in India a pleasure.

We also had the privilege of being addressed by the Prime Minister, Madam Indira Gandhi, who welcomed us to India on behalf of the Government of India and the people of India. She told us of the struggle of the people of India for independence, and how British colonialism had come to an end in 1947 when the actual documents were signed in the city of Delhi.

She further suggested that it was in Delhi that the new concept of the Commonwealth was born, when India decided to carry on as a participatory democracy and chose to become part of the Commonwealth. The idea of being, and remaining, a part of the Commonwealth was fostered by Nehru, who wanted this new relationship with the United Kingdom and the other Commonwealth countries to be based not on animosity and bitter memories but on forgiveness and friendship.

The special feature of the association is the voluntary coming together of countries from widely differing continents and cultures, diverse in economics and in social lifestyles. It is not bound by any stated or unstated political obligations. It is neither confined to any particular system nor dominated by any one individual or nation. It has proven a useful forum for the exchange of ideas and experiences.

India is a nation made up of 22 states and nine union territories, most of which are larger than the bigger nation states of the world. By the way, the total population of all of the other countries represented in the Commonwealth is only about one-third of that of India alone. India contains almost every religious faith in the world. It has more than a dozen major languages with their own scripts, their own ancient literatures and with widely differing levels of economic development.

Through their federal constitution the states have a great deal of power, but the constitution also endows the central government with authority to deal effectively with any external danger or internal disturbances.

The Prime Minister, during her address, discussed the constitution of India. She suggested that Mr. Nehru had asserted that constitutions are made for people, not the other way round, and that democracy is not a rigid and immutable concept. She suggested that sometimes a nation tends to think that its type of democracy can be made to apply universally. She suggested that nations tend to forget that their democracies evolved over time, and that what was good for the founders of a nation might not be good for the present generation. She further suggested that future generations might re-examine democratic systems in the light of new historic conditions, and would likely make necessary changes as desired.

It is interesting to note that when the Prime Minister was addressing the parliamentarians of the Commonwealth in the new annex of the Parliament Buildings of India, the validity of her election was being judged in the supreme court of that land. On November 7, while we were still in India, the supreme court validated the poll law changes, and clause 4 of article 329A of the Indian constitution was struck down. The highest court of the land unanimously upheld Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's election to Lok Sabha in 1971, nullifying the Allahabad high court's judgment against her. A five-judge constitutional bench of the supreme court, presided over by Chief Justice A. N. Ray, handed down the verdict in five separate but concurring judgments which endorsed the 1974 and 1975 amendments to the election laws. The court's verdict of allowing Mrs. Gandhi's appeal automatically removed the six-year bar on her contesting elections which had been entailed in the high court judgment. This court decision seemed to be well received by most of the people of India.

Immediately after the official opening, the conference got under way with the first plenary session discussing the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace, and development in Southeast Asia. This plenary session was chaired by the Honourable Dr. G. S. Dhillon, Speaker of Lok Sabha, President of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and also President of the Inter-Parliamentary Union Association.

● (1600)

The Honourable Gerald Regan, Premier of Nova Scotia, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, formally inaugurated the conference. During the discussion on the subject of The Indian Ocean as a Zone of Peace, there was much concern expressed by the delegates from India and Mauritius because the United States of America, apparently, was building an airfield in Diego Garcia, which was purchased by the British government from the Mauritius government for £3 million, and because the British government was now allowing the Americans to build an air base which was big enough to enable B-52 bombers to operate from Diego Garcia.

The delegate from Kenya supported the idea of making the Indian Ocean a zone of peace, and suggested that the Kenyans had a common problem with all other countries which had coasts bordering on the Indian Ocean. He suggested that his government had always expressed the desire that the Indian Ocean should be left without any interference by outside powers. It was difficult to agree that what the United States, the United Kingdom and the

[Senator Bonnell]

U.S.S.R., or any other power, were trying to do in that area, was for the benefit of the area. He suggested that what the developing countries in that area needed most was money for development, and that if the big powers wanted to assist them, they could provide assistance in a number of ways other than building up military strength in the Indian Ocean.

The delegate from the Seychelles Islands suggested that too much movement of ships in those seas by the big powers, possibly involving atomic power, could well destroy the fisheries on which most of those small islands in the Indian Ocean depended so heavily for a living.

The delegate from the United Kingdom suggested that the United Kingdom shared the sense of the conference in discussing the Indian Ocean and seeking to create within it a freedom not only from nuclear weapons, but all other forms of military equipment. He suggested that the United Kingdom wanted disarmament, not just in the Indian Ocean, but throughout the world. The United Kingdom wanted a cessation of massive weapons build-up year after year by all countries—not only European countries, but countries of Asia also. He felt that such a reduction in weapons build-up should be an objective of the Commonwealth. He further suggested that the heart of the matter lay in continuing talks between the two big powers, balanced force reductions, and activities in the United Nations.

If we really want response, let us not point our finger only at the United States or the U.S.S.R. It will be in the interest of all of us to see if we can bring these two super powers together to discuss disarmament, not only in the Indian Ocean, but throughout the world.

The second item discussed in the plenary session was the development of Southeast Asia, at which time the Malaysian delegate suggested that the fundamental transformation of the political scenario of Southeast Asia offered the opportunity for all Southeast Asian countries to embark on a new beginning in their relationships with each other. It will require a constant attempt to discard old attitudes and dispositions, and to substitute in their place perceptions that are more in tune with realities.

The spectre of the aftermath of the Vietnam War is now enabling Southeast Asian countries to readjust their strategies. The struggle to eliminate wants of basic needs, such as food and shelter, must supersede ideological struggles.

The fear which is foremost in the minds of the Southeast Asians, arising from the United States involvement in Vietnam, is the possibility of their being another domino in international relations. That is why the countries of Southeast Asia are asserting that they are not prepared to trade any more territorial or strategic assets for any super-power guarantees.

In order to create a stabilizing force in Southeast Asia, the countries in that area are banding together in a non-military, non-ideological and non-antagonistic union which, they hope, will meet the common requirements of the different countries in Southeast Asia for their own development, their own growth, and their own protection, thereby making Southeast Asia a zone of peace, freedom and neutrality.

On Wednesday, October 29, the morning plenary session was held with discussions concerning Africa south of the Sahara and its relationships with Rhodesia and South Africa. The delegate from Zambia suggested that the threat to international security in Africa south of the Sahara was mainly due to the minority racist regimes of Rhodesia and South Africa, and the abominable apartheid policy of South Africa. He said that it was the duty of the Commonwealth, and all other bodies, to see that South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia comes to an end. Unless independence based on majority rule in Rhodesia is achieved, and the policy of apartheid renounced by South Africa, Southern Africa will always remain a threat to peace.

On Wednesday afternoon, October 29, the plenary session discussed the world energy crisis. During this discussion, the United Kingdom delegate, the Right Honourable Lord Shepherd, said that the recent energy crisis had affected the developing countries most, and would cost those nations some $10,000 million a year—a very sizable amount. Great Britain would have to pay nearly £1 million a day to meet the latest hikes in the price of oil.

The larger industrialized countries would be able to overcome this crisis, but it would be beyond the powers of the developing countries to face this crisis unless the industrialized countries took certain steps and also provided massive aid to the developing countries. It must be recognized that the poorer countries were more heavily affected by the energy crisis than were the developing countries, which had already reached a fairly advanced stage of development. Therefore, more attention should be paid to the underdeveloped countries.

It will indeed be difficult for us to overcome the present difficulties in a unilateral and national way. The industrialized countries must cooperate and coordinate their policies in such a way as to help the poorer countries in tiding themselves over this present crisis.

More care should be taken in the use of energy, and oil should be used only for essential purposes. It was suggested that greater attention should be paid to the activities of the World Bank to enable it to provide credit to the affected countries on the best possible terms.

● (1610)

Apart from conservation of present energy resources, our strategy should be to devise ways of increasing our co-operation with regard to sharing all the resources that are left in the world. It must be recognized that we are still in the cheap fuel period, and that within a few years, as supplies run out, we shall be moving into a more expensive fuel area.

It was suggested that big developments are likely to take place in the field of nuclear power in the future. This would also increase the possibilities of designing and building nuclear weapons. Control should therefore be exercised by the United Nations to ensure that the by-products of atomic energy are not used for other than peaceful purposes.

Mr. Alan Martin, M.P., a Canadian delegate, suggested that while Canada was trying to understand and concern itself with the problems besetting the underdeveloped countries as a result of the trauma brought about by world oil price increases, she must, at the same time, become more fully aware as a nation of the dramatic turn of events relating to the energy picture as it was currently affecting this country. He said that in 1972 it was estimated that our oil resources would suffice not only to meet our own requirements as far ahead as 1990, but also to enable us to export one million barrels per day. In 1974 we were told that, rather than having exportable supplies in 1990, we would be faced with potential net import requirements of up to 2 million barrels per day as early as 1985. He further suggested that somewhat the same situation existed in Canada in regard to the supply position of natural gas. He said that the Government of Canada had already taken various steps to meet these challenges as far as this nation was concerned and, at the same time, had taken into consideration the supplying, by the world, of the underdeveloped countries.

The Australian delegate told the conference that the nuclear, solar, tidal and hydroelectric types of energy were all being studied by his country, but that up to the present time no great progress had been made.

The delegate from India suggested that there might be a breakthrough in respect of the "fusion process." The "fusion process" would make use of the radioisotopes in sea water, which were cheap and limitless. If the scientists succeeded in finding some kind of a device by which this tremendous energy could be tamed and released for the use of industries, it would be a limitless source of energy for the world. He also said that we must look upon oil not as a source of energy but as a raw material, and that if this were done the world would be on the right track.

The delegate from Kenya said it was misleading to talk about an energy crisis as this would suggest a physical shortage of energy, which was not the situation for everybody, because those who could afford to pay the price could get the energy they needed. It was, therefore, essentially an economic crisis.

The delegate from Bermuda suggested that there had to be some special consideration for the underdeveloped countries, particularly during the interim period. He proposed that while the larger countries were trying to solve the problem by speeding up the research they had left lagging for many years, they should provide special consideration, by means of special rates, for peoples and countries with special problems. This had to happen because they could not afford to pay the increased cost.

On Thursday, October 30, discussions took place concerning The Building of a New International Economic Order with the following special subtitles: (i) World Population Growth and Food Resources; (ii) Commodity Prices, Terms of Trade and Indexation; (iii) Producer or Consumer Country Cartels and Regional Economic Groupings; and (iv) Multinational Corporations.

Incidentally, the group dealing with controls and regional economic groupings was chaired by Senator Grosart.

Concerning World Population Growth and Food Resources, the delegate from Bermuda, the Honourable W.H.C. Masters, said that Bermuda was one of the two countries in the Commonwealth which started population control, the other being India. He said that Bermuda had realized the importance of limiting the population as the alternative to being overpowered by poverty, and that the program was successful. He further suggested that their objective could not be achieved by population control alone, and that other things that were needed were industrial development, development of natural resources, control of pollution, more food production and road development.

The delegate from the Bahamas said that the population question really had its roots in developing countries, where the income level was low. A good deal of skill had to be mustered to deal with the problem. The Commonwealth was made up both of rich and developing countries, and if the rich provided the latter with the necessary skills and resources, the problem could be solved.

Mr. Alan Martin, M.P., a delegate from Canada, suggested that the population explosion was not likely to be halted in the near future, and whether or not it was the cause or effect of underdevelopment in individual countries was arguable. He expressed the view that population programs in various countries must be inter-related with rural health programs, and that it was mainly the responsibility of the individual nations as to how they should control their population growth.

Mr. Martin further suggested that, as far as food resources were concerned, nations which had a surplus of food should assist those who were in deficit, and that the recipient nations should make every effort to become self-sufficient in their requirements as speedily as possible.

On the afternoon of Thursday, October 30, during the discussion on Multinational Corporations, Mr. Max Saltzman, M.P., from Canada, said that most of the multinational corporations operating in Canada were of United States origin, and in some respects were to Canada's advantage. He suggested that workers in the United States felt that the multinational corporations should withdraw their investment in other countries because the funds that would thus be made available would create more employment opportunities inside the United States itself. He thought that, in spite of bitter criticism against these corporations, the problem facing developing countries was one of how to attract such corporations so that they could get what they could not produce themselves. Multinational expansion had been referred to as neo-colonialism, and had much the same characteristics as the imperialist political colonialism which could be called a kind of economic colonialism. When governments get involved in business and industry, what happens is the same as happened in the case of colonialism and multinational corporations—that is, in return for certain benefits, certain know-how, certain technology, the recipients are asked to give up a margin of their sovereignty.

On Friday, October 31, social problems were discussed with particular emphasis on the social effects of unemployment, the growth of violence, unrest among youth, and drug problems. The delegate from Jamaica said that these problems are of deep concern to most of the countries of the Commonwealth. He pointed out that many nations of the Commonwealth became independent during the last century, and that their attention was therefore focused on winning economic independence. He suggested that unemployment was the root cause of the social problems of violence, unrest among youth and the use of drugs. He further suggested that idleness was the cause of the breakdown of family life. The breadwinner abandoned his wife and children, the children developed wayward ways, and this placed a heavier load on the child welfare services of the state. Men migrated to the cities in search of jobs, which were few, and this in turn created housing problems in the cities.

I took part in the discussion on the social effects of unemployment, and suggested that some countries of the Commonwealth seemed to think that the cause of violence, unrest among youth and drug problems was unemployment. Others seemed to think that it was because of overemployment and lack of time for recreation and play, and still others expressed the view that the cause of unrest among youth, drug abuse and violence was under-education and lack of a proper educational system. Delegates from some Commonwealth countries were of the opinion that these problems were caused by over-education, and that most of them started in the universities, while others thought that their cause was poverty. I got the impression that some thought the cause was too much affluence in the state and in the home. In some cases it seemed that the cause was lack of guidance and parental care in the home, lack of love in the home, and in others it was due to the fact that so many wives are working in this modern day that there is little or no guidance in the home from the mother. There seemed to me to be all kinds of reasons, and every country seemed to feel that youth unrest, drug problems and growth of violence were caused by a completely different set of circumstances.

● (1620)

In view of the fact that there is such a diversity of opinion as to the cause of unemployment, the cause of youth unrest, the cause of violence, and the cause of the use of drugs among our youth, then in order to bring these problems—which seem to be affecting all nations of the world, even those outside the Commonwealth—into perspective, I recommended that the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association should set up a committee to consider a new international social order. Such a committee could bring together all the information and all the research that can be obtained from the member states, and bring back a report to the annual meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association which will be held at Mauritius next year. In that way we can see if any united approach or common remedy could be found for these major problems which seem to be worsening as the years go on.

This recommendation of mine was highly supported by member states, and the chairman, the Honourable M. C. Cham, M.P. from Gambia, was to report to the executive the feeling of the panel that a committee of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association be set up to report back at the Mauritius meeting on its suggestions and recommendations for a new international social order with special emphasis on unrest among youth and drug problems among youth and the growth of violence in the Commonwealth.

On Friday afternoon, October 31, a panel discussion took place on the preservation of the environment, the control of pollution and the protection of wildlife. Most members of the Commonwealth seem to have problems concerning pollution, and are setting up departments of the environment and are trying to control these problems within their own states.

The delegate from Canada, Mr. Robert Wenman, M.P., told the panel that Canada shared the concern for environment protection and had enacted important federal legislation including the Canada Water Act, the Clean Air Act, and the Arctic Waters Pollution and Preservation Act.

Mr. Wenman suggested that nuclear energy, which had become a major component in meeting the energy crisis, might become a major source of pollution in the world. The developing countries should also be aware of the consequences and potential danger of such energy. Any country selling, buying or using a nuclear reactor should be obligated to introduce all technologically possible safeguards, to comply with all international safeguards, to develop inspection systems, and to pledge technological research funds to the solution of the waste disposal problem. Any country that proceeded in its technology to the production of nuclear explosions should be strongly condemned by all the developing countries which so desperately require both nuclear energy and the guarantee of safety for our global environment.

Much discussion took place concerning the protection of wildlife, and most countries in the world are doing their utmost to preserve the different species of animals and plants that are becoming scarce. Many international orders are doing what they can to preserve many of the rare species of the animal and bird life, such as the whooping crane and the whale. It was felt by many that this is a problem for the United Nations to deal with, insofar as it relates to the preservation of wildlife in the different countries of the world. It has to be realized by all nations that some of our cherished animals, birds and plants are headed for extinction if we are not careful about our natural resources.

On Saturday, November 1, a plenary session was held to discuss Internal and External Threats to the Authority and Prestige of Parliament. The Right Honourable William Whitelaw of the United Kingdom pointed out that there are various threats to parliamentary authority all over the world—threats which have their roots in violence and intimidation. There are campaigns to undermine the authority of parliaments through systematic attacks on their members' competence and honesty of purpose.

So far as violence was concerned, if it gets started in any country it creates a sort of society in which authority passes from the elected representatives to the bully-boys and criminals on the streets. Surely, the need is to prevent violence from ever breaking out, because once violence starts it is far more difficult to stop it. Preventing violence from breaking out requires, first, an early appreciation of genuine grievances and, secondly, a democratic effort by the government, backed up by all its powers, to meet it. It also demands very firm action and, in certain instances, coordinated action among the nations of the world against those who seek to support violence in any country for any reason.

As to campaigns against parliaments and their members, if they are not to be repeated we must see to it that we promote among our people a faith and a belief in parliament itself. It is impossible to generalize about this problem because it differs from country to country.

Mr. Whitelaw did not accept the old saying that the only duty of the opposition is to oppose. He said we must not indulge in senseless party bickerings and recriminations in our parliaments. Fierce criticism and constant exposure of the failings of government are essential and must be rigorously pursued, but a country would think less of its politicians if such attempts degenerate into a universal condemnation of everything that a government does. This, in turn, would all too easily lead to a general denigration of the whole national effort.

The opposition can help parliament if it is honest enough to stand with the government where it believes the government is right. The opposition should give the government at least some support when it believes the government is only half right. It might criticize some parts of the government's program, but at the same time say that it believes it is generally right.

If this can be done then the people would feel that parliament is a constructive forum, genuinely seeking solutions to national problems, and not some kind of a battleground in the struggle for personal power. Nothing is more damaging to a parliament than to be taken as a battleground for some people seeking their own personal advancement and power. Parliament should be recognized as a living part of our national life, reflecting its changes and its adaptations. This is tremendously important if we are going to be in tune with the feelings of the people.

At the afternoon meeting on Saturday, November 1, we discussed Ministers, Members and Conflicts of Interest. It was felt that it is impossible to draw up a code of conduct for members of parliament. The problem of definition in this matter could really lead to defeating the very purpose. One remedy is to maintain a register of interests of parliamentarians, but the question remains as to who should maintain this register, and to whom this disclosure should be made.

If this declaration were made to the Speaker, it might not satisfy public opinion, and the public would like to scrutinize it. If it is scrutinized by the public, many objections might be raised by the legislators themselves, who would not like to have their assets and liabilities investigated by the public. Declarations could be utilized for harassing members. Widest publicity to one's assets and liabilities would probably satisfy most of the public. In some countries a wide range of entertainments is provided to members of parliament in order to influence their conduct in certain cases.

● (1630)

A select committee appointed in the United Kingdom was of the view that parliamentarians should be better paid in order to remove them from the field of temptation.

Basically, most member countries felt that we have to fall back on the good sense and integrity of the individual members of parliament, and on the capacity of the electorate and its good sense to choose the proper persons for parliament. If a person is known to have done something wrong, the public must reject him at the next election. This is an area in which we have nothing to rely upon except the good sense of the electorate, the good sense of the members and their own integrity and sense of honour, and above all, the capacity of humanity to set itself right.

On the final day, the subject of The Commonwealth as an Instrument of Social, Political and Economic Transformation was discussed. I am happy to say that the leader of our delegation, Mr. Maurice Dupras, initiated the discussion. It was his view that the Commonwealth has undergone a change and must now be looked upon as an informal and largely de-institutionalized association of countries of various races and continents. The Commonwealth is neither an empire nor a power bloc. Its members have some vital things in common. They share certain constitutional and legal attitudes, governmental and business practices and habits of working together. The justification of the Commonwealth lies in the sharing of viewpoints and the search for understanding. In spite of regional attachments, the Commonwealth is counter-regional; its role is not to rival regional blocks, but to link them.

Cooperation among Commonwealth countries is not limited to governments. It takes place among parliamentarians, industrial and commercial enterprises and voluntary societies and organizations. The countries work together through 300-odd organizations that promote Commonwealth interests in a variety of areas about which few people knew.

One of the most important areas of Commonwealth cooperation is in the field of education, where the Commonwealth Education Conference and the Commonwealth Secretariat play important roles in stimulating activity. Under the Commonwealth Scholarship and Fellowship Plan, by 1973-74 the total number of scholarships had reached 1,008, with 442 new awards in twelve countries.

Health is another field where there has been close Commonwealth cooperation. Similarly, member governments are increasingly taking the advantage of opportunities for legal cooperation within the Commonwealth.

In the field of communications, there have been mutual postal concessions between Commonwealth countries for many years. The Commonwealth Air Transport Council is an important institution, which advises on the civil aviation matters referred to it by governments, and is a medium for the exchange of views and information.

Mr. Dupras said that Canada's Commonwealth trade had expanded substantially, and it was his feeling that the Commonwealth has great possibilities.

During the business meeting that followed, the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, the Honourable James A. Jerome, was elected vice-president for the year 1976, when the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference will be held in Mauritius. Mr. Speaker Jerome likely will be elected president next year, and as a result will be president when the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference is held in Canada in 1977.

Before closing, I would like to take this opportunity to tell honourable senators that the Canadian delegation, which was ably led by Mr. Maurice Dupras, participated in the discussion of all topics on the agenda and contributed substantially to the debates. The viewpoint of Canadians was heard from all the representatives on the federal team, as well as from the provincial representatives.

As a representative of the Senate, I was proud to be a Canadian speaking on such worldwide topics and participating in such debates, and in being able to join with my fellow Canadians in the forming of world opinion on such major subjects as were discussed at the conference.

[Senator Bonnell]

I would also add that we were jointly proud of our leader, Mr. Maurice Dupras. Our secretary, Mr. Ian Imrie, and his assistant, Mr. Bruno Lecci, did an excellent job in organizing the Canadian team so that they were able to participate fully in the debates at Delhi. Without the support of Mr. Imrie and Mr. Lecci, the Canadian delegates would not have been able to participate as fully as they did.

Again, honourable senators, I thank you for the opportunity of representing you at this conference. While in India I had the opportunity on two occasions of appearing on national television in India to speak on behalf of Canada—once to give the views of Canada on the conference, and then to speak on youth problems and drug abuse. Mr. Dupras also had the opportunity of speaking to India on television concerning the feelings of Canada toward the Commonwealth.

When the conference was over, I believe that Canada was much better informed about the problems of the Commonwealth and the world, and the world and the Commonwealth were much better informed about how Canada feels concerning many of these problems.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

ANTI-INFLATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1640)

Senator Grosart: I wonder if the Leader of the Government would indicate what timetable he has in mind for further stages in the consideration of this bill. Has he a timetable in mind, or has he a suggestion as to a termination date with respect to our handling of the bill?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the measure is, of course, considered to be important by all members of both houses. It is the hope of the government that the debate on second reading in this chamber will be concluded by the end of the week. That, of course, depends to a great degree upon the exercise of the right of members of the Opposition to express their views on the bill.

We would like to have the bill referred to committee by the end of the week or the beginning of next week, so that it can be read the third time in the middle of next week.

Senator Grosart: I presume the Leader of the Government would agree that the time we might take on the bill would also depend on the desire of senators on the government side to speak to it, as well as senators on the Opposition side.

Senator Perrault: That goes without saying. Supporters of the government have never shown disinclination to participate in debates of great public concern of this type.

Senator Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government then relate the program as he has outlined it to our sittings in the next few days?

Senator Perrault: This matter will be the subject of discussion with the Leader of the Opposition tomorrow morning, and I hope that tomorrow I shall be able to give honourable senators a better idea of what the proposed sitting dates will be. It is recognized that because of travel difficulties at this time of the year as much advance notice as possible should be given.

It should also be pointed out with respect to the content of the bill that much consideration has already been given it by honourable senators. The subject matter has been discussed at great length by a number of senators. A pre-study has already been undertaken.

Senator Asselin: How many weeks did the House of Commons take to consider and pass this bill?

Senator Perrault: How many sitting days?

Senator Asselin: How many weeks?

Senator Perrault: I am afraid I cannot give you that information, senator. I simply do not have the commencement date or the completion date.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 4, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE—BUDGETS TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled four reports of the committee approving the budgets presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as follows:

for the expenditures of the said committee with respect to its examination of Bill C-65, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2)", as authorized by the Senate on November 19, 1975;

for the expenditures of the said committee with respect to its examination of Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and to repeal an Act to amend an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code", as authorized by the Senate on November 19, 1975;

for the proposed expenditures of the said committee with respect to its examination and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-60, intituled: "An Act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, authorized by the Senate on May 13, 1975;

for the proposed expenditures of the said committee with respect to its examination and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-73, intituled: "An Act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, authorized by the Senate on November 18, 1975.

COMMITTEE ON REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS—SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET TABLED

Senator Laird, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's report approving the supplementary budget presented to it by the Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments for the proposed expenditures of the said committee with respect to its review and scrutiny of statutory instruments pursuant to the report adopted by the Senate on October 29, 1974.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Monday next, December 8, 1975, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, December 8, 1975, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: As I shall reply to the Leader of the Government this afternoon, need we still sit on Monday afternoon instead of Monday evening?

Senator Langlois: Certainly.

Senator Asselin: According to what I heard, that would have been necessary had a reply not been given this afternoon. So, if I reply to the speech of the Leader of the Government, must we still come back at 2 o'clock Monday?

Senator Langlois: As I will indicate in a moment in outlining the program for next week, because of the number of senators who have expressed the wish to participate in that debate, I feel it will be necessary to sit both Monday afternoon and evening, regardless of what happens here this afternoon.

[English]

Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give an outline of the work in store for us next week.

In moving the adjournment of the Senate until 2 o'clock next Monday afternoon, I have taken into consideration the necessity of dealing with Bill C-73 as expeditiously as possible, owing to its urgency and the number of senators who have expressed a desire to speak on it. It is expected that the supply bill covering supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976, will pass the Commons on Tuesday next, and I think we can look forward to a pretty steady flow of legislation from the other place from now until the Christmas adjournment. Therefore, it will probably be necessary to sit on both Monday and Friday next week and the following week.

● (1410)

I will now give the schedule of committee meetings, which is subject to change because other meetings will probably be added as the week progresses.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 2.30 Monday afternoon on its advance study of Bill C-60, the Bankruptcy Act. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 9.30 a.m. Tuesday to discuss its report on Canada's relations with the United States. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. and will give priority to Bill C-73, should it be referred by that time. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 8 p.m. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is scheduled to meet at 9.30 a.m. on Wednesday. The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet at 9.30 a.m. on Thursday, and the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at the same hour.

As I have already said, other meetings will probably be added to the list.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1) (i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Phillips on the list of senators serving on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Macdonald on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

ANTI-INFLATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault moved the second reading of Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, there have been requests for an explanation of this bill, and I hope to accede, at least in part, to those requests.

The bill before us is a key part of the government's anti-inflation program. It empowers the Governor in Council to promulgate guidelines in the form of regulations for the restraint of prices, profit margins, dividends and compensation in Canada. It defines the areas of the economy which will be subject to legal enforcement of these guidelines and establishes the administrative machinery and the penalties for non-compliance.

The government's anti-inflation program is a response to the fundamental problem of domestic cost inflation which has been growing ever more acute for more than one year. The magnitude of this problem was highlighted by a recent forecast by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development in which unit labour costs in Canada were shown as rising at more than twice the rate of that of the United States; they were three times the German rate and were four percentage points higher than the rate in Japan.

The continued strong rise in Canadian costs reflects, at least in part, the fact that the Canadian economy is not experiencing a business recession of anything like the severity of those prevailing in the United States, Germany and Japan.

We can take some satisfaction in the knowledge that our economy has not suffered increases in unemployment or losses of output and income of the size experienced elsewhere. But the fact is that unless we respond decisively to the other aspect of our current situation, the cost inflation, this satisfaction is going to be short lived. Not only will some groups in our society suffer particularly severely from the direct effects of continuing high inflation, but the economy as a whole is likely to experience deteriorating performance as inflation disrupts financial markets, impairs rational planning by business and government, and generally increases tension in collective bargaining and in society at large.

Faced with developments over the summer and early autumn which gave no clear indication that cost inflation was starting to recede, but in fact raised the danger that still higher rates of cost increase might become prevalent, and given the growth in public support which is so crucial to the success of a wage and price restraint program of the type implemented, the government has responded with this program of concerted anti-inflationary measures involving fiscal and monetary policy, government expenditure policy, policies to deal with structural problems in particular sectors, and the prices and incomes policy which requires passage of this bill for its implementation.

I might add that the events since October 13 have further strengthened the case for this package of anti-inflation measures. Observers are becoming increasingly optimistic as to the strength of the recovery in the United States of America. Recently released data on the performance of the Canadian economy in the third quarter of this year suggests that recovery is also under way in Canada. However, in the absence of decisive remedial action, entering an upswing with rates of price increases in excess of 10 per cent could lead to indefinite double digit inflation, which would be completely unacceptable.

The measures which constitute the anti-inflation program are, first, a commitment to maintain a balance of fiscal and monetary policies that will encourage sufficient growth of demand in the economy to be consistent with economic recovery but at gradually moderating rates of inflation. Secondly, there is a commitment to limit the growth of all government expenditures to the trend rate of growth of the economy as a whole. An aspect of this commitment is the policy of limiting employment and wage rate growth in the public service. Structural policies aimed at ensuring the necessary supplies of energy, food and housing, at increasing the efficiency and competitiveness of the economy, and at bringing about an improvement in labour-management relations are being developed. There will be other announcements along the way in some of these areas.

● (1420)

Finally, there is the prices and incomes policy. Let me briefly review the central features of the general guidelines for the restraint of prices and incomes which the government is asking everyone to follow. I should like to do this before turning to the details of the bill, which establishes the mechanisms by which these guidelines will be applied, with legal sanctions, to selected sectors of the economy.

There is a misapprehension in some parts of the country to the effect that the guidelines only refer to certain selected groups, that only those groups delineated in this legislation are to be covered by mandatory guidelines, and that the rest of the economy is totally free from any guidelines. That is not the case. Voluntary compliance is sought on the part of all Canadians and all companies doing business in this country. The fundamental principle of the price side is that price increases should not exceed net cost increases. This principle is implemented through different rules, depending on the circumstances of the firm. The basic rule is that the cost pass-through should only increase prices by the dollar amount of the increase in these costs. Firms not able to allocate their costs to individual products will be required to limit price increases so as to achieve percentage pre-tax net margins no higher than 95 per cent of the average of the last five years. Retailers and wholesalers are, in general, limited to existing markups or gross margins. A reduction in gross margins, however, is required where changes in operating costs are such as to cause net margins to rise as a percentage of sales, and upward adjustment in gross margins is allowed where necessary to maintain the level of profit in dollar terms.

Prices received by farmers and fishermen for raw produce are exempt from the guidelines. This is in recognition of the fact that individual farmers and fishermen do not have very much influence on the prices they receive. As the American experience demonstrated, control of these prices tends to have adverse effects on any anti-inflation effort through reducing supply. This is one of the real lessons of the experience gained by the Americans as a result of the restraints program which was developed there some time ago.

The operations of marketing boards and related agencies which influence farm and fisheries prices have been discussed rather thoroughly, now, with provincial governments, and at this stage there is informal agreement that governments will ensure that these boards, which can fix prices, will keep within the guidelines.

[Senator Perrault.]

The objectives of the program as regards exports are, of course, different from those regarding goods which enter into the domestic cost-of-living picture. It is important that the Canadian economy continue to receive the maximum return from resources devoted to production for export. Exporters will be expected to sell abroad at fair international market value; however, it is also important that export profits, which will benefit to some degree from wage restraint in the export industries, not be treated in such a way as to make the program unacceptable to large segments of the public in a way that presents an invitation to excessive wage settlements in export industries, or in a way that encourages the diversion of supply from domestic into foreign markets.

Thus the exemption of export prices from controls is to be accompanied by a levy on the amount by which export profits exceed the level which would be permissible in controlled sectors. In general terms, the form of this levy will recognize the volatility of export profits and the need for continued heavy investment in this sector. The detailed nature of this tax measure will be made known when the Minister of Finance introduces the necessary legislation.

The compensation guidelines—and these have been discussed rather vigorously in some parts of the country—cover all forms of wage and salary compensation, including fringe benefits, bonuses and stock options. They are intended to allow compensation per employee to increase, on average, at a rate which is initially set at 10 per cent per year, but which reduces over a period of time in the expectation that the inflation in the economy is going to be reduced over a period of time. This takes into account, of course, the program that anticipates an inflation rate reduced to around 8 per cent over the next few months, so that the upper limit of a 10 per cent average wage settlement should be consistent with a 2 per cent improvement in average real income. The guideline limit does not take the form of a single, flat percentage limit on all increases; rather, as honourable senators know, there is a provision for variation both above and below the average figure, depending on the wage experience of the group in question over the recent past. The limits are further modified so as to impose a somewhat more restrictive limit on those towards the top of the income scale, and a somewhat less restrictive limit on those towards the bottom of that scale.

In response to discussions with provincial premiers and ministers, and in response to comment here, in the other place and elsewhere, the special treatment for low-income employees has been extended by adding a provision that increases which bring the hourly earnings rate no higher than $3.50 are going to be exempt. The compensation guidelines also recognize various factors which may provide grounds for exceptional treatment, such as the need to attract workers into areas of labour shortage or to maintain long-established historical relationships between groups. Honourable senators are aware, of course, that if in the past two years any group in this country covered by the mandatory guidelines received wage and salary increases which were below increases in the cost of living, such a group may receive an additional two percentage points this year to make their maximum gain up to 12 per cent, and where settlements were inordinately high over the past two years in relation to cost-of-living increases, then the maximum wage increase figure will be established at 8 per cent for the next 12 months.

As an aside, I find it very difficult to understand, and perhaps other senators share this feeling, why some sectors of organized labour have announced their intention to launch a $500,000 campaign to defeat the program when the object of the program is to maintain the purchasing power of the working people of this country. Nothing can be more damaging, surely, to this nation at this particular time than to have our working people paid in dollars which have deteriorated in terms of purchasing power.

I think we should ask those who lead the great labour movement in this country, those who have announced a public effort to defeat the program, how they can possibly justify inordinate wage increases when productivity increases are around zero, when wage settlements have been running around 20 per cent in the last quarter and inflation is running at 12 per cent. It can only mean that if large and unwarranted wage increases are granted, then either another sector of this economy is going to suffer in terms of loss of purchasing power, or those so-called major increases will really be illusory in terms of increased purchasing power. Let us hope that there will be a reassessment of the situation on the part of some of the labour leaders in this country, and that they will designate at least part of the money budgeted for public opposition to the program toward efforts aimed at developing new ideas and new concepts to make this program more equitable and more workable so that all Canadians, regardless of how they earn a living, can be paid in terms of meaningful dollars and meaningful purchasing power. That has to be our long-range goal.

The compensation guidelines also recognize various factors, as I said, which provide grounds for exceptional treatment, such as the need to attract workers into areas of labour shortage or to maintain long-established historical relationships between groups. We know that this occurs across the country in many industries where people doing roughly comparable work have had an historical relationship in terms of compensation. It may be that in certain cases a group has achieved a settlement, say, in September of last year, and an adjacent group, the group with this historical relationship, may not yet have negotiated a contract. So the Anti-Inflation Board is then in a position to judge where justice should prevail in terms of wage settlements, and the type of historical relationship there should be in terms of dollars and improved compensation.

● (1430)

I would conclude this review of the general nature of the guidelines program by emphasizing two points. The government has made the decision not to upset existing contractual arrangements, such as longer-term wage contracts, price contracts and interest rate contracts. This imposes limits on the rate at which it is feasible and desirable to attempt to reduce inflation if those subject to the guidelines are not to fall too far behind those whose incomes are governed by exempt existing arrangements. Thus, our objective is one of gradual reduction in inflation. We must pursue this reduction for several years if we are to attain acceptable rates of price increases.

The legislation which is before us expires at the end of 1978. There has been some discussion in the other chamber, of course, as to whether it should continue for an 18-month period or a three-year period. Surely, the point has to be made and the Canadian people must be convinced that we have a serious economic challenge and that this is not a program designed for only a temporary or brief period of time.

We do not wish the psychology to develop in this country that this is to be only a 12-month or 18-month program and that, perhaps, companies and wage earners can "hang on." We don't want the attitude, "Just wait until that temporary period is over and then we will hit them for huge wage increases or huge price increases," and so on. For these and other reasons, the government made the conscious decision to establish a three-year maximum for the program rather than a shorter period. I know that there are honest and legitimate differences of opinion in this chamber, and perhaps in the other place, with respect to this, but the government has made the decision to pursue this program for several years in order to achieve acceptable rates of price increase. Hopefully, the program can be dismantled before that three-year deadline, but this is a program which must be taken seriously and that is why a three-year deadline has been established.

The legislation, of course, has that nominal expiration date of 1978. We believe this is a reasonable horizon for planning the type of program which has been chosen. As I have said, it is also the case to set a very early expiration date would encourage various forms of behaviour, which amount to waiting out the guidelines with the intention of going back to old patterns. The program must have time to lower expectations if it is to make a lasting contribution.

The fact before all of us is that over the past 12 months increasingly there have been instances throughout the country of groups not only achieving catch-up in terms of purchasing power, keeping pace with increases in the cost of living, not only catch-up with employees doing roughly comparable work in the United States, but of some groups achieving gains which could only be interpreted as constituting hedges against what they presumed would be a disastrous continuing rate of inflation. This is the serious psychological aspect of the inflation which has beset the country.

A second feature that requires emphasis is the selective nature of the enforcement provisions of the program. Such selectivity is necessary if we are to manage with a relatively small bureaucratic structure. The government does not wish to hire a huge expensive army of "gumshoes" to tramp around the country, leaning over everyone's shoulders and demanding six copies of everyone's records each Monday morning. That would be self-defeating and would do little to help keep in line government spending. We believe that a selective approach, which ensures compliance by those who are generally the pattern setters, can be effective, given general acceptance of the need for the program and the need for restraint.

I turn now to the provisions of the bill. It first defines the areas of application and enforcement of the guidelines. As I have mentioned, enforcement is to be selective. In addition to applying to the federal government and all of its Crown corporations and agencies, and to the provincial-municipal public sector under federal-provincial agreement, the regulations which constitute enforceable guidelines will apply first, to any individual firm and any so-called "family" of associated corporations which employs more than 500 employees; secondly, to construction companies employing more than 20 persons; thirdly, to employees of those companies; and fourthly, to individuals or other firms carrying on a business that is a profession, and professional employees of such businesses.

Other groups may be brought under the enforcement provisions of the legislation by the Governor in Council with the recommendation of the board, where such firms or groups are considered to be of strategic importance to the economy, and thus in a position to undermine the whole program—and honourable senators, I am sure, can think of a number of groups which occupy that strategic position. Such additions could include industrial sectors where employees and/or employers engage in industry-wide bargaining.

Honourable senators may have noticed that the White Paper called for all areas characterized by industry-wide bargaining to be included, and there is a difference between the White Paper statement on this subject and the proposed legislation which we have before us. On reflection, this provision was felt to be too sweeping, and the bill reflects this change of view, but the power still resides in the Anti-Inflation Board to add certain sectors where employees and/or employers engage in industry-wide bargaining. The board will have real power in cases where certain groups are deemed to be of strategic importance.

The next provision in the bill is for the establishment of the Anti-Inflation Board. As honourable senators know, this board has been established on an interim basis by order in council under the Inquiries Act until it can be constituted under authority of this legislation.

The Anti-Inflation Board is to monitor movements in prices, profits, compensation and dividends in relation to the guidelines, identify those which would contravene the guidelines in fact or in spirit, and try to persuade the parties to come into line. If unsuccessful, it would be empowered to refer cases to the administrator for further action.

In carrying out these duties, the board will exercise all of the powers of a person appointed as a commissioner under part I of the Inquiries Act, and certain additional powers to obtain information.

Groups subject to the legal enforcement of restraint are required to keep the necessary records and accounts.

Either the board or the Governor in Council may refer cases to the administrator. It is this officer who, under the act, has the power to order that the guidelines be adhered to. He may require that amounts charged in excess of the guidelines be returned to the buyer, if that is possible, or be paid over to the Crown.

The bill, in addition, empowers the administrator to levy a penalty of 25 per cent of the amount by which revenues received, or compensation or dividends paid, contravened the guidelines, where the person knowingly contravened, or conspired knowingly to contravene, the guidelines.

[Senator Perrault.]

The bill provides more serious penalties, including fines and imprisonment, for failure to comply with an order of the administrator, for failure to keep appropriate records, and for misrepresentation.

Orders of the administrator may be appealed to the Anti-Inflation Appeal Tribunal, also established under this bill, the decisions of which may be appealed on points of law to the Federal Court of Appeal. The administrator's orders may also be changed or rescinded by the Governor in Council.

● (1440)

The Anti-inflation Board will report to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; the administrator to the Minister of National Revenue; and the appeal tribunal to the Minister of Justice.

The decision to establish a separate board and administrator requires, perhaps, some comment. Their functions could have been performed by a single body, but it is our feeling that it would be preferable to divide responsibility.

The role of the Anti-Inflation Board goes considerably beyond that of ensuring compliance with the guidelines by those sectors of the economy subject to enforcement. It is the view of the government that it can better fulfil that role if it is not called on to act at one and the same time as judge and jury.

The board will be the persuader, while the administrator will be the enforcer—and in using those words, both of which have a rather ominous ring, may I suggest that the persuading and the enforcing is to be done on behalf of the Canadian people, especially those least able to protect themselves. Moreover, a very important part of the board's function is to monitor the whole program and to promote public understanding of what is going on by publishing reports, holding hearings, and generally informing and persuading the public. It will not necessarily confine its interest to the activities of those groups covered by the enforcement provisions. The administrator will concern himself with a much more limited area, and his role will be more judicial in nature.

These, then, are the principal features of Bill C-73. It is innovative in its provisions and the machinery which it sets up in that it is designed to maximize the potential for voluntary compliance. While it contains stiff penalties for those deliberately contravening an express order of the administrator, or engaging in misrepresentation, it clearly provides that those attempting to comply with the spirit of the guidelines can proceed to make decisions and take action without fear of a severely punitive response should the Anti-Inflation Board disagree with their interpretation of the guidelines.

May I suggest that the success of this program is of vital importance to us, regardless of where we live in this country or regardless of our political beliefs. We may have honest and legitimate differences and misunderstandings about the bill or certain of its provisions, but no one can deny the need for strong action and strong leadership by governments at all levels and of all political persuasions at this time in Canadian history. We have seen throughout the world all too many instances of countries where economic circumstances have been such that no strong government leadership has been available to avert or prevent economic disaster. We know from the experience of others that it is also important for governments to know when to act and to be able to act in time.

Senator Asselin: And not too late.

Senator Perrault: There is a great challenge before all Canadians today. Some will say that the government acted too late, and they are entitled to their opinion. That view constitutes, legitimate political dissent. However, no one can question the economic facts of life which exist today. The United States, which competes in many areas for export markets, has average wage settlements currently of 7.9 per cent, with an increase in productivity in the order of 11 per cent. Productivity in Canada, as I said earlier, is zero, and wage settlements are in the area of 18 to 20 per cent, with an inflation rate of 12 per cent. We cannot exist long in that kind of situation without a severe economic dislocation down the line.

The Canadian people should know that the government does not regard the programs as being perfect. Many people have said that the program represents rough justice. There is no question that justice is rougher for some groups than for others, but the rough injustice of continuing inflation is substantially more disastrous than any of the so-called rough justice contained in the program. I think that all of us, including parliamentarians, have a responsibility to improve the legislation insofar as possible so that it works better and is as equitable as possible, as just as possible, under the circumstances.

Many groups across the country are asking to be exempted. There are some interesting letters arriving at government desks these days. Typically, some read as follows:

Dear Sirs: We stand four square and fully in support of this program. We think it is time to act in the interests of all Canadians. However, because we occupy a rather unique position in the economic spectrum in this country we ask that our group be exempt.

If the government exempts all groups which believe they occupy a unique place in the economic spectrum of this country, we will not have any program at all. The program should apply to all—and, yes, we parliamentarians have to start by showing leadership to the Canadian people. There must be restraint on the part of members of Parliament, whether in this chamber or in the other place, and restraint insofar as it is possible to achieve cutbacks in government expenditures without doing grievous damage to the great social programs which have been initiated by this and preceding governments.

Unless we make the idea of restraint applicable to government activities, the activities of this chamber and the other place, we cannot expect very many Canadians to participate in the battle against inflation. I have learned from the many meetings I have attended across this country in relation to the program that the people want something done about the problem of inflation. Most of them want to join in the fight against inflation. In a sense, they want to know where the recruiting office is to join the fight. We, as parliamentarians, must make sure, when they arrive at those "recruiting offices", that we ourselves have provided an example for them to follow.

We have all listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on the proposals contained in the White Paper entitled Attack on Inflation which has taken place in this chamber. A number of senators made excellent suggestions during the course of the debate. I can only say that as far as the government is concerned there is to be no rigid approach to this program in the months to come. If the program is shown to be deficient in some areas in the months ahead, if it is shown to have weaknesses, and if it can be made more equitable, the government will act to bring about improvements. Now, however, we have a great task in front of us—to make the program work.

One encouraging fact about the program since it was announced on Thanksgiving Day is that provincial governments, regardless of their political persuasion, have been very cooperative—and they range from Progressive Conservative to Liberal to New Democratic governments. All provincial governments are seized with the sense of urgency, and they are cooperating with the federal government in respect of those areas where they have a responsibility.

In closing, I urge honourable senators to support this bill. It is to be hoped that a number of honourable senators will participate in the debate to follow.

Senator Greene: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Can he enlighten me, and possibly other senators who may have an equal interest, as to how the Anti-Inflation Board was able to make a ruling with respect to the Toronto high school teachers' settlement prior to the passage of this bill?

Apparently, it merely acted on the authority of the order in council under the Inquiries Act, which gives the board no authority to anticipate its authority under this proposed act.

I also ask that question in the light of the fact that education is clearly a provincial matter constitutionally, and there is no Ontario legislation delegating its authority under the Constitution vis-à-vis education to the federal Parliament.

• (1450)

Senator Perrault: May I offer only opinion at this stage? The provincial governments and their entities are included in the program. Negotiations have been conducted with provincial governments to determine how the program shall be implemented, and whether the federal Anti-Inflation Board shall be given the responsibility of applying certain guidelines in some provinces or whether this responsibility shall be provincial. I understand, for example, that in Quebec a parallel provincial board has been established, or is in the process of being established, to enforce the federally prescribed guidelines in that province. I understand that the Maritime provinces have designated the federal board as the guidelines "enforcer" in areas for which they may have responsibility.

In the case of the Toronto high school teachers, I would be pleased to attempt to obtain a precise answer from the board for the honourable senator. It may well be that only an opinion has been sought from Mr. Pepin. Mr. Pepin may have given this opinion, and that is all it may represent at this time.

I can tell the honourable senator that the trustees associations and the teachers of British Columbia have similarly approached the board to ask how the federal guidelines would apply to their salary negotiations in that province, presumably in view of the fact that the Minister of Education of British Columbia has stated that the federal guidelines will apply. In other words, the Minister of Education for British Columbia seems, in effect, to have said, "The federal guidelines will apply in British Columbia's school system," and these groups say, "If that is the case, how do the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines apply in our situation?" This is probably what has happened in the case of British Columbia.

Senator Greene: The honourable leader would probably agree that a province cannot divest itself of its constitutional responsibilities merely by some decision of the then government. At the very least, they must have legislation if they are going to delegate their constitutional responsibility to the federal government.

Senator Perrault: I do not want to get into any constitutional whirlpools at this stage.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps you are in one.

Senator Perrault: I can assure the honourable senator that the legislation has been developed in the firm belief that the federal government is acting in a constitutional manner. We believe that the British North America Act fully permits the action we are taking in the public interest and under present conditions.

I now have further information with respect to the Toronto teachers' situation. This substantiates what I said earlier. The Anti-Inflation Board has simply indicated how, in its opinion, it will react, when the agreement is signed in Ontario, after the bill is passed. Mr. Pepin, then, has given an opinion.

Senator Flynn: And when Ontario has delegated its power. It has not done so yet.

Senator Perrault: The reaction of the provinces has varied, of course. Quebec, for example, has already set in motion its own machinery. I frankly do not know the precise position of Ontario at this time. The teachers' salary opinion, however, was apparently sought from the board, in view of the fact that the Minister of Education for Ontario indicated that the Anti-Inflation Board's ruling would prevail in Ontario. I think that is the best answer that can be given at this time.

Senator Forsey: May I ask a supplementary question at this point? Is it not true that the legal advisers of the Government of Ontario have said that Ontario legislation is not necessary for this purpose? Presumably the law officers of the Crown in Ontario have some warrant for saying this, and are not just giving this opinion out of the stratosphere or making an offhand observation.

Senator Perrault: In view of the honourable senator's expertise in this matter, I very much appreciate the opinion he has given the house. I do not have the precise details of any official statement at this time.

Senator Forsey: I am only repeating what I have read in the newspapers, which is perhaps rather hazardous. I understand that the law officers of the Crown in Ontario have ventured the opinion that no legislation is necessary in this instance. I should have thought that if the legislation before us is valid, then the opinion of the law officers of the Crown of Ontario is probably valid also.

Senator Flynn: By order in council?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: It is very gratifying to know that the Progressive Conservative Government of Ontario has been most cooperative since the inception of this program. We hope it is a happy omen for things to come in this chamber.

Senator Grosart: And a happy omen for the Progressive Conservative Government in Ontario. Has the government received an express opinion from the law officers of the Crown that all the measures proposed in this legislation are constitutional within the meaning of the British North America Act?

Senator Perrault: This has, of course, been given a great deal of careful study by the government, and we have obtained an assurance that the actions delineated in the bill before us are within the power of the federal government under the terms of the British North America Act. There is no question in our minds about the legality of the proposed legislation.

Senator Grosart: I was asking if there was an opinion. I now ask if that was a written opinion by the law officers of the Crown.

Senator Perrault: I can only undertake to obtain that information. I would be pleased to report to the chamber before the debate on second reading is concluded.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I should like to ask the honourable senator a question about the professions. Has some progress been made in negotiations with the provinces towards means by which these guidelines would be enforced in relation to the professions?

Senator Perrault: Yes, there have been extensive meetings with the provinces. In most cases, of course, as the honourable senator is aware because of his extensive experience in provincial affairs, provincial governments deal on a day-by-day basis with professional associations, such as those governing doctors, lawyers and architects. Conversations have been going on with the provincial governments with respect to, for example, the percentage increases in professional fees that may be earned by the various professions, and their relationship to the guidelines that have been accepted by the provinces.

Senator Smith (Colchester): May I ask a supplementary question? Have any tentative conclusions been reached with the provinces on the means by which the guidelines will be enforced—that is to say, how it will be determined whether an architect shall be permitted to earn over $2,400 more than he did last year?

Senator Perrault: Generally, the principle enshrined in both the White Paper and the bill before us is that when it can be demonstrated that there has been greater productivity, where more work has been done to warrant an increase in compensation, then that increase in compensation shall be permitted. However, if for the same amount of work done in, for example, 1974 it is proposed that a person in one of the professions is to have, say, a 15 per cent increase in income that is clearly in violation of the guidelines.

● (1500)

I think honourable senators will agree that the idea of the program should not be, and must not be, to discourage productivity. If we are going to beat the problem of inflation, it is going to be by increasing productivity, not only by manufacturing companies and by industries but by those in the professions and those who work on assembly lines, artisans, and so forth. We do not want to discourage those people who want to invest more of their time, creativity and honest energy in increasing their own productivity. Let me put it this way because I want to choose my words as accurately as possible: Inordinate compensation, well outside the guidelines, should not be paid where productivity has not been increased, and prices should not be increased beyond levels justified by legitimate cost increases. These are two important goals of the program.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if the patience of the honourable leader and other senators would permit me to ask one further supplementary question.

I understand what the leader has said because that is apparent in the material available. What concerns me, and what I am seeking clarification on, is whether any arrangements or agreements or understandings have been reached with any of the provinces as to how this question of productivity will be measured or determined in relation to professions.

Senator Perrault: That is the subject of the meetings now being held with the provinces, and also with the professions themselves. I would say that to this time there has been good cooperation from the professions across the country, the members of which are just as concerned about the trend in the economy as any other sector. As far as details with regard to precise regulations and measurement of productivity are concerned, I am unable to present them at this time. They are now under development.

The honourable senator is well aware of the time it often takes to develop regulations in connection with legislation. I will undertake to obtain as much current information as I can on the status of the professions, hopefully by the first of the week. With the permission of the Senate, I will provide that detail later.

Senator Bélisle: Would you please?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Thank you very much.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have paid very close attention to the speech which the Leader of the Government has made concerning Bill C-73.

Indeed, he has voiced arguments which I endorse, but his entire speech, in my opinion, faithfully reflects the admission by the government he represents, and I mean it, the admission of its inability during the past five years, to foresee today's economic problems and to cope with them at an earlier date.

The gist of the speech delivered by the Leader of the Government is this admission of the failure of his government during the last five or six years to develop policies and control inflation.

The bill we have before us is extremely important. I think that a good many senators will have the opportunity during this second reading debate to express their views on the matter.

Our party, honourable senators, will support the principle of the bill on second reading. We did so in the other place because we agreed with the government's intention of taking direct and strong action in order to check the ever increasing inflation which prevails in Canada at the present time. We supported this bill in the other place because we were consistent with the position we took during the 1974 election campaign. It will be recalled, all too vividly, that during that campaign our party and our leader had honestly presented to the public a formula for freezing prices and salaries as a means to curb inflation.

Apparently, our message was not understood and that cost us the 1974 election. But, even so, we came out stronger from that election campaign. Our credibility has increased, especially since this government has admitted that our economic situation is precarious and bordering on bankruptcy. This is the reason why today we are discussing what I would call late-coming and hasty measures that have so many built-in defects as regards their implementation, and that will create, as I said earlier, serious social inequities within various groups of our society.

The bill introduced by this government is going to create in our country a real economic dictatorship. It looks like wartime. Yes, it does look like wartime. The measures implemented by the government during wartime to control prices did not involve greater powers than the ones now being provided under this legislation. It is a sad thing that in peacetime we should have an emergency measure forced upon us. As I said earlier, there was legislation during the war which generated extremely serious inequities in its implementation. Yes, economic dictatorship stems from extraordinary powers of economic planning and selectivity assumed by the government and the anti-inflation board it is setting up. Never, under such legislation, has the government assumed so much discretion and power in controlling our economy. They want to restrict everybody's expenses except their own, which have been increasing at an alarming rate in the last few years.

I have already raised this issue during the debate on the White Paper and I intended not to repeat myself but, as the government did not answer to the Official Opposition in the other place, I think I should add a little to what has already been said.

When the problem is put to the government regarding its spending, they do not answer, they do not want to commit themselves, they are reluctant to say whether the expenditures will be cut down. And this afternoon the government leader said that under the guidelines of the White Paper and also according to that legislation, the government has pledged to cut down its expenditures. But we still have no proof this year that they intend to do so. We are not indeed the only ones to blame the government for its extravagant spending. Even Liberal members of the other place did, as well as senators in this very house, and I would like to remind my honourable friend, Senator Lang, with his permission, what he said on November 24, 1975, as recorded on page 1447 of Hansard:

Canadian governments at all levels have increased their spending by 300 per cent in the last decade; that is, from $14.9 billion in 1964 to $60 billion last year. In terms of the gross national product, that represents an increase from 31 per cent to 39.3 per cent. In other words, Canadian governments today at all levels control close to $40 of every $100 spent on goods and services in the country.

Statistics for 1973, being the latest available, show that such percentage government spending is only exceeded by Sweden and Holland, and statistics for 1975 will, in all likelihood, show Canada to be among the highest government spenders, in the Western world.

And Senator Lang concludes by saying:

At the federal level, last June's budget forecast a deficit of $4.3 billion for our next fiscal year. Indeed, it looks like $6 billion, and many economists are predicting that we will reach $7 billion. Canada's federal spending in the first half of the 1975-76 fiscal year is up a whopping 30 per cent over last year. Our net public debt has risen from $18 billion in 1975 to $25 billion in 1976.

● (1510)

It is a Liberal senator on the government side who speaks thus, as well as the members of the Opposition in the other place. When the government is blamed for its extravagant spending, what is required is a "commitment from the government to restrain the spending", as did the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon. It is only a commitment and not a formal decision to restrain its wasteful spending. It is quite clear, and we must not conceal it, that the government refuses to follow suit since it did not take the lead in this fight against inflation. The main culprit is the government.

Bill C-73 in its present form tries to apply controls over every one of us, but the government gets exempted from the legislation. There is no control on government spending under that legislation though some amendments were moved in the other place asking the government to agree to its expenditures being subject to the scrutiny of the Anti-Inflation Board. That amendment was rejected, of course.

The spending habits of the government and its expenditures which have increased by 300 per cent since 1965, according to distinguished economists, have been among the major and determining factors of spiralling inflation. We have no reason to believe that the government was sincere when, in its June 3 budget, it promised to restrain its spending, while the current fiscal year shows $1.7 billion in additional expenditures.

Honourable senators, is it any wonder, in view of the spending habits of the government, that Mr. Turner resigned as Minister of Finance? I feel that the main reason why the then Minister of Finance resigned was the Cabinet's refusal to follow his guidelines on restraint in government spending.

The first point that I wanted to make is that the government is not subject to any control when all other sectors of the Canadian economy are; there is no control for the government.

The Leader of the Government dealt this afternoon with the three-year period during which the legislation would be in force. Indeed, they tried in the other place, as businessmen and others did in Canada, to convince the government to limit the scope of the legislation to 18 months. This means that during the next three years, the government and the Anti-Inflation Board will be able to make any decision they want on the economic level without consulting Parliament, without reporting, without having Parliament assess the results of this wage and price control legislation. Never has any government of a democratic country asked Parliament for a blank cheque of such magnitude.

[Senator Asselin.]

That is why, since the government rejected our proposal to limit to eighteen months the application of the legislation and reassess the situation later on, the Official Opposition is adamant, because it would be giving the government extraordinary powers concerning the control of the Canadian economy. Furthermore, Mr. Stanfield said the following about the eighteen-month period:

We believe that a bill and a program of this nature limited to 18 months would be less divisive in the country and less susceptible to dogmatic, negative reaction and rejection.

He added further on:

... if we do not break the psychological aspect of inflation in 18 months we are not likely to make much headway under price and wage controls after that in a further 21-month period, when all the imperfections and problems inherent in controls programs are really coming home to roost and really reinforcing resentments.

So the 18-month limit to allow for a reassessment of the anti-inflation program of the government was refused. That means that the government, through the Anti-Inflation Board, will be able to take all decisions based on Bill C-73 during three years. Moreover, only after three years will the government determine whether it has been successful or not, without even consulting Parliament, the elected representatives. It is extremely undemocratic. I feel we are not the only ones who voted against this bill on third reading. The whole opposition—the Conservatives, the Social Crediters and the New Democrats—voted against it on third reading.

Senator Denis: Except George Hees.

[English]

Senator Perrault: George Hees knows something about trade and commerce.

Senator Asselin: I will come to that later.

[Translation]

It is true that a member from our party voted with the government. But I would remind the Leader of the Government that some forty Liberal members did not show up in the House. Either they were ill or they were hiding.

● (1520)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Fighting inflation!

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Out of 150 members, there were only 110 Liberals in the House. Does this not mean that at least 40 Liberal members would not support the government and vote for that bill?

Senator Denis: Were there not also some Conservative members who were ill or away?

Senator Asselin: Not many Conservatives were absent, we were there. There were not many Conservatives missing, but 40 Liberals did not show up in the House; either they were hiding or they simply were not there.

Senator Denis: You should have kept track of the Tories.

Senator Asselin: At any rate, they were not there to support such an important bill. And I think that when a majority government, with 150 members in the House, moves the adoption of such an important legislation, it should ask all its members for their full support.

[English]

Senator Choquette: Why are your front benchers not here today on an important matter like this? Where are they?

Senator Denis: Why did you count the Liberals and not the Tories? Be fair, at least.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: This legislation also—did Senator Denis have a question?

Senator Denis: Yes. I have. Why did you not count the members absent or ill among the Conservatives as well as among the Liberals, to be fair?

Senator Asselin: I only take the results of the vote. You now have 150 members in the House of Commons but the fact is that 40 of them did not vote because of illness or for other reasons, but they did not give any reason for not having voted. They should have showed up to support the government and vote for such an important piece of legislation. As for the members absent among the Conservatives, I leave it to Senator Denis to make his own inquiry.

Senator Forsey: Would the honourable senator allow a question? Were not a few members paired, because I think this practice still exists? Paired members?

Senator Asselin: I heard that since the last election there has been no question of pairing with the Official Opposition. To my knowledge, that is the practice. However, it would be better to consult both the Liberal and the Conservative Whips, as they could tell you better than I could.

Senator Forsey: I consulted them and I think it still exists.

Senator Asselin: In any case, I interpret the facts and they speak for themselves.

This legislation again leaves it to civil servants, to bureaucrats, to make extremely important decisions for the economy of our country.

So, I say that the administration of this legislation will again require an extremely heavy bureaucracy. Once again, they are the ones who will make the important decisions and not Parliament which, from time to time, as I said earlier, should be informed about the application of the act and its developments in order to give some guidelines to this board.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, if you look at clause 20 of the bill, you will find that this board has extraordinary powers, powers of inquisition, and I am afraid of that. It has the same powers than those provided under the Department of National Revenue Act. It means that tomorrow morning, they can come into an office, seize all books and ledgers and take them away. What I think is a serious shortcoming in this legislation is the fact that although orders issued by the administrator may be appealed, such appeals are allowed only on matters of law, not on matters of fact. So this is a denial of the Bill of Rights—a denial of the right of an accused individual to the full protection of his rights—because only matters of law, not fact, may be raised before the Appeal Tribunal.

What is even worse and seriously concerns the general public as well as several members of Parliament is that the government, as they have done in the past, have not yet published those regulations.

Clause 39, on page 29, reads as follows:

Regulations

39. The Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this Act and prescribing anything that, pursuant to any provision of this Act, is to be prescribed by the regulations.

So this means that the Governor in Council may make regulations that could go beyond the legislation. He may then have Parliament pass new regulations under Bill C-73 for the purpose of making good the shortcomings that will become obvious when the legislation is implemented. But this government has always ignored the request of members of the other House to come forward with the regulations to be enacted under that legislation. There are questions about whether the regulations will be in accordance with Bill C-73 or whether they will go beyond the purview of the provisions of Bill C-73. It is for that reason also that members of the Opposition have voted against this legislation.

Senator Forsey: We still have that famous joint committee.

Senator Asselin: I am not discussing that.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Is he suggesting that the regulations should be tabled simultaneously with the passage of the proposed legislation through the house? If that were done it would establish a precedent for Parliament. The act itself authorizes the establishment of regulations, and it cannot be expected that these are going to be known in detail until the legislation has been dealt with.

Senator Grosart: Nonsense.

Senator Asselin: The problem is always the same. This question has been discussed many times before in the Senate, especially by Senator Grosart and the Leader of the Opposition. There is nothing wrong with the government's producing a draft of regulations that will apply to a bill that is before the House of Commons or the Senate. There is nothing wrong with that. Members of Parliament would then know what the regulations are about, and whether they are consonant with the provisions of the proposed act.

[Translation]

I do not feel this is creating a precedent. It was requested, but the government have always refused. That is the reason why very often legislation enacted by Parliament has its main features altered through regulations approved by the Governor in Council. This is obviously what the Opposition and certain members of Parliament are objecting to.

As I said, we are opposing this bill because the regulations will be giving extraordinary powers to the Governor in Council. In addition, since those regulations have not been made available, our main objection is to clause 39.

However, in order to mitigate the anti-democratic consequences of the bill, the Minister of Finance insisted on keeping clause 46 as amended, notwithstanding the numerous amendments moved by Official Opposition members of course.

Clause 46 provided the following:

46. (2) This Act expires on December 31, 1978, or on such earlier date as may be fixed by proclamation unless, before December 31, 1978 or any earlier date fixed by proclamation, an Order in Council is made to the effect that this Act shall continue in force for such period of time as may be set out in the Order in Council.

This means that the act will be in force for the next three years. We asked that this be reduced to 18 months, as I said earlier. We explained our reasons for suggesting this reduction from three years to 18 months. But the government refused. However, the Minister of Finance managed to move an amendment to clause 46, which reads as follows:

(6) Where, at any time after March 31, 1977 and before July 1, 1977, a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons, signed by not less than 50 members of the House, is filed with the Speaker to the effect that this Act shall expire on a date before December 31, 1978 that is specified in the motion, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the motion is filed that the House is sitting, in accordance with the Rules of the House, take up and consider the motion, and if the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House, this Act expires on the date that is specified in the motion.

This is the Trojan horse that the Minister of Finance wanted to sell to us by saying that, to tone down the legislation, if between March 31, 1977, and July 1, 1977, at least 50 members of Parliament sign a motion saying that they want to reassess the law, this motion will immediately be filed with the Speaker to be examined by the House. But, with their majority, how can the government accept this? It is obvious that even if 50 members of Parliament produced such a motion before the House, it would not be accepted by the majority government in the House of Commons. I therefore say that the Minister of Finance wanted to play a trick on us.

During the discussion on the White Paper, we said that it was obvious that small wage earners would again have to pay, and this afternoon, my colleague, Senator Smith (Colchester) raised certain questions which will be dealt with later by my colleagues on this side of the House. Under Bill C-73, companies with 500 employees are subject to the legislation, as well as construction companies with at least 20 employees. But the other companies with only 200, 100 or 50 employees and which are not construction companies will not be subject to the law.

● (1540)

[English]

Senator Perrault: They come under the guidelines.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I see no provision in the legislation which would allow the Anti-Inflation Board to deal with companies having 300 or 400 employees or even those having 500 employees. However, if these people work for a construction company having 20 employees, they will be subject to the legislation. The Leader of the Government will say that the government will catch them through their income; it will catch them indirectly because they will not be allowed this or that increase. But if they work for a company having 400 employees, which is just as important, they will not be subject to the legislation. We shall need more details from the government members before we can make a decision on this legislation.

[English]

Senator Perrault: It is possible.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Very well.

This afternoon, Senator Smith (Colchester) asked a few questions concerning the professional people. How will we control the income of doctors, architects, lawyers, engineers? How will we do this? We would like to know this afternoon whether the provinces will also cooperate and set up control boards. But until now I have not noted any large-scale cooperation on the part of the provinces. The provinces have not yet committed themselves. They have not yet started setting up their control boards. The Leader of the Government says yes. In any case, not in my province, not in Quebec; it was done in Ontario before the legislation was introduced, but since the bill was introduced in the House the provincial governments have refused to do so and have indicated that they are against this legislation. I understand that the provincial governments do not want to commit themselves in setting up immediately their own control boards and control mechanisms without knowing what regulations the government will introduce, because otherwise they will be acting haphazardly.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Is he prepared to name any one province which has expressed outright opposition to the guideline program?

Senator Asselin: I am not talking about the guidelines; I am talking about the law. They are not the same. We are studying the law today. Two weeks ago you tabled the guidelines in the Senate, and we discussed the guidelines. We have to make a distinction between the guidelines and the law. Today we are studying Bill C-73, and we are not studying the guidelines proposed by the government.

Senator Perrault: The same consideration applies. I think it is rather a mischievous suggestion for the senator to make. There is no provincial government which has expressed outright opposition to the guidelines or the law.

[Senator Asselin.]

Some have put forward suggestions for change and improvement, as we should be doing in this chamber.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The ministers of provincial governments were asked whether they had already established control systems, except the minister of the province of British Columbia, where it has been done already because an election is to take place there soon and the Barrett government was anxious to attract votes. Let anyone name one provincial government that has already established a system of control for professionals. Can the government leader name one? If he will not answer, I shall ask him a question.

[English]

Senator Perrault: I do not want to engage in an argument.

Senator Grosart: Is this a question?

Senator Perrault: I am listening with rapt attention to the honourable senator's speech, and I do not want to enter into a debate with him. But I earnestly seek to enable him to understand how the anti-inflation program is to work with the provinces. Some provinces have a different approach to the federal guidelines than have other provinces. Some may elect to establish their own boards, and others may elect to have the federal board enforce the guidelines in their respective provinces. I am suggesting we are in an evolutionary stage with respect to implementation.

Senator Grosart: And I am wondering if the Leader of the Government is aware that we have a rule in the Senate that a senator may not speak twice on the same subject. He was not asking a question.

Senator Perrault: I hope the honourable senator's amplification equipment is working properly. I was asked to make an observation, and I always endeavour to respond to requests of that kind.

Senator Grosart: You are breaking the rules all the same.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: My answer to the government leader is that I think my statement is clear. I said and I repeat that provincial governments as yet have not set up any control systems under their jurisdiction. Some provinces may want to trust the federal board to implement guidelines in their territories. I hope those provinces will think it over before transferring to the federal government jurisdictions which are their own, because once those jurisdictions have been transferred to the federal government we know from past experience the provinces will never recover them. I therefore urge the provinces which want to set up a control system to do it themselves in their territories and under their own jurisdiction. Let them set up their own control boards with their own funds, let them not beg for federal grants besides using the federal system to control matters under provincial jurisdictions.

As I said in the beginning, it is evident that this legislation will create social injustices, an alarming unrest and climate, particularly among the middle classes, specially labour. Of course, as much as the government members, we in the Opposition do not condone the irresponsible attitude of a few labour leaders who urge their members to go on a general strike to protest against the law. We appeal to the common sense of labour leaders and of their members in order that they do not go on a general strike because the economic situation could grow worse. Today it has been announced that they had voted $500,000 to launch a general strike and to fight the anti-inflation legislation. The QLF is now holding its convention in the province of Quebec and the workers were asked to pass a resolution endorsing a general strike. However, I am happy to learn that the rank and file have turned down that resolution. They watered it down so much that they said to their leaders: "Before you oppose the law and call a general strike, before protesting against the law, make every possible instance to the federal government".

I believe that it would be useful if the Right Honourable Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance—considering that this watered down resolution was adopted at the QLF convention in Quebec City—were again to ask the labour leaders to meet the federal government to discuss the administration of this legislation in order to convince them that they will do a disservice to their country and to their members if they call a general strike to oppose the law.

We do not suggest that everything in the legislation is bad. We have so many major objections that it will probably be impossible for the members of the Official Opposition in the Senate to vote for it. I say that the bill is unfair and vague in certain fields. It will cause irrevocable damage in certain segments of society. This legislation also comes too late, because the government, in my opinion, has allowed economic conditions to deteriorate for a year while the Opposition claimed it was time to act. It has allowed prices and salaries to increase tremendously without taking the necessary corrective action demanded by the Opposition. That is why I feel it is our duty and responsibility as the Official Opposition to demand more humane legislation, better suited to our economic context, especially if the government leader is more reasonable than the leader in the other place who systematically rejected all the amendments of the Opposition. And if the leader and his team are ready to amend the legislation as suggested either in committee or on second reading, the Opposition might reconsider its position as far as voting is concerned. However, we do not find the bill satisfactory in its present form and we shall therefore assume our responsibilities and vote against it.

● (1550)

[English]

On motion of Senator Austin, debate adjourned.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL SESSION, COPENHAGEN, DENMARK—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator McDonald calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-first Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held in Copenhagen, Denmark, from 21st to 26th September, 1975, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, having been a delegate to the Eighteenth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly in Bonn, Germany, in 1972, and the Twentieth Annual Session in London, England, in 1974, I believe I am in a reasonably good position to assess the performance of the Canadian delegation, of which I was also a member, to the Twenty-first Annual Session in Copenhagen, Denmark, from September 21 to 26 this year. It is my opinion that this was one of the best performances of our delegations, at least in recent years. The principal reason for the better showing of this year's delegation was the fact that over one-half of the members had participated in last year's session and, therefore, possessed some valuable experience.

The delegates from the Senate were the same as last year—Senator A. H. McDonald, Senator Paul Lafond and myself. Such experience is necessary in dealing with the delegations from the European countries, which consist of many members who have been attending these sessions regularly for many years.

Also, this time we displayed much better team-work, under the able chairmanship of Mr. Paul Langlois, M.P., who last year had been elected treasurer of the North Atlantic Assembly. The excellent cooperation of the members of all the political parties in acting as Canadian spokesmen at the committee meetings and in the Assembly proved to be effective.

The United States delegation was rather small and weak this year and ours was comparatively large and strong. As a result, the Canadians emerged from this session with a stronger and more independent image.

I was assigned to the Political Committee, which exercises a powerful role in the North Atlantic Assembly, alongside that of the Military Committee, which was so ably reported on by Senator McDonald. The complex nature of the problems confronting NATO required long, intensive debates and discussions, and the Political Committee had longer sittings than other committees. We had to study reports, some confidential, on the situation in Portugal, Spain, the Middle East and the Eastern Mediterranean. These are the trouble areas for NATO. There were often wide differences of opinion in the approach to controversial problems.

One of these ticklish problems was Portugal, which last year, after the "democratic" revolution, was admitted to NATO. The unstable political situation in that country, now with its sixth government in that brief period, and particularly the aggressive acts of the Communist Party—supported materially by the Soviet Union, about which we received some evidence—is a cause of grave concern to the NATO countries. It is obvious that if the Communist Party got control of the government, Portugal would withdraw from NATO and pose a serious threat to the alliance.

The discussion in committee on the resolution on Portugal was a tense one. The socialist parties of the NATO countries sided with the socialist parties of Portugal, demanding that aid be provided directly to them. The Canadian delegation throughout maintained a democratic stance, opposing the pro-socialist orientation which was actively advocated by the socialist elements in delegations of several countries.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): Would the honourable senator permit a question? When he says "socialist", does he mean "communist"?

Senator Yuzyk: No, the social-democratic parties, not the communist parties. We do not have any communist party represented in the NATO countries as yet.

In the end, our stance was adopted but not by as large a majority in the committee as we would have liked. The resolution which was adopted by the Assembly urges member countries to assist Portugal with the problem of refugees from Angola, to give immediate economic assistance to the country and, —to give encouragement and support to the development of a genuine democratic process in Portugal, in order to give to all democratic parties equal chances for submitting themselves in free elections to the vote of the Portuguese people.

• (1600)

The debate on the resolution on Spain was also a heated one. General Franco's authoritarian government, which had been imposed on the Spanish people for 40 years, and particularly the recent court sentences which violate accepted civil liberties and human rights, came under severe criticism. The Political Committee noted the fact that Spain had been cooperating with the United States in the defence against possible Soviet aggression by allowing U.S. military installations on her soil, and stated that the improvement of relations between the alliance and Spain would be possible only if a democratic change took place in that country. The resolution urges member states of the alliance:

1. to refrain from any move which might be interpreted as a step to further the membership of Spain in the Alliance at the present moment;
2. to make clear that present conditions in Spain undermined all endeavours to improve relations between Spain and the Alliance.

On this question, the Canadian delegation opposed direct interference in Spanish internal affairs, which was advocated by the socialist alignment in the Assembly. In view of the recent developments in Spain, this proved to be a reasonable and far-sighted attitude. When King Juan Carlos assumed the reins of power after Franco's death recently, he announced that he would pursue a policy of gradual democratization and that Spain would apply for membership in NATO.

The resolution on the Middle East was not the subject of a heated debate, although there were differences of opinion on our approach to the Moslem-Christian conflict in Lebanon. It was decided to support the United States efforts, by political and economic means, to bring peace between Israel and Egypt through the Sinai agreement negotiated by the American Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, and that member governments of NATO should "contribute their due share to the stabilization of the situation" inside Lebanon. The main concern here was the negative attitude of the Soviet Union to the Sinai agreement, and the aggressive reaction of some Arab governments.

Much time was spent by the Political Committee in analyzing the situation which is seriously endangering the southeastern flank of the alliance. Under consideration came the possible points of confrontation that exist between the two allied countries, Greece and Turkey, particularly in regard to the precarious situation in Cyprus after the events of the summer of 1974. Because of our substantial participation in the UN peacekeeping forces in Cyprus, the Canadian role of neutrality and the promotion of meaningful negotiations was strongly evident. Members of our delegation talked positively with members of the delegations of both Greece and Turkey, which was greatly appreciated by both parties.

Our efforts helped the chairman of the Political Committee to sit down and discuss matters with the Greek and Turkish delegations, which subsequently forestalled a confrontation in the Assembly. Both the Greek and Turkish delegations supported the resolution in the Assembly, and refrained from discussing the issue on the floor. The resolution is that the Assembly "calls upon all parties concerned to encourage and facilitate the resumption of the inter-communal talks under the auspices of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and to ensure the respect of the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus." An appeal is made to the political leaders of these countries to show "a spirit of reconciliation" and to find a solution to the problem of the refugees.

At two previous sessions of the North Atlantic Assembly, I was active in the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information and, consequently, I took an interest in the work of this committee. Here the main emphasis was on East-West relations, especially in the field of cultural exchanges, the free flow of information and people between the countries of both blocs, and human rights. Until recent years this committee had been the weakest in the Assembly, and in 1972 there was even talk of dissolving it. However the increased role of the Assembly in NATO matters and the consideration of détente gave a new lease to the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information. This year this committee came into greater prominence because of the signing of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe by 35 states in Helsinki, Finland, on August 1. NATO countries had been directly involved in the work of this conference.

Consequently, the Helsinki Agreement was the subject of close scrutiny in the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information, as well as in the Political Committee. Both committees presented recommendations regarding détente, which were similar in content but different in wording and emphasis. The Drafting Committee thereupon tried to resolve this matter by presenting to the plenum a recommendation which was regarded as a compromise, but in reality was a watered-down version of the recommendation of both these committees.

This sparked off a tense debate on the floor of the Assembly. The spokesmen of both committees rejected the version of the recommendation which was presented by the Drafting Committee. Thereupon the chairman of the Assembly, Wayne L. Hays of the United States, asked the chairmen of these committees to agree upon a joint recommendation at the plenum, probably the first solution of its kind in the Assembly.

The joint recommendation was subsequently unanimously adopted by the Assembly. Following a preamble of 12 paragraphs, the North Atlantic Council is urged to "pursue the objective of improving relations with the East" by making better known all aspects of "détente" and recognizing the existence of mutual interests. While deploring the fact that the Soviet Union has refused to accept the principle of balanced force reductions, and regretting the superabundance of conventional forces concentrated by the Warsaw Pact states in Eastern and Central Europe, which "endangers military stability and security in Europe and the progress of détente", the Assembly recommended pressure "with determination for progress in the MBFR talks in Vienna" as well as examination of all possible options.

Three points of the recommendation on East-West relations dealt with the Helsinki Agreement. Great emphasis was placed "on a comprehensive application of the Helsinki Principles", particularly on the free movement of people and information. The agreements and arrangements necessary for carrying out this agreement should be concluded as quickly as possible.

● (1610)

The most important request, however, to the member governments was that they "monitor carefully the implementation of human, cultural, educational and information obligations in the Helsinki Agreement so that a detailed accounting may be presented to the follow-up conference in Belgrade in June 1977."

Senator Forsey: Hear, hear!

Senator Yuzyk: Originally, the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information had proposed that member governments do the monitoring annually and report to the Assembly. Both committees recognized that "détente does not mean an end to deep political and ideological differences, nor the disappearance of areas of super-power competition", but it is at the present time "the only valid alternative to policies of crises and confrontation."

The exact texts of all the resolutions and recommendations—a total of 21—which were adopted by the North Atlantic Assembly at the Twenty-first Annual Session will, no doubt, be of interest to honourable senators and readers of the Debates of the Senate. For that reason, I should like permission to have the texts of the resolutions and recommendations of all five committees published as an appendix to Hansard of today's date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of appendix see pp. 1517-1523)

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, NATO is the bulwark of freedom and democracy in the world, the front line of defence against the aggression of totalitarian, imperialistic powers. Senator McDonald, in his speech in this chamber yesterday, presented us with extremely valuable information about the balance of forces. The power of the Soviet Union has been increasing at an alarmingly rapid pace, surpassing NATO's conventional forces and equipment. The Western democracies are today faced with the greatest threat since the inception of NATO, offset only partially by the rising power of Red China. This is no time for complacency. We must be alert and prepared for the worst eventuality. NATO must not be allowed to be weakened, but must be strengthened in every respect. Consequently, Canada, rich in natural resources but vulnerable, must not lag behind. Our government must commit our country to a greater responsibility and role in the North Atlantic Alliance to keep this world safe for freedom and democracy.

On motion of Senator Lafond, debate adjourned.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTACK ON INFLATION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the White Paper entitled: "Attack on Inflation—a program of national action", together with a booklet giving the highlights of the Government's anti-inflation program, both dated October 14, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 21st October, 1975.—

(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate in the event that some other honourable senator wished to participate in it. However, in light of the fact that we now have Bill C-73 before us, I feel we can consider this inquiry as having been debated.

Senator Flynn: Or is going to be.

Senator Langlois: We have it in a different form.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 8, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1515)

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TEXTS OF RECOMMENDATIONS AND RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL SESSION, COPENHAGEN, DENMARK,
 SEPTEMBER 21 TO 26, 1975

TABLE OF CONTENTS

RECOMMENDATIONS

Economic Committee

45 on co-ordination of national economic policies

Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information

46 on the educational activities of NATO

Military Committee

47 on the restructuring of NATO's forces

48 on the eastern Mediterranean

49 on the rationalization of defence resources within the Alliance

Political Committee and Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information

50 on East-West relations

Scientific and Technical Committee

51 and the NATO Science Committee budget

52 on information on the activities of the Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society (CCMS)

RESOLUTIONS

Economic Committee

30 on the world economic order

31 on economic aid to Portugal, Greece and Turkey

32 on world monetary reform

33 on the co-ordination of national energy policies

Economic Committee, Military Committee, Scientific and Technical Committee

34 on energy supplies within the Atlantic Alliance

Military Committee

35 on the activities of the Eurogroup

36 on the United States arms embargo on Turkey

Political Committee

37 on Portugal

38 on Spain

39 on the Middle East

40 on the Eastern Mediterranean

Scientific and Technical Committee

41 on an international policy for raw materials

42 on nuclear energy

RECOMMENDATION 45

ON CO-ORDINATION OF NATIONAL ECONOMIC POLICIES

The Assembly,

Considering the impact of the world recession on the economies of Alliance member countries;

Deploring the complete lack of co-ordination between different national economic policies, which has further aggravated and prolonged the recession;

Noting the talks between the President of the United States, the President of France, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, during the final session of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in July 1975 in Helsinki, on the necessity of socio-economic consultation and co-operation between their countries;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. urge member governments of the Alliance to pursue the initiative taken by the four countries in Helsinki;
2. encourage all member governments to participate in further talks;
3. co-ordinate in this way the policies of member countries aimed at reanimating their economies and overcoming the recession and its social consequences.

RECOMMENDATION 46

ON THE EDUCATIONAL ACTIVITIES OF NATO

The Assembly,

Considering NATO'S limited activity in the field of education;

Concerned about the capacity of some governments to deal alone with the difficult problems in education today, such as declining enrolments, changing student demands, lack of financial support, and uncertainty about the future;

Recognizing the need for joint effort in various fields of educational policy among the members of the Alliance;

Recognizing also the need for the Alliance to be more than a defensive arrangement;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council consider expanding the activities and responsibilities of its Cultural Relations Section into areas more directly concerned with education.

RECOMMENDATION 47

ON THE RESTRUCTURING OF NATO'S FORCES

The Assembly,

Concerned at the continued improvements in both quality and quantity of Warsaw Pact forces, particularly their offensive capabilities;

Recognizing the economic and social constraints on the defence expenditures of all member countries;

Recognizing the increasing necessity for member countries to review and reassess the structure, composition and priorities of their armed forces, particularly regarding the use of reserve forces;

Concerned lest the unilateral action of one member should affect the cohesion and credibility of the collective defence effort;

Noting the losses, in terms of both finance and combat effectiveness of maintaining logistics as a national responsibility;

Noting the dependence of current NATO strategy on the rapid availability of substantial, combat ready reinforcements;

Noting the implications of the advances in weapon technology for tactical and strategic doctrines;

RECOMMENDS that the Defence Planning Committee of NATO:

1. examine closely the areas where the flexibility and combat capability of NATO's forces remain impaired;
2. emphasize the necessity of the integration of logistic responsibility, and inform the Military Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly of the obstacles inhibiting such a development;
3. examine the advantages to be gained from member countries deploying smaller divisional slices, and the consequent improvements in combat to support ratios;
4. consider the implications for the credibility of the NATO defence posture of a greater reliance on reserve forces, and in this respect inform the Military Committee of the Assembly of the likely effects for the capability of the Alliance of the recent force proposals by Belgium, the Netherlands and the Federal Republic of Germany;
5. urge those member governments considering altering the composition and structure of their forces to seek the maximum commonality with their Allies, and in this respect to inform the Military Committee of the Assembly of the effect on the commonality of command structures of the United Kingdom decision to abolish the brigade level of command;
6. assess whether the present arrangements for the provision of reinforcements, both to the Central Front and the Flanks, are adequate, and examine where improvements can be made;
7. examine the potential offered NATO by the exploitation of recent developments in advanced weapon technology.

RECOMMENDATION 48

ON THE EASTERN MEDITERRANEAN

The Assembly,

Recognizing that the continuing friction between Greece and Turkey damages the cohesion and credibility of the Alliance;

Concerned at the increase in Soviet power and influence in the area, particularly at sea, which has serious complications for the security of the Alliance;

Recognizing that a solution to the present crisis depends on a mutually acceptable settlement on Cyprus;

Regretting that the United States embargo has done nothing to further the prospects of a settlement on Cyprus, and in fact has hindered the possibility of agreement between the two sides;

Noting that the embargo will inevitably limit the effectiveness of the Turkish Armed Forces;

Regretting the Greek withdrawal from the NATO integrated command, and anxious that this decision should be reversed;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. continue to give maximum attention to the problems of the region and to ensure that the framework of the Alliance continues to be available to both parties in order to secure a settlement to the dispute;
2. urge member countries to provide economic assistance to both Greece and Turkey;
3. examine specifically what measures can be taken by European members of the Alliance to assist Turkey to obtain the spare parts and equipment denied her under the embargo;
4. assess and evaluate Soviet policy and objectives in the area and their significance to the future security of the Southern Region.

RECOMMENDATION 49

ON THE RATIONALIZATION OF DEFENCE RESOURCES WITHIN THE ALLIANCE

The Assembly,

Recognising the budgetary constraints which continue to affect the abilities of member countries to sustain defence expenditure;

Concerned at the losses, both in financial terms and in combat effectiveness, to NATO's forces through the consistent failure to standardize equipment, as documented in the Callaghan Report;

Aware of the urgent need for closer Atlantic co-operation in the production and procurement of armaments;

Welcoming the statement in the May Ministerial Communiqué that the Ministers "agreed to pursue within the appropriate machinery the establishment of a two-way street between Europe and North America in defence equipment procurement, in order to promote a more cost effective use of resources and increased standardization of weapon systems";

Welcoming the Culver-Nunn Amendment as an excellent example for all member countries to follow;

Recognising the basic need for a greater harmonization of military doctrine among member countries in order to achieve common tactical concepts which will facilitate greater standardization and interoperability of weapon systems;

Noting that although total standardization is neither possible nor ideal, maximum interoperability is a crucial objective;

RECOMMENDS that the Defence Planning Committee of NATO:

1. give the maximum priority to the establishment of institutional machinery, with full political backing, which will facilitate effective North America-European co-operation in the production and procurement of armaments;
2. urge the Military Committee of NATO to play a more dominant role in the harmonization of military doctrine within the Alliance and in the establishing of common tactical concepts;
3. make full use of the possibilities offered by the F-104 replacement programme for the establishment of joint training and common logistic support;
4. in considering the possible purchase and deployment of an airborne early warning system for Europe, give priority to the full participation by NATO countries in the production and operation of such a system.

RECOMMENDATION 50
ON EAST-WEST RELATIONS

The Assembly,

Welcoming the continuing process of "détente" between East and West as the only valid alternative to policies of crises and confrontation;

Recognizing that the search for peace and stability in Europe is, of necessity, a gradual process which will continue to be affected by reverses and disruptions, as currently seen in certain aspects of United States-Soviet relations;

Emphasizing that "détente" is not a static condition but an evolutionary process that will require considerable patience and perseverance to reduce the hostility and suspicion still prevalent in both East and West;

Recognizing that "détente" does not mean an end to deep political and ideological differences, nor the disappearance of areas of super-power competition;

Believing, however, that there are many areas of common interest where co-operation and co-ordination can contribute to producing a more stable and peaceful environment;

Emphasizing that, therefore, "détente" urges moderation and restraint on all States while resolving controversial problems and conflicts between themselves and among others, as well as step by step liquidation of sources of tension;

Urging that the declarations adopted at the final session of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe in Helsinki should be applied by all participant States fully and without reservation;

Mindful of the decision of the Sub-Committee on the Free Flow of Information to study the execution of the Third Basket agreements;

Emphasizing that the new political framework must now be supplemented by progress in the military field, notably by the balanced reductions in the levels of forces and armaments in Central Europe, in order to lower the level of military confrontation and secure a more stable relationship in Europe;

Regretting that the superabundance of conventional forces concentrated by the Warsaw Pact member States, in Eastern and Central Europe, especially by the Soviet Union, endangers military stability and security in Europe and the progress of détente;

Deploing that the Soviet Union so far has refused to accept the principle of balanced force reductions at the Vienna talks;

Recognizing the importance of "détente" to the countries of Eastern Europe, particularly with respect to the full application of human rights and the right of self-determination in this area;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. pursue the objective of improving relations with the East on an energetic and constructive basis, and make better known all aspects of "détente";
2. recognise the existence of mutual interests between East and West and search for fields in which a commonality of interests with countries in Eastern Europe can be constructed;
3. insist on a comprehensive application of the Helsinki principles particularly regarding those clauses concerned with the free movement of people and information;
4. request member governments to monitor carefully the implementation of the human, cultural, educational and information obligations in the Helsinki Agreement so that a detailed accounting may be presented to the follow-up conference in Belgrade in June 1977;
5. emphasize the importance of concluding as quickly as possible the agreements and arrangements necessary for carrying out the Helsinki Agreement;
6. press with determination for progress in the MBFR talks in Vienna, and examine all possible options in order to secure this progress.

RECOMMENDATION 51
ON THE NATO SCIENCE COMMITTEE BUDGET

The Assembly,

Considering the evolution of the NATO Science Committee budget over the last five years;

Noting that the average annual increase in the budget has been 4.15%, whereas the average annual price index increase of combined Alliance countries has been 11.02%;

Underlining the success of the work of the NATO Science Committee and its recent developments, particularly in providing opportunities for the interchange of young scientists within the Atlantic Community, and its outstanding efforts in improving the environment within the countries of the Alliance;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. study the budgetary problems of the Science Committee;
2. improve the budget for the coming years, taking into account the losses over the last five years.

RECOMMENDATION 52

ON INFORMATION ON THE ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE CHALLENGES OF MODERN SOCIETY (CCMS)

The Assembly,

Appreciative of the increasing interest on the part of the governments of Alliance member countries in the work of the Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society particularly in the pilot studies on energy;

Noting that follow-up action to the work of the Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society, is still far from being satisfactory;

Stressing that the distribution of information to the public in member countries of the Alliance on the work of the Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society should be improved;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. study most attentively the follow-up given to the recommendations and resolutions formulated by the Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society and adopted by the Council;
2. provide the Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society with increased resources to enable it to publish more widely the results it has achieved.

RESOLUTION 30

ON THE WORLD ECONOMIC ORDER

The Assembly,

Considering the world-wide discussion concerning the current world economic order and the necessity for improvement;

Deploring the fact that the gap between rich and poor countries continues to grow;

Aware of the profound interdependence of relations between industrialized and developing countries;

Stressing that no one will benefit from confrontation and unilateral action;

Convinced that centrally administered economies, cartels and syndicates cannot provide a key to change in the world economic system, but will only lead to a bureaucratization of the world economy and to the "distribution" of poverty;

Desirous to find, in co-operation with the developing world, a joint basis for new economic growth for all countries and an economic system in which the world economic product is distributed in a more just and equitable way;

URGES the member governments of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to co-ordinate their attitudes in world-wide negotiations as much as possible and to speak increasingly with one voice;
2. to offer developing countries substantial improvements in their economic relations with industrialized countries, based on the example of the Lomé Convention between the European Economic Community and ACP countries (Africa, Caribbean, Pacific);
3. in particular, provided that the developing countries have the political will to diversify their own economies, to offer a wider opening of industrialized countries' markets for manufactured goods, an effective stabilization scheme for their export earnings, more help for industrialization, more technology transfer and easier access to capital markets.

RESOLUTION 31

ON ECONOMIC AID TO PORTUGAL, GREECE AND TURKEY

The Assembly,

Noting that events in 1974 and 1975 have put Atlantic solidarity to the test and have shown that this solidarity cannot be restricted to mere military co-operation;

Stressing that military attack is not the only possible threat to a country, but that there is also economic decline leading to social and political unrest and to the danger of a take-over by extremists of either side;

Considering the current economic difficulties of Portugal, Greece and Turkey, and in particular problems such as industrialization, modernization of their economies, inflation, unemployment, balance of payments deficits, reliance on emigration and remittances of foreign currencies;

Aware of Portugal's specific problems in passing from dictatorship to democracy, i.e. transforming an old-fashioned economic apparatus, coping with the decolonization process and developing an adequate economic policy;

Mindful of Greece's efforts to overcome the economic consequences of seven years of dictatorship and to integrate its economy into a united Europe;

Aware of Turkey's interest in further developing its economic relations with other Alliance countries and pursuing its successful policy of internal development;

URGES the member governments of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to abandon their shortsighted and politically erroneous wait-and-see attitude vis-à-vis Portugal, and to grant immediate and effective financial help to support the country's process of democratization;
2. to support the international economic integration of Portugal, Greece and Turkey by granting more loans and credits, by further opening national markets for imports from these three countries, and by encouraging investment to create new jobs in these countries.

RESOLUTIONS 32

ON WORLD MONETARY REFORM

The Assembly,

Noting the different steps taken so far to reform the world monetary system, in particular the recent decision to demonetize gold and the consequent prevention of gold producers from being able in the future to manipulate the gold price and thus influence the value of currencies;

Regretting, however, that a coherent and comprehensive reform of the whole system has still not been accomplished;

URGES the member governments of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to complete the reform of the world monetary system as soon as possible and thus encourage a quick recovery of world trade and the world economy through the provision of a stable monetary framework;

2. for this purpose, to urge a return to fixed but adjustable exchange rates for currencies.

RESOLUTION 33

ON THE CO-ORDINATION OF NATIONAL ENERGY POLICIES

The Assembly,

Examining the economic implications of national energy policies at the national as well as the international level;

Mindful of the fact that any decision on energy policy requires a political examination of the options and priorities;

URGES the member governments of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to study carefully the impact of any national energy policy on other policy areas such as cost, price and rent policy, social policy, environmental policy, external trade policy;
2. to co-ordinate and harmonize energy policies at international level.

RESOLUTION 34

ON ENERGY SUPPLIES WITHIN THE ATLANTIC ALLIANCE

The Assembly,

Recognizing the useful work done by the Joint Sub-Committee on Energy Supplies;

Noting that the overall economic problems of energy supplies continue to be serious;

Emphasizing that the problem of the oil-producing countries' surplus amounts is far from being solved and that there is still a clear interest in consuming countries of ensuring a massive reflow of this money;

Hoping that the forthcoming consumer-producer conference will lead to fruitful co-operation;

Considering the possible contributions of science and technology to ensuring long-term supplies through decreases in energy demand, increased supplies, and improved energy carriers;

Mindful of the political and military problems and implications involved in securing energy supplies, in particular the safeguarding of import and supply routes, and the protection of North Sea Oil;

URGES the member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to provide more incentives for those oil producing countries having a surplus to invest in consuming countries, and to abstain from discriminating investment controls;
2. to intensify energy research and development programmes, existing energy conservation schemes, diversification of the supply side and measures to improve energy carriers;
3. to study in depth the problem of effecting a better security of energy supply routes.

RESOLUTION 35

ON THE ACTIVITIES OF THE EUROGROUP

The Assembly,

Welcoming the recent initiatives towards establishing an effective two-way street between the United States, Canada and Europe in the production and procurement of armaments;

Recognizing that this policy will only be successful if a co-ordinated European approach is established, and that the Eurogroup represents the most appropriate forum in which to establish this co-ordination;

Welcoming the increased Ministerial involvement in the working of the Eurogroup,

Noting the continued progress of the M.R.C.A. project as an example of successful European co-operation in the field of advanced aeronautical technology;

Noting the importance of parliamentary support for the objectives and activities of the Eurogroup;

Regretting the continued refusal of France to associate herself with the activities of the Eurogroup;

URGES:

1. the member governments of the Eurogroup to utilize the framework of the Group to achieve the institutionalization of a European component, a European Armaments Agency, on which effective co-operation between Europe, the United States and Canada in the production and procurement of armaments could be based;
2. the member governments of the Eurogroup, to facilitate greater parliamentary awareness of the objectives and workings of the Eurogroup;
3. the governments of the Fed. Rep. of Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom to pursue the M.R.C.A. programme to its maximum potential, and thus maintain the technological base essential for future European projects.

RESOLUTION 36

ON THE UNITED STATES ARMS EMBARGO ON TURKEY

The Assembly,

Concerned at the present situation in the Eastern Mediterranean and the continuing friction between Greece and Turkey;

Recognizing that as both Greece and Turkey are closely involved with, and committed to, events in Cyprus any lasting reconciliation between the two countries must be preceded by a mutually acceptable solution on the island;

Appreciating the genuine concern of many United States Congressional figures that United States arms should not be used in an offensive fashion by one NATO ally against another;

Believing, nevertheless, that the United States Embargo has introduced an external factor into Greek-Turkish relations that has served to distract and complicate existing differences, and represents a very real constraint on progress towards a settlement;

URGES the United States Congress to immediately lift the present arms embargo on Turkey.

RESOLUTION 37

ON PORTUGAL

The Assembly,

Welcoming the fact that the Portuguese people after 48 years of dictatorship have the opportunity for achieving the transition to parliamentary democracy;

Concerned at the rapidly worsening economic condition of the country which must inevitably give rise to social unrest, and which could be accentuated by the return of large numbers of settlers from Angola;

Welcoming recent developments which indicate a swing to forces which respect democracy in Portugal;

Emphasizing that present conditions call for immediate and effective action and support, particularly in the form of economic assistance, from the Alliance countries and the European Community;

Concerned that the reluctant and apprehensive attitude of most Western countries could contribute to an eventual polarization of forces in Portugal, and produce a situation extremely disadvantageous to the Alliance;

URGES member countries:

1. to assist Portugal in dealing with the serious problems caused by the influx of refugees from Angola;
2. to give immediate economic assistance to Portugal in order to help solve the country's economic and social problems;
3. to give encouragement and support to the development of a genuine democratic process in Portugal, in order to give to all democratic parties equal chances for submitting themselves in free elections to the vote of the Portuguese people.

RESOLUTION 38

ON SPAIN

The Assembly,

Stressing the criticism of the authoritarian character of the present political régime in Spain imposed on the Spanish people 40 years ago;

Protesting against the recent court sentences which massively violate generally accepted civil liberties and human rights;

Confirming the opinion that the improvement of relations between the Alliance and Spain includes the demand for a democratic change in Spain;

Expressing full sympathy with all forces of Spanish society which strive for full parliamentary democracy;

Encouraging these democratic forces to continue their endeavours to improve political conditions in Spain;

URGES member States of the Alliance:

1. to refrain from any move which might be interpreted as a step to further the membership of Spain in the Alliance at the present moment;
2. to make clear that present conditions in Spain undermine all endeavours to improve relations between Spain and the Alliance.

RESOLUTION 39

ON THE MIDDLE EAST

The Assembly,

Welcoming the successful negotiations conducted by US Secretary Kissinger between Israel and Egypt culminating in the Sinai agreement;

Emphasizing the need for continued efforts committed to achieving peace in the entire area;

Concerned about the negative attitude of the Soviet Union and the aggressive reaction by some Arab governments to the signing of the agreement between Egypt and Israel;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to support the US and other mediatory efforts by both political and economic means in favour of the signatories to the Sinai agreement;
2. to follow closely developments inside Lebanon and to contribute their due share to the stabilization of the situation.

RESOLUTION 40

ON THE EASTERN MEDITERRANEAN

The Assembly,

Considering the need for reducing as much as possible the number of points of confrontation that still exist between two allied countries, Greece and Turkey;

Noting that the situation created in Cyprus after the events of summer 1974 continues to exist;

Considering that this situation endangers seriously the South-Eastern flank of the Alliance, because of its negative effect on the relations between two member states;

Considering that this situation can only be improved through meaningful negotiations;

CALLS UPON all parties concerned to encourage and facilitate the resumption of the inter-communal talks under the auspices of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and to ensure the respect of the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus;

STRONGLY URGES all parties concerned to refrain, pending a peaceful solution, from any action which might prejudice or render more difficult the inter-communal negotiations;

APPEALS to the political leaders of the countries directly concerned to show a spirit of reconciliation in order to seek urgently a solution to the problem of the refugees.

RESOLUTION 41

ON AN INTERNATIONAL POLICY FOR RAW MATERIALS

The Assembly,

Considering the scientific and technical problems involved in the supply of raw materials to Alliance member countries;

Convinced that the moment has come to establish a better management of the world's resources;

Underlining the necessity for Alliance member countries to adopt a common policy in this field;

URGES the governments of the member countries of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to develop urgently a coherent common policy for raw materials:
 - a) to save raw materials;
 - b) to increase known resources by means of improved detection techniques and a better exploitation of existing resources;
 - c) to seek substitutes for rare materials;
 - d) to improve recycling techniques;
 - e) to increase the life span and the durability of products;
2. to invite the Scientific Directorate of NATO to pay more attention to these problems than hitherto.

RESOLUTION 42

ON NUCLEAR ENERGY

The Assembly,

Aware of the necessity to ensure long-term energy supplies in its member countries;

Aware of the discussion concerning the advantages and disadvantages of nuclear energy;

Taking note of the current impossibility of determining the total demand for energy in ten to fifteen years time and the reserves of non-nuclear energy that can be counted upon;

Concerned at the fast rising costs for nuclear energy, due also to necessary additional security measures to protect nuclear power stations;

URGES the member governments of the Atlantic Alliance:

1. to provide the Parliamentarians as the elected representatives of the people with complete information about the pros and cons of nuclear energy so that the Parliamentarians can help the public to understand and accept the necessary decisions;
2. to start immediately with a thorough review of nuclear policies and to undertake an extensive cost/benefit analysis of nuclear power, taking also into consideration additional costs through radioactive waste disposal, demolition of reactors after use, safety provisions, protection of transports of nuclear materials and radioactive waste, and necessary security precautions.

THE SENATE

Monday, December 8, 1975

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS
MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo), Lapointe and Langlois had been substituted for those of Messrs. Francis, Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) and O'Connell, and that the names of Messrs. Baker (Grenville-Carleton) and Francis had been substituted for those of Messrs. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich) and Daudlin on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

PRIVATE BILL

NORTHLAND BANK—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-1002, to incorporate the Northland Bank.

Bill read first time.

Senator Cameron moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Langlois tabled:

Copies of Report of the Industrial Inquiry Commission under the Canada Labour Code into the Grain Handling Industry in the Vancouver Port Area (The Honourable Mr. Justice E. D. Bayda, Commissioner), dated July 1975.

Report of the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 20(1) of the Atomic Energy Control Act, Chapter A-19, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Saskatchewan concerning federal development assistance to that province.

Report of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 22 of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act, Chapter R-4, R.S.C., 1970.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-74, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Bill read first time.

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

● (1410)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government whether the government has in mind any timetable for the disposition of any of the three bills which have come to us today, either in the Senate chamber or in committees.

Senator Langlois: I am sorry, but I do not have that information at hand. I will inquire and inform the Senate as soon as possible, which will probably be later today.

Senator Grosart: Actually, at the moment I am more interested in the government's plans for dealing with the anti-inflation measure. I am concerned with what the procedure will be this afternoon.

Senator Langlois: As honourable senators are aware, last week the leader informed the Senate that he expected that the bill would be dealt with and passed some time during the course of the present week. He mentioned Thursday or Friday of this week. Apart from that there is little I can add, except to say that I understand there are three senators who wish to speak on the bill this afternoon. It is planned that after the Orders of the Day are exhausted, we will adjourn during pleasure to approximately eight o'clock this evening, at which time we will resume debate on the anti-inflation bill. My information is that we have three speakers who are ready to address themselves to this measure this afternoon and three more this evening.

Senator Grosart: In other words, it is the intention that the debate on this bill this afternoon will be adjourned to later this day.

Senator Langlois: That is quite right.

Senator Grosart: Thank you.

ANTI-INFLATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 4, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for second reading of Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices and dividends and compensation in Canada.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, it is with a deep sense of the public trust which is our joint and several responsibility that I rise to participate for the first time in the deliberations of this chamber.

We are not here to serve ourselves. We are here to serve the people of Canada.

Therefore, my earliest words to my new colleagues in this chamber must be words of commitment: First, to serve the collective interest of all Canadians with every effort and ability I have. Second, to defend and to further the wellbeing of our Confederation and to speak and act against every tendency in our country to irrational regionalism; to speak and act against the insecurities that give rise to separatist feelings amongst us; and to speak and act against attitudes of alienation and disaffection in Canadian society wherever they appear. Third, within the context of a strong and progressive federalism, to advance the real interests of my own province of British Columbia in every way I can fairly do. Fourth, to defend the individual rights of Canadians, however unpopular, and to assert the individual responsibilities of Canadians, however unpopular. Fifth, to support policies that will promote a healthy economy and a fair sharing of the benefits of the Canadian patrimony to all. Sixth, while at all times defending the sovereign rights and interests of Canadians in the world community, yet to remain mindful that we are but one family in the global village and we have both a moral duty and a self-interest to further the wellbeing of all mankind.

While words of public commitment come first, certain personal words are no less important to me. I wish to refer to the Honourable Arthur Laing, whom Prime Minister Trudeau rightly entitled a "good man" at a public banquet in Senator Laing's honour held in Vancouver in September 1974. Arthur Laing served this nation and his province of British Columbia in substantial ways, both in private and business life, and in municipal, provincial and federal politics. He served always with integrity, ability and conviction. He was my friend and teacher. I served with him as his campaign manager in 1962 and 1963; as his executive assistant when he was Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources; and as a supporter and advisor when I was in private law practice. He encouraged me in 1970 to take up the responsibilities of the office of the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and beforehand he had taught me a great deal about the value of our natural resources to the people of Canada, about British Columbia, about Western Canada and about his love of our great northern lands and peoples. Now I stand in his place in the Senate as the senator for Vancouver South. I owe much of my interest in public life to him and I must acknowledge it as I speak here for the first time.

● (1420)

The Senate, I hope, will allow me a few additional personal words. I believe this country has at its head one of the most capable and knowledgeable political leaders in the world today. I left my duties as a deputy minister and the relative political obscurity and security of the public service in May 1974, shortly after the defeat of the government in the House of Commons, to become principal secretary to the Prime Minister, because I felt totally convinced of Canada's need for the continued contribution of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau as Prime Minister. He has been a unifier and a healer in times of national dissention, as I had the privilege of seeing so clearly during the 1973-74 energy crisis, and again during the first ministers' negotiations on oil and gas pricing this spring. His work in binding together the Canadian family during the stresses of October 1970 shows the quality of his leadership. His work in linking together in the minds of the Canadian family their essential political, social and economic interests is the critical work of our time. Canadian political democracy is strong, as strong as that in any of the world's democracies, because of his talents in understanding and defending the democratic process. Some have called my appointment to the Senate a partisan appointment. I affirm without hesitation that it is the appointment of a man who is a partisan of the Prime Minister and his goals for service to the people of Canada.

Madam Speaker and honourable senators, I express my thanks to you for your generous welcome on my first day in this chamber on November 5 last. I have special pleasure in serving here under Senator Raymond Perrault, and with Senator George van Roggen, who have been my colleagues in many activities on behalf of British Columbia over nearly 20 years. I express pleasure too in serving again with the Honourable J. J. Greene, who was my minister at one time. The highest art of politics is to lead while appearing to follow. Senator Greene practised this art well as minister and again in his kind remarks about me on November 5. I thank Senator Flynn for the encouragement he showed me in his welcome.

I have come to the Senate believing the Senate has a vital and constructive role to play on behalf of our democratic Canadian society. In the short time I have been here I recognize the dedication of my new Senate colleagues to the developing maturity of public life. I very much hope that my past experiences, particularly my years as a senior government official, will permit me to make a useful contribution to the legislative process and to the policy deliberations of the Senate. I want to assure my fellow senators of my enthusiasm for my participation in a dynamic and creative Senate. I thank you for your patience in listening to these general remarks and I shall now confine myself to the specific topic of this debate.

We have before us Bill C-73, the "Anti-Inflation Act." The preamble to the bill says it all very clearly:

inflation in Canada at current levels is contrary to the interests of all Canadians and . . . the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern . . .

No right thinking Canadian can deny the seriousness of the problem of inflation, the need to understand its underlying causes and the need to take measures at this time to prevent inflation from impairing our society and our economy.

Senator Perrault provided this chamber on December 4 last with a comprehensive review of the anti-inflation program in its objectives and in its methods. I support this bill for the reasons given by Senator Perrault, and believe in the strongest terms that the failure of this anti-inflation measure to capture the support and confidence of the Canadian people will lead inevitably, if our economy continues to deteriorate, to the government of the day, whatever its political predilections, introducing such massive measures of discipline and interference with the market economy as perhaps to alter permanently the character of Canadian society and the role of government in our individual lives.

Senator Asselin spoke last Thursday about the unusual degree of involvement of government in the economy during peacetime which is introduced by Bill C-73. The point is that it is not now peacetime. Of course, we are not at war in a military sense, but just as surely we are at war in an economic sense. The apprehended danger is to the security of our society and our willingness to live in peace and good order with one another. It is a civil war in economic and social terms. The enemy is ourselves. The enemy within us attacks society with demands for "more," the famous adversary objective of Samuel Gompers of the North American labour movement and, of course, the same objective of every other player in our economic society. The weapon of defence is "self-restraint" and the concern for one another embodied in the most fundamental precept of Judeo-Christian ethics; we are our brother's keeper and he is our keeper, each equally to be concerned for the other.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to repeat what Senator Perrault has said to us about the bill nor to examine its detailed provisions here in any way. This we will do in committee. What I do wish is to examine some of the underlying questions which this bill raises about ourselves and to touch on a very few key concerns.

Canadian society today is characterized by a rising population, greater expectations on the part of our people for a more affluent life and a greater degree of organized and institutionalized advocacy by people who find common cause to combine in their self-interest. A growing population and greater expectations from all of us naturally demand more from our resources, more energy and raw materials, more food production and industrial goods. And all of this places a greater load on our environment, its capacity to supply and its ability to clean up the mess we make before we foul our own nest.

Our methods of production are increasingly technically complex and we have as a consequence a high and still rising division of labour. In a real sense, then, we are becoming more interdependent. As the level of our education rises and our skills increase we learn, each of us in society, to make a deeper, more qualitative contribution but also a narrower one. Each of us knows more and more about an ever-diminishing part of society because the whole spectrum is increasing so quickly.

But the peculiarity of our behaviour is that though we grow more interdependent, relying on others to provide us with so many vital goods and services, we also become more adversary, more hostile to one another, more competitive about the value of our individual contributions. The value and importance of the social qualities of our lives, family, kinships, community, friends, the nation, are disappearing under the attack of our economic self-interest. More and more people are identifying with those with whom they have a common economic claim on society, though not necessarily a common economic or social responsibility. More and more people are organized into institutions which get bigger and more powerful. As these institutions deal in a competitive way with one another their conflict causes deeper and deeper divisions within society. What becomes involved in conflict is not just a wage claim or an item of management authority but the prestige of the organization, the credibility of its leaders, the pride of belonging of its members—being top dog on its societal and economic street in the Canadian neighbourhood.

With increasing economic specialization of our interests, with more formal and organized and institutionalized advocacy of our economic interests, the interactions of people are made public and articulate, rather than conducted in the context of the immediate community and its needs. With this increasing specialization of interest we are in danger of losing in Canada the paramount concept of the general good—of the public interest of us all—of an interest not just economic but comprehending of societal and inter-personal, moral and religious values as well. Specialized interest means that institutions, whether business or labour, promote narrow interests and those interests must succeed for the sake of the welfare of the institution. Is it any wonder that our national sense of purpose is confused, that the pursuit by this government of a voluntary consensus has failed? Where we lose a common concept of ourselves as a community, our consensus diminishes, and our confusion of aims grows larger.

● (1430)

But why is it that our technology makes us more interdependent and more hostile to one another at the same time? I believe it is because the techniques of our industrial production are concentrating wealth and control of economic power ever more narrowly so that fewer and fewer people in our society feel worthwhile as individuals to the community as a whole. While in modern times the role of government has been to try to balance on the side of the individual, all too often government seems distant, uncaring in a personal sense and sometimes through administrative foul-ups, downright hostile.

I have talked about the economic institutionalization of our society because its present structure has led directly to the need for the intervention of government through the introduction of Bill C-73 as a measure on behalf of the common good. But one of the great challenges that faces the Canadian community and the governments that represent us is the challenge of creating a society in which the well-being of the individual and his sense of individual value is regarded as the reason for the organization of society into governments and other institutions. In other words, let us not fall into the error of believing that individuals are created to serve institutions. I mean this whether we are talking about employees of corporations or members of trade unions. Let us have the wit to maximize the benefits of institutions in our lives without becoming their slaves.

What about the role of the state? If government has grown in recent years, and I refer to all levels, then it is largely because we have been getting what we want from government. In a democratic state it is impossible for government not to respond to the decisions society is taking about its needs and nature. Total government spending at all levels has expanded rapidly in the 1960s and 1970s in order to provide the social security services which the great majority of our people approve and desire. We were able to do these things in an economy moving through an unparalleled rate of growth both in real terms and over time. For three decades governments have had a fiscal dividend, an income based on real economic growth in the community, to distribute to the poor, the sick, the young, the unemployed, the disadvantaged regions and to invest in industrial and resource growth. In an important way we have financed this new wealth by a high rate of use of our natural resources and by low resource costs, particularly low energy costs.

The onset of the energy crisis in 1973, based on rapid price increases and political control of supply by the international oil producers cartel, while adding to a worldwide wave of inflation, has also had the effect of reminding us in time of some verities about ourselves and our future. We have had rapid growth in our economy because we were able to run through some cheap resources and because we were able to benefit from more efficient technologies developed since World War II. Inflation and its inevitable companion, recession, are grim reminders to us to get ourselves under control or perish.

We face in the short run the strains that are imposed on our political system when growth in GNP stops or slows because our revenues as a state are no longer sufficient to keep pace with the public demands on them. We are at the stage where the financial capacity of governments is diminishing but the people's expectations, fueled by unparalleled fulfilment for 30 years, have not ceased to grow. In the long run we face the problem of accelerated depletion of natural resources in a world where economic resources are scarce and demands are growing from nations who have never enjoyed what they see we enjoy and who believe their entitlement is no less than ours.

The 1974 election may just be the last election to be fought on issues which are those of a growth economy. The realities of our future seem to be a society in which growth is slow and hard fought, but if we manage well will still be sufficient to do the essential social development and economic growth tasks we must do to maintain an equitable sharing amongst Canadians.

The underlying reality of Bill C-73 is that governments will have to face and set limits to their growth. This requires a restraint on the part of the electorate; it requires that people abandon their demands that government redress the impact of all social and economic inequalities as they affect them personally. Each of us must come to realize that the state cannot be the forum for the immediate fulfilment of every private and group want. We will have to become more tolerant and less demanding, more the conciliator, less the advocate.

● (1440)

We cannot avoid asking ourselves what kind of a society we want. Do we want a society in which we offer each member equality of opportunity and look to the state to establish minimum conditions below which no one falls and which are consistent with human needs and dignity as we all understand them or do we want a society in which we prescribe as our objective equality of condition so that the state sets all the conditions for individuals as well? Equality of opportunity or equality of condition? Should responsibility for ourselves be with ourselves first as individuals and second as a community, or should it be first as a community and secondly as individuals? My choice, the choice of a liberal, must be with the paramountcy of the individual both as to rights and as to responsibilities.

Do we want a state which satisfies public needs, or a state which is an arena for the advocacy of private and group wants? Needs are limited but wants are boundless. If the role of the state is to meet all wants filed with it, the claims upon society's resources will grow as boundlessly as the imagination which all our self-serving communities can derive.

In the service of such wants, the government will grow until it threatens the private initiative which fuels our society's productive capacity to service needs. In the service of needs, the government serves us all and gives us the equality of opportunity which promotes initiative and the willingness of each person to claim no greater right than each is willing to absorb of social and economic responsibilities, including productivity.

The idea of a society of entitlement must be attacked by all of us head on. We have tough decisions ahead of us—curtailment of our expectations as a society, retrenchment and reallocation of both private and government resources. These steps must be taken and seen to be taken with an equity of burden to all Canadians. That is a clear goal of Bill C-73 and its administration; that is a clear goal for the survival of a free democratic society of opportunity.

Honourable senators, we are all in public life and we, along with our colleagues in public life everywhere, are caught in the crisis of the democratic politician as we are torn between the expectations of our society for a constantly increasing standard of living and the ability of the system to produce that standard of living for the people.

What is our role? Surely not to fool the people into believing there are no limits to their expectations or to the services government can provide. Surely not to fool the people into believing that whatever share of the economic pie they want, they can have.

We in the Senate should have no fear of speaking about the dangers to our country's future; no fear that if we do not cater to the popular political will, we will be silenced politically. Indeed, the essential justification for being an appointive body is that we will tell the people not what they may want to hear today but what they will wish they were told today when it is tomorrow.

We must tell the Canadian people that Canada's resources are plentiful but not boundless, expensive but not prohibitive; that Canada's population is well served and can be better served, but cannot be extravagantly served; that the politician's role is to harmonize society, not exacerbate it; to serve it, not to dominate it; that the citizen's role is to be watchful of his rights and to exercise those rights within the context of his responsibilities to this community.

The essential assumption of growth has underlain the economic theory of Adam Smith and of John Maynard Keynes, and the political theory of Locke. This assumption of growth is no longer to be taken for granted. This being so, the politician and government are thrust into an entirely new position—not just distributing the fiscal surplus but trying to decide how to split up the existing economic pie, the wealth that has already vested in some part of society. We as politicians have even more tension, conflict, and even bitterness, to deal with in the country's political future and a more effective need than ever before for the development of the strengths that hold the Canadian people together as well as a determined fight to resist the strains that would pull us apart.

Our society has relied on the efficacy of the marketplace to distribute goods and services at a fair cost to us all. The marketplace concept is fundamental to our rights and liberties as we know them. It underlies the importance of individual initiative and reward for constructive conduct. It also underlies the essential need for rules and self discipline. The marketplace can only work where competitors agree to maintain order. The players obey because predictability of conduct is in the collective interest. The law codifies the public understanding of correct behaviour.

One of the fundamental assumptions which has underlain the classic economic theory of the marketplace is that man was a self-disciplining, self-regulating Calvinist. In recent times that part of the picture seems to have been forgotten, and we are in danger of replacing it with the picture of man as an unlimited consumer of material goods. Hardly flattering!

After 350 years of industrial revolution and constitutional development we are now in our history at a stage where the two assumptions I have spoken of, first the assumption of material growth and secondly of a basically Calvinist economic man, are no longer axiomatic. We are going to have to defend those tenets or replace them. We will have to ensure growth and equitable sharing by the self-discipline of each of us in the marketplace and in our demands on government. Or if the marketplace is no longer seen as the regulator of the division of wealth in society, supervised of course by the countervailing force of government acting to achieve an equitable balance, then what will replace it as the regulator of the division of wealth in society?

The only other acceptable regulator spoken about appears to be government. But government has no theory of value which will legitimate its decisions in this regard. How will government decide what a person is worth to society? Even if it could, would it be a democratic government in the sense that we know and value democracy?

The constant growth of real wealth has previously disguised the nature of this problem, now this crisis, from us. Now it is upon us.

Our democratic society faces a major challenge to our survival. Bill C-73 is a democratic society's answer. It must be passed. We can assure that. It must be successful. Only the people of Canada can assure that. Our task is to explain the need to the people so that they can decide in the knowledge of what choice they make.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, my first words must be to offer my very warm congratulations to the Honourable Senator Austin. I offer him my very warm congratulations on his eloquence, the carefully thought-out expression of his philosophy, and the very interesting way in which he said what he had to say to us.

[Senator Austin.]

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Smith (Colchester): I know that he would not expect me to agree with everything he said, and perhaps as I go along further today he will be able to detect where some of those disagreements may lie without my directing my remarks towards him and what he said. I wish him a long, fruitful and happy sojourn in this house, and will look forward to continuing to work with him.

Honourable senators, I know you are all familiar with the provisions of this bill, but perhaps you will bear with me for a moment or two while I review its general scheme of things as a background for what I propose to say. The bill, of course, is merely a skeleton upon which we are asked to authorize the government to mold the flesh by making regulations. The whole essence of the program authorized, or intended to be authorized, by the bill is the making by regulations of guidelines which people are to follow.

The bill defines certain organizations, groups and people to which and to whom the guidelines will apply, but then it adds a catch-all provision to make it possible to include any suppliers of commodities or services in the private sector and their employees whose activities may, for any reason, be considered:

of such strategic importance to the containment and reduction of inflation in Canada as to warrant . . .

the regulations including them. This, of course, means that almost anybody who is in the work force can be brought under the regulations which the government in its wisdom, or perhaps even its lack of wisdom, may wish to make.

When the guidelines are finally established, it is the duty of an organization authorized by the bill, a board called the Anti-Inflation Board, to watch over us all to see that the guidelines are followed. If the board finds that they are not being followed, its duty will be to try, by persuasion, to correct the matter. If it cannot do so, then it is to refer the question to an official whose appointment, duties and responsibilities are authorized by the bill, called the administrator. The administrator has wide powers to make orders, impose penalties and make searches of any premises anywhere in the country for anything he wants which he thinks he might like to have to investigate any problem that is before him. There is an appeal from the administrator to what is called in the bill the Anti-Inflation Appeal Tribunal, and a further appeal from that tribunal to the Federal Court of Appeal under section 28 of the Federal Court Act.

It is at once apparent that the whole program under the bill flows from the guidelines, and that the guidelines are made by regulations. Without those guidelines and without those regulations there would be no program. Everything I say, flows, not from the legislation which will be passed by Parliament but from the regulations that will be made by the Governor in Council. Like all regulations, so long as the government that made them is in office that government can change them if, when, as often and to what extent it wants.

At this point I want to say that though I propose to be critical of this bill, if it becomes law I propose to obey it, and I hope all Canadians will do the same. Surely we all know that defiance of the law soon leads to anarchy. I thoroughly dislike many things about this bill, as I shall say, and I know many others do. Nevertheless, I point out to those who would defy it that they would be setting an example they would very likely live to regret, and regret very deeply, and which might well lead some to defy a law which they themselves now rely upon to protect their own freedoms, their own rights and their own privileges.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I shall also feel compelled to vote against the bill in its present form. However, if it can be improved sufficiently in its legislative course through the Senate I would be prepared to support it. In any event, I want to make it very clear that I believe that some program of controls is needed now, and indeed has been needed since early 1974.

A moment ago I mentioned that the program proposed by this bill depends entirely on regulations. While I do not want to be repetitive, because I mentioned this point in the first and only other speech I have made in this house, I am again moved to say that here is another bill which leaves to regulations the most important portions of the policy it is designed to implement and which we are asked to impose upon the Canadian people. We are asked to consider the bill without the regulations before us, and with a very modest amount of information about what they will contain, though I know, of course, we have the White Paper which was tabled by the Leader of the Government and debated in this house. We are simply asked to give the government a blank authority to do as it likes by regulation over a very wide field, I think far too wide, as I shall point out later. To me, this procedure of placing before us a skeleton and leaving to the Government the right to build it and mold it in its own likeness, or any likeness it may desire, is a most objectionable procedure. It is a procedure which should not be accepted without the most vigorous protest.

● (1450)

The argument that regulations cannot be made until the bill becomes law is, I respectfully submit, no defence at all. It is perfectly proper and altogether desirable to place before Parliament a draft of regulations proposed to be made under the bill. Parliament would thus know how the power it is asked to grant would be exercised, and would be in a much better position to make an informed judgment as to whether it should pass or amend the bill.

It would appear to me that up to date the most noticeable effect of the pronouncements about this bill by the ministers and officials is one of widespread confusion. Their comments indicate that the only certainty so far is that they do not know how the bill will work, whether it will work, and what methods they will use to try to make it work. One has only to read the evidence given and the remarks made in the other place by the Minister of Finance and officials—who are now operating under the Inquiries Act, but are designated to be the senior officers of the board—to realize they are in a basic state of uncertainty about the most fundamental things related to the program.

Many questions were directed to these people by a committee of the other place. The theme running through nearly all the replies was to the general effect of, "We will have to wait for the regulations to find out," or, "We do not know," or "That will be a matter for the minister in charge." Even the chairman-designate said there were some uncertainties which kept him awake at night. I do not wish to interfere with his proper rest in order that he prepare himself for the onerous task at hand. However, I think it would be a very good thing if he and a lot of other people lost a good deal of sleep in trying to straighten out the inequities that appear in this bill.

Honourable senators, this surely is a sad state of confusion to exist for so many weeks after the policy was announced October 13 last. It clearly demonstrates to me that the problems have not yet been thought through, and that Parliament is simply being asked to accept something that still remains an unknown in large measure to its sponsors.

Other matters of interest emerge from this questioning in the other place. For instance, the Minister of Finance is shown to have said in a report of one of the committees that perhaps the bill will be in effect beyond December 31, 1978. And in a report of the proceedings of the next day he said, among other things, that perhaps eighteen months would be sufficient, and that if after eighteen months there is a considerable reduction in the rate of inflation, the controls could be ended—which he would be happy to see.

The chairman-designate of the Anti-Inflation Board said he wished, purely from a selfish point of view, that there had been an initial freezing of wages and prices in order to permit his board an opportunity to organize themselves and see what they had to face, and how they might go about it. The vice chairman-designate, on the same page, is reported to have said that such a freeze would have a much larger effect on the public generally, and would have helped the board to get its organization into place.

Honourable senators, just to add to the confusion, it seems that the Prime Minister and the chairman-designate have had some interesting moments in trying to get together on the interpretation of a statement that the chairman-designate is supposed to have made a day or two ago. It is not easy to follow what these two honourable and distinguished gentlemen were saying. Though I do not pretend to know whether it is exactly correct, one version of it goes like this: The chairman is said to have made a remark to the effect that though the board would be tough at first, after a while it would go easier. The Prime Minister said that the chairman must have been misquoted. The chairman said that he was not misquoted. Later he must have heard directly from the Prime Minister, because now he is saying that what he meant was that the board is going to be harder than tough at first but as the program gets older it will just be tough. Whether or not this version is correct, it seems pretty clear that something happened which has compounded the confusion.

Now, all of this brings me to believe that the view that the legislation should have a duration of eighteen months is a pretty good one. It may be that the comments of the Minister of Finance and the chairman-designate were made in an unguarded moment but, honourable senators, those are frequently the kind of moments when truth will out.

The comments of the chairman-designate and his vice-chairman about the freeze makes the program of Mr. Stanfield in 1974 look pretty good too.

My colleague, Senator Asselin, spoke on Thursday last about the necessity of the government's setting a good example by restraint on its own expenditures. I submit he was certainly correct. As he spoke, I remembered that a couple of weeks ago I heard the minister who is the head of the Treasury Board say that in this fiscal year he hoped the increase of expenditures over last year could be held to 15 or 16 per cent. This, of course, is half again higher than the rate of increase in inflation, high though that rate of increase in inflation is.

It seems to me that to set a good example it would be necessary to keep the rate of increase not higher than the rate of inflation—that is, the rate of increase of government expenditures from year to year. This the government clearly has failed to do. It appears to me that it is apparently operating on the philosophy expressed by Mark Twain "To be good is noble. To teach others to be good is nobler, and no trouble."

I wish to draw attention to the provisions of the bill concerning the appointment and powers of the person who is to be called the administrator. These provisions are contained in clause 15 and following clauses. One has only to look at these clauses to realize that this official will have most extraordinary powers. I believe these powers are entirely too great to be put in the hands of any one person, however experienced and however convinced he may be of the importance of the rights of the individual. However, if the bill becomes law, that is what will happen. If so, all we can do is hope the person appointed will be the best available.

In this connection, I could not help but be disturbed by the comment of the chairman-designate of the Anti-Inflation Board that the person intended to be appointed is at present employed by the Department of National Revenue. I do not know his name. Surely a person vested with the immense powers the administrator will have should not come from the ranks of bureaucrats, but rather be someone who is out in the real world and who knows firsthand of the problems that the people in that world must face from day to day, whether they be workers, employers, professionals or others. Surely, such a person should be one who has all the qualifications required for appointment as a judge of the Federal Court, at the very least, and I hope the minister responsible will bear this in mind and make the appointment accordingly.

The Leader of the Government, early in his speech last Thursday, set out to show that times had taken a turn for the worse. I regret that he is not in his seat. However, this is the time I have to speak, and I will say what I intended to say, in any event.

He said that domestic inflation has been growing for a year and that unit labour costs in Canada are now higher than those in the United States, and a number of other things which seemed suddenly to be revealed to the government as having just occurred, though they have been visible to many for a long time.

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

● (1500)

Now, I do not think that anyone could blame us on this side of the house for feeling that this was a feeble and transparent attempt to distract people from the truth, from the truth that the government has undergone a complete reversal of a policy that it claimed to have in 1974. No reversal could have been more complete, and I don't wonder that those who suffered that conversion are embarrassed. In 1974 the government claimed controls would not work. Now the government claims that controls are the only things that will work to fight inflation. I shall have more to say about this later, but for the moment it is sufficient to say that obviously the government finds it distasteful to admit that Robert Stanfield was right in 1974. In the vain hope that the public would be taken in again, somebody in the multitude of backroom boys on whom the government relies to tell it what to do and what to say has persuaded them to take refuge in the assertion that things are worse now than they used to be, and therefore stronger medicine is needed now and therefore, although controls were of no use before, we must have them now.

Let us examine that statement for a moment. What a devastating self-indictment it is. It is presented as though somebody else was responsible for inflation, that the government had nothing to do with it and no responsibility for fighting it. But, honourable senators, who was in office in Canada during the time that this change, according to the government, occurred? It was not the Social Credit Party; it was not the New Democratic Party and it was not the Progressive Conservative Party. It was the Liberal Party, the blind men of 1974 or the "gay deceivers" of the 1974 election. With one or two notable exceptions of people who could not put up with the drifting inertia of their colleagues, the people who are now in office are the same people under whose unhappy guidance the Leader of the Government in the Senate now says, "Things got worse." And they got so much worse that now drastic measures have to be taken.

What an admission of failure! Failure in one of the prime duties of government, the duty of guiding the economy. And how embarrassing it must be when the government finds itself in such a state of affairs that it thinks it is better to admit a year of failure than to admit it was wrong in 1974, or to admit that the Conservative Party was right in 1974. What gall to offer its own failure as the reason for doing something now; what a paucity of principle and what a travesty of truth. Implicit in this statement of the honourable senator is another damning indictment of those gentlemen who took so lightly the responsibility of office in the last 16 months. He says in effect that they are taking action now because there is greater public support for doing something. This, of course, means that they did not have the courage to do something when it needed to be done. Oh, no, no courageous act for them! Better to let the people suffer until things got so bad that the public would more easily put up with some attempt to cure the ill which besets us all. What a philosophy of government that is!

But, of course, their philosophy of politics is even worse than the leader admits. The truth is, I submit, that this government opposed controls in 1974 because their grey eminences in the back rooms perceived in that course of action the only hope they had to disguise the government's utter uselessness in office since the election of 1972 and the only chance they had to win the election of 1974. Let the country suffer! Let truth be trod underfoot! Let holding office by any means be the watchword of the day! Let us tell the people that controls will not work! Let us tell them that controls will be fighting inflation on the backs of the wage earners and the poor, and that that we will not do! Let us frighten the people into voting against a party that has the courage to say that controls are needed! Let the future take care of itself! And though the government may not have realized what it was doing, they allowed this philosophy to dominate their election propaganda. And they succeeded, and they rejoiced. But now the day of reckoning has come. And those very seeds of error which they spent so much time and money to sow in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people just 16 months ago are the very things that are creating the great difficulty in persuading some groups in Canada to agree that controls are now necessary. They sowed, and now they reap.

While I wish them success in their effort to convince Canadians that controls are needed, I cannot help but point out that their biggest problem in this regard is their own conduct not so long ago. Now things are so bad that even they realize some action has to be taken.

What should it be? Surely, they thought, we can do something different from what Stanfield said was needed. And the search for some other remedy was on. But the back-room boys who got them into the mess failed them now. Search as they would, they could find no answer except controls. What a dark moment for the government that must have been, the moment the inexorable truth pierced their fiercely resisting consciousness, the truth that they must reverse themselves and ask the people of Canada to accept controls, and plead for cooperation.

Well surely, that was the moment for frankness; surely that was the moment to say to Canadians, "We realize now we were wrong in 1974; we realize that controls are needed to fight inflation. We offer you our apologies and we ask for your help. We ask you to help us make controls work." But no! In their horror of admitting that they are only human like the rest of us, and all humans may at times make mistakes, they chose to justify their reversal of policy on the ground that they had allowed circumstances to get so much worse that controls are now necessary.

Well, I have already commented on that piece of nonsense, but there is one more point about it that needs to be made. Controls, the government now say, are the best weapon to fight inflation. They also say that inflation has grown worse since 1974, and surely that shows in their own words that if controls had been adopted in 1974 things would not now be as bad as they are. After all, the government says now that controls will not only halt inflation but will reduce it. So, if controls had been in place by the end of 1974, then the increase in inflation which has taken place since that time would not have occurred and if the present government's belief is correct, then the rate of inflation would now be lower than it was in 1974. By necessary implication, then, the government admits that they are responsible for all the loss of purchasing power and hardship suffered since 1974, by the wage earner, by the poor and by all other Canadians. The government's failure to fight inflation was a failure which has borne heavily on the backs of the wage earners and those on fixed incomes and of low incomes. It was a failure which naturally makes many people distrustful of the government now.

One of the worst things about this bill is the tremendous power it gives the Governor in Council, the administrator and the board.

● (1510)

The Minister of Finance said—I heard him say it on a television program—that this program frightened him. Well he might say so; it ought to frighten any person concerned about democracy. It would be frightening enough even if we knew what was going to be set out in the regulations, but we do not know and, apparently, even the Minister of Finance and the chairman-designate of the board still do not know. Honourable senators, not only is the board to deal with situations which contravene the guidelines in fact, but any situation which the board might think does so in spirit. What is the spirit of legislation? Who can tell? Who can tell what the board will think is the spirit of the guidelines? What rules will it use to determine whether something is likely to contravene their spirit?

Honourable senators will note that it is not only the spirit of things which have been done before with which the board will concern itself; it will also use its feeble power of reading the future to form its opinion as to whether something that has never happened might, if it did happen, offend against the spirit of the guidelines.

That is what the legislation says, and with legislation such as that placing an umbrella over the board's activities, what is there to restrain it from doing whatever it likes?

Then consider the powers given to the Governor in Council under clause 12(2)(b) and clause 3(2). These clauses, in fact, give the Governor in Council almost completely unlimited powers to bring any person engaged in business or professional activity of any kind under the jurisdiction of the board. What, indeed, is the jurisdiction of the board? Well, no one knows or, if they know, they are not telling. What guidelines will the board enforce? Again, no one knows.

Clause 2 gives the Governor in Council the power to make guidelines whenever he likes and as often as he likes and, what is worse, there is no restraint as to what those guidelines may contain. They may be made at any time and as often as the government takes the notion. Their contents may require Canadians to do anything the government from time to time takes into its head to have them do.

One looks in vain for some protection for the individual, some safeguard for the ordinary, but priceless, rights we have come to regard not only as our heritage, but as the basic characteristics of democracy. "Ah," you say, "there is an appeal to an appeal tribunal, and from it to the Federal Court of Appeal." But what good is a right of appeal when the Governor in Council may make any new guideline or regulation it wants if it does not like the result of the appeal? A citizen may win an appeal one day and the next day find himself faced with a new guideline or regulation which deprives him of the benefit of the appeal decision.

Look at clause 20. Among other things, it allows the administrator to make any order he likes to stop a person from doing something he thinks is likely to contravene the guidelines. Listen to this: Such an order, as well as other orders, is binding "notwithstanding any other Act or law enacted or made before or after the coming into force of this Act, and notwithstanding that the order conflicts with anything that was established in accordance with or approved pursuant to any such other Act or law."

It is pretty hard to believe that you would find that provision in legislation placed before this Parliament in these days. Allow me to read it again:

[Such an order is binding] notwithstanding any other Act or law enacted or made before or after the coming into force of this Act, and notwithstanding that the order conflicts with anything that was established in accordance with or approved pursuant to any such other Act or law.

Senator Phillips: I am sorry, Senator Smith, but does not the word "act" to which you refer replace the wording of the Bill of Rights?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am coming to the Bill of Rights in a moment.

Senator Phillips: Thank you.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Remember, this is not dealing with an Order in Council, it is not dealing with some other act of Parliament; it is dealing with an order made by this individual who, we are told, will come from the ranks of the employees of the Department of National Revenue. This clause gives him the right to make any orders sweeping away anything which might lawfully have been done under any act passed by Parliament, and even if nothing has been done it allows the order of the administrator to override any law ever passed by Parliament if it suits the administrator's whim to do so.

It may be that the Bill of Rights still survives, because it contains a clause to the effect that no legislation will override it unless that legislation specifically says so. If the Bill of Rights does survive, it is the only law that can stand against the administrator's order. Remember, his order may be based on any guidelines or regulations the government may see fit to make at any time until December 31, 1978.

If it is possible to make these extraordinary powers any more limitless, consider the statement said to have been made by the minister who is to be responsible for the administration of this bill. His respect for law and the fundamental principles of justice is frighteningly revealed by his assertion that if a decision of the court is adverse to something in which he believes, he will see that Parliament will pass legislation to overrule the courts.

Honourable senators, I have not mentioned all the provisions of this bill which tend to give the government practically unlimited power until December 31, 1978, and give it power to extend its life beyond that time, also by order in council. However, I submit that I have mentioned sufficient of them to demonstrate that the bill gives power to the government in a manner never done before in time of peace in this country. As a corollary it follows, of course, that it will deprive Canadians of their basic rights, protection against arbitrary action of the government and its officials, and will give an appointed official the right to sweep away the effect of any existing laws heretofore made by the Parliament of Canada.

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

As I believe even some very warm supporters of the bill will agree, the anti-inflation program is bound to result in what is often termed "rough justice." Inequities, unfairness and even hardship are inevitable. I recognize that and, in my opinion, that would be so to a substantial degree in any system of controls. This type of legislation should not be imposed upon Canadians for any longer than is absolutely necessary. The kind of powers this bill gives to those who are to administer it will become almost intolerable to those who believe in the basic tenets of democracy, and the longer they stay in place the more likely they are to become a permanent feature of our lives and our law.

I urge the government, therefore, to shorten the term set out in the bill. I suggest that 18 months is appropriate, and, if at the end of that time controls should still be needed, new and better legislation can be placed before Parliament incorporating the lessons learned during the 18 months of the life of this measure. So, as I said in the beginning, honourable senators, although I believe a system of controls is necessary, I also believe that before this bill passes there ought to be many, many improvements made in it. I hope that it will be improved so that those who think as I do will feel as comfortable as one can feel when voting for any system of controls, although knowing and acknowledging that some such system is now needed.

● (1520)

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Certainly.

Senator Greene: While I am not too clear on what the Conservative policy of 1974, to which Senator Smith (Colchester) referred in his address, was, I know he would want the record of the Senate to be clear in this regard.

Mr. Stanfield said it was one thing, and frontbenchers, such as Mr. Lawrence, if I recall correctly, and the financial critic in the other place, said it was not that. Assuming that Mr. Stanfield's policy was the policy of the Conservative Party, would Senator Smith (Colchester) clear the record as to whether that policy was one of wage and price freeze, or of wage and price control, as opposed to freeze?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I am touched by Senator Greene's concern for making the record show that I know what I am talking about, and I hope he will recognize that my answer shows that.

Mr. Stanfield's program was one of both freeze and control. The program, essentially, was one of a freeze for a relatively short period of time—90 days, I think, was the time period generally mentioned—to be followed by a period of some months during which a system of controls would be in effect, and the number of months most often mentioned was 18.

That is exactly what I said earlier on, and exactly what Mr. Stanfield says any time he is asked about it, and exactly what I believe it to be.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I spoke, as perhaps some honourable senators will recall, on the White Paper itself, and said then most of what I might otherwise say now, so my intervention this afternoon, I think, will be, happily, brief.

I am sorry that I was not here for Senator Austin's speech. I was unavoidably detained elsewhere. I can only say that I am sure it merited the encomiums which Senator Smith (Colchester) extended to it.

Senator Smith's speech was, of course, a tour de force. It is quite evident that the Senate has acquired—as we all had been aware, of course, but we now have proof—a most distinguished, articulate and vigorous member, and one whose contributions to our deliberations will certainly be of the very highest value. I say that without prejudice in spite of the fact that I am part Nova Scotian and have a partiality for things and people Nova Scotian.

But as I listened to that very able speech, I could not help thinking that it was an example of Pope's description of Addison as, Damning with faint praise, assenting with civil leer, And, without sneering, teaching the rest to sneer.

There has been a good deal in the comments of the Conservative Party on this subject, not only of, "We told you so," which is, perhaps, somewhat legitimate, but also of, "Well, of course, we are in favour of this, but you are doing it all wrong. It is really a rather miserable attempt and gives people who oughtn't to have power too much power," and so forth, and so on. All sorts of flaws are picked out; all sorts of holes are poked in the thing. Nevertheless, they say, "We are in favour of the general principle. Oh yes, we think something ought to be done. We think controls are necessary. We have always said that controls are necessary, or at least we have been saying it for some time, but you people wouldn't listen to us."

I don't think that is altogether helpful in present circumstances. I was a little sorry that Senator Smith's speech was so heavily flavoured with a partisan spirit. I don't propose to follow his speech in detail. Some of the points took me somewhat by surprise, and I should have to look more carefully at the bill itself before I would be prepared to offer a comment that I think would be worthwhile. But there are one or two things that I think ought to be said that I propose now to say.

In the first place, there is the argument that this government, by refusing to adopt the policy advocated by the Conservative Party in the election of 1974, has allowed things to get worse, and that therefore the worsening of the situation which, undeniably, has taken place, is the responsibility of this government. I think that is a very dubious proposition, to say the least.

Fundamentally, as I understand it at least, the policy of this government was to try to control inflation by voluntary means, by getting a consensus. It tried very hard to get that consensus, but didn't get it. If it had merely sat and twiddled its thumbs during this period, Senator Smith's recriminations might, perhaps, have been deserved, but throughout that period the government, believing as it does in doing things by consent, doing things by the consent of the people affected as far as possible, not resorting to drastic and draconian measures unless necessary, the government was trying to get a consensus which would enable it to get the various sectors of the economy to follow something like the guidelines which are now proposed, voluntarily. That process was pursued for some time and it failed. Then, as the pace of wage increases, notably, plainly was not slackening, but was quickening, accelerating, the government felt it had to act, even though it could not get the consensus that it had desired.

In Great Britain, the government followed a different course. It waited until it could get the agreement of the trade union movement, and there was something to be said for that. But if you look at the British situation, I think you will find two things: first of all, that the consensus, when it did emerge, was in favour of a much more drastic measure than we have here, essentially a freezing of wage and salary increases and incomes generally, a very drastic and tight freeze over a whole period of a year, not just a matter of three months, as the Conservative Party had proposed here initially. It took a very long time to get that consensus, and by the time it was possible to get it, the position of the British economy had worsened to a positively horrifying degree.

No doubt, the government here could have waited similarly, like the British government, for a consensus. It would have had to wait, I am afraid, a very long time, and by that time the situation would certainly have got vastly worse, as it did in Great Britain. On the other hand, the government could immediately have imposed an absolute freeze—a 90-day freeze, let us say; let us accept that period for argument's sake and then worked out, as Mr. Stanfield apparently proposed to do, a system of controls on a more permanent basis, to be, if I remember the policy correctly, phased out gradually over a period. But if it had done that, I think it would have run the risk of encountering even more ferocious criticism and resistance than it has encountered now.

The inequities of even a 90-day freeze would have been so glaring that the public reaction, especially if there had been no attempt beforehand to get a consensus, would have been very strong, indeed, and very adverse.

This is, to some extent, of course, a matter of judgment: exactly how long is it desirable to wait to see if the consensus could be got? Exactly how serious were the risks of inequity under an absolute freeze, even a temporary one?

I think the government was faced with the choice of either an absolute freeze, even for a limited period, which would then have to be succeeded by controls, which would probably be open to the same kinds of objections as they are now, or imposing controls to begin with, with a great many provisions for what might be described, I suppose, as modifications, a great many provisions to make sure that the inequities which might occur would be limited in scope and not prolonged in duration. It was that alternative which the government chose, and I think it was a sensible choice to make.

● (1530)

The next thing I want to mention, that Senator Smith was agitated about, is the question of the numerous regulations provided for in this bill. Unquestionably, the bill gives a very wide power of regulation to the Governor in Council, and very wide powers to the Anti-Inflation Board and to the administrator. However, I cannot help asking myself what a Conservative government would have done after its initial 90-day freeze had ended. What kind of controls would it have introduced? What provisions would it have made? I cannot help having a nasty suspicion that it would have found itself faced with very much the same practical problems and the same psychological problems that this government faced in drafting this measure; that it would have had to provide for a great deal of flexibility in order to avoid inequity; that it would have had to work its way rather carefully, to some extent by trial and error; that it could not have produced for Parliament a whole set of detailed regulations carrying the bill into effect. Some degree of generality, some degree of discretion and some degree of flexibility is necessary, it seems to me, if we are to avoid gross inequities under a program like this.

It is possible that some of the clauses are so broad that they give inordinate power. There are, I think, two remedies for that, one of which is provisional, namely, amendments which this house may make in committee, which may improve the drafting of the bill. The other safeguard, perhaps not a very powerful one but one which nevertheless I think could be very effective, a safeguard which would come into play after the bill had become law and when the regulations had been drafted and brought into effect, is—though I hope I do not sound as though I were making a commercial for it—the existence of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I am sorry that we have not had Senator Smith in that committee. Had he been there, I think he would have realized that this may be a stronger safeguard against abuse than perhaps he would suppose from the knowledge he has had of it, from outside shall I say.

Not only does that committee examine regulations from the point of view of their actual validity, whether they go beyond the powers which have been granted by Parliament, not only do they examine them from the point of view of finding out what in them is obscure and may lead to unnecessary confusion and unnecessary litigation, but also from the point of view of whether they go beyond the intention of Parliament, whether they constitute an unreasonable, excessive or unexpected use of the powers which have been granted by Parliament. In other words, that committee looks not merely at the legal validity of the regulations in comparison with the legislation that empowered the government to make them, but it looks also at whether they trench unduly upon the liberties of the subject, and whether they make an unusual, unexpected or extraordinary use of the powers conferred by Parliament. I think that is a safeguard of some importance. I think as it becomes more established it will be recognized as a safeguard which can be of extreme importance.

When all is said and done, there must be, I think, a certain degree of flexibility in these things. You cannot at this stage foresee all the problems that will arise. Many of the initial regulations will probably have to be modified very considerably in the course of a fairly short time in the light of experience. I do not see how you can have it any other way. It would be very unfortunate if they were plunked down now in front of Parliament and we were told these were, in effect, the laws of the Medes and Persians which change not. It would take too long to come back to Parliament for every change that was needed, so there has to be room for the Executive, and the authorities set up by this legislation, to make adjustments in the application of the legislation in the light of experience.

[Senator Forsey.]

I was going to say that there were only two other things I wanted to mention, but I see I have in front of me notes on something else. Senator Smith waxed very eloquent, not without reason, on clause 20(8). He omitted from what he said, from his quotation of the clause, certain words which I think are material. I do not mean by this that he intentionally misrepresented anything; that is the last thing I should attribute to Senator Smith. However, I think it important to notice exactly what clause 20(8) says:

An order of the Administrator made pursuant to subsection (1), paragraph (2)(a), (4)(a) or (5)(a) is binding on the person against whom it is made notwithstanding any agreement—and so on. In other words, this is not quite as wide as it sounded, or seemed to me to sound, when Senator Smith described it. It does not say that any order of the administrator overrides any law that was ever made by Parliament, or is made by Parliament, or will be made by Parliament. It simply says that the order of the administrator pursuant to three parts of clauses of this bill will override laws which are inconsistent with the particular order of the administrator. At least, that is how I read it. It is not nearly as wide as Senator Smith would have led me to believe. I took the trouble to look at it very carefully when he was delivering his oration on the subject, and it seemed to me quite clear that it was not as wide as he was suggesting.

When it comes to the business of overruling the courts, in a sense you can say that is one of the fundamentals of our system. Except on constitutional questions of the division of power between the Dominion and the provinces, for example, we have the power in Parliament or in the legislatures, as the case may be, to override the decisions of the courts. This is part of the sovereignty both the provincial legislatures and the Parliament of Canada enjoy. If I may quote from the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, Parliament and the legislatures in their respective spheres “within the limits of subject and area prescribed by the British North America Act enjoy authority as plenary and as ample as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow.”

That being so, they have the power to override the courts if there is a decision contrary to what Parliament wants. So as long as Parliament sticks within its jurisdiction and does not jump the fence into the provincial garden, Parliament can overrule the courts, can establish a different law from what the courts proclaim, can, and must be able to, do so. This is part of the very basis of British parliamentary government. Obviously it does not do this lightly, but there have been cases and cases and cases, both in Great Britain and here, where it has been done.

I shall mention only one in Great Britain, the “Wee Frees” case. After the United Free Church of Scotland decided to unite with the Church of Scotland, a very small minority of the United Free Church stood out against it. They took the case to the courts and won, so the courts awarded to this tiny, microscopic minority of the United Free Church all the property of the Free Church of Scotland. The Free Church of Scotland and the Church of Scotland, the new United Church of Scotland, asked Parliament to reverse that decision by awarding the bulk of the property to the bulk of the members of the Free Church of Scotland, leaving to the "Wee Frees" only the small amount which in equity they were entitled to as a proportion of the old United Free Church of Scotland. That was a clear case of Parliament overriding the decision of the courts.

Another very historic case in Great Britain was the action of Parliament in passing the Trade Disputes Act of 1906. The "Taff Vale" case had imposed upon the trade unions of Great Britain legal burdens grievous to be borne, and Keir Hardie, the leader of the Independent Labour Party, in a masterly speech in the House of Commons convinced the Liberal Government of that day that this was wrong, as he considered it, must be righted. They were not proposing to pass any law as drastic as he recommended, but he convinced them that they should go farther and relieve the trade unions of the burden which the "Taff Vale" decision would have placed upon them.

● (1540)

Now, I am not saying in either of these cases that this was the final word of truth, that this was exactly what ought to have been done. I am saying that under the British system, parliamentary government, parliamentary sovereignty untrammelled by the restrictions placed upon legislatures in the United States, for example, parliament or the legislature unquestionably has power to say, when the courts have made a decision, "Well, that is not going to be the law henceforth and it is hereby declared not to have been the law before, because we have power to pass retroactive legislation."

Senator Smith: Perhaps the honourable senator would allow me to ask whether or not in those precedents he is quoting, the minister concerned went out before the court made its decision and said, "I do not care what the court says, I will get it changed", or did this come about afterwards when it became clear that the action of the court was not in accordance with the policy of government?

Senator Forsey: No, I do not think the minister did in those cases make a statement of that sort beforehand. For one thing, in the first case it probably never entered anyone's head that the courts would be so foolish, shall I say, make such fools of themselves, be so ridiculous in their judgment as to award the "Wee Frees" the entire property of the United Free Church of Scotland. This was the view of most Scots apart from the "Wee Frees" themselves. It was regarded by most Scots as a manifestation of English ignorance of things Scots and Presbyterian.

In the other case the government was not convinced until after Keir Hardie's speech, that it should pass this legislation.

This does not affect the principle which I am enunciating, that Parliament has the power. If a minister wants to say beforehand, "If the courts show that we have drafted this legislation in such a way that it does not produce the effects we intended, then we are not going to say that is too bad, we can't do anything about it; we shall rectify the situation by getting fresh legislation from Parliament." I do not see anything outrageous in that at all. It seems to me simply a common sense application of a well understood principle of the British Constitution.

Senator Smith: I wonder if the senator's patience would extend to allowing me to ask whether he believes that I have said anything which was inconsistent with the principle which he has been speaking about for the last ten minutes?

Senator Forsey: It sounded rather as if the honourable senator had. If that was not what he intended I am delighted to have given him the opportunity of clarifying, for others also who perhaps may have misunderstood him, the point which I have just been discussing.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question in the same vein, before he goes on? For those of us who are not on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, could he enlighten us as to the powers of that committee to either amend or veto a regulation which violates individual rights or goes beyond the intent of the legislation? Does the committee have that power?

Senator Forsey: No, it cannot.

Senator Greene: How does it police it, then? I thought the honourable senator was trying to give us some assurance that if the administrator, or any of the agencies under this act, went beyond the scope of the act, then the Statutory Instruments Committee would be some protection in this regard. Perhaps he could enlighten us.

Senator Forsey: Some protection. Of course, I was not suggesting that a committee could annul a regulation validly passed. The committee can and would, I think, certainly draw the attention of both houses, in a stiffly worded report, to any regulation which did this kind of thing. I think I am safe in saying the committee shows a very strong spirit of non-partisanship and will probably go on doing that. I can certainly answer for one member of the committee. As long as I remain on it, I shall not be a trained seal, or just register the opinion of the government, whatever it might happen to be.

No, this is not a complete safeguard. It is a certain safeguard. There will be someone there watching, someone coming back and reporting to the two houses. Then, if the thing is flagrant enough, surely you would have some opportunity, even with a government with a large majority, some opportunity of getting a rectification. I should hope there would be that.

Of course, if you are a very cynical person, you may say that those miserable Grits are beyond redemption and no matter what kind of outrage you reveal they have committed, they will do nothing about it. I am unable to take this dark and cynical view of those with whom I am at the moment politically associated.

There are just, I think, two other things that I want to say. One is that when people reproach the labour movement of this country with the attitude of defiance, which it has generally taken up, I hope they will remember that one of the largest unions in this country, the Public Service Alliance, in the brief which it presented to the committee in the other place, was most sensible, moderate and constructive. It pointed out a great many of what it considered defects in the legislation, but it did not take an attitude of absolute opposition. It presented a brief which, in my judgment, was a credit to anyone appearing before that committee. You may or may not agree with the particular things that it said, but it seems to me they were put forward in a calm, reasonable and proper way, and were constructive criticisms of the legislation. This, I think, should be chalked up as a good mark for at least one part of the labour movement in this country by those who are apt, after reading the pronouncements of certain other unions, to take a very dark view of the behaviour of that movement.

I want to add one further thing arising out of an interview, a prolonged interview, in my office the other day with some representatives of the Ontario secondary school teachers. They talked as if collective bargaining were the supreme value in our society, untouchable, something which in no circumstances would a government be justified in abridging, in any degree. Now, they might not be willing to admit they went as far as that, but that is what it sounded like. They erected collective bargaining into an absolute value. They made it almost a god. I wish to register my objection to that view.

I think collective bargaining in a democratic society—an industrialized democratic society especially—is of immense importance. It is a right which should not be lightly interfered with. It should be interfered with as little as possible, but I simply deny that it is an absolute value. I decline to accept the view that it is a god, before which the whole of society must bend the knee, and worship in humble adoration. It is important, but it is not the sole value in society nor necessarily at all times the highest value. There are times when it must be limited, as indeed it is now being limited very drastically in Great Britain with the consent of the trade union movement, at long last.

I think for that reason it is the more important to notice that the Public Service Alliance did take a reasonable attitude on this subject, and did not attempt to make collective bargaining into the supreme value of society.

Perhaps I might add parenthetically, as I referred to the Ontario school teachers, that I have considered again the point that came up during the previous debate on the White Paper, about the power of the Ontario Government to cede jurisdiction over its employees to the Government of Canada. Now, there is no doubt, of course, that that could be done by legislation. Administrative delegation by legislation is a not uncommon feature of our system now ever since the famous Willis case dealing with the Potato Marketing Board in Prince Edward Island. Some of the collective bargaining acts immediately after the last war contained provisions which would have allowed the province, by agreement with the Government of Canada, to hand over the administration of the legislation to the Canada Labour Relations Board.

There is no question that the Government of Ontario could have introduced legislation of that sort in the legislature of Ontario in order to place its employees under the guidelines and under this legislation. But I do not think it was necessary to do so in this instance, because here, if the law officers of the Crown are right—and I am inclined to think that they are, and I have the support of a very eminent constitutional lawyer in that sense—if the law officers of the Crown are right, this legislation, if there were no clause in it providing for agreements with the provinces, would apply just as the Wartime Prices and Trade Regulations applied to the employees of provincial governments. They applied to everyone, as far as I know. It was not necessary to get an agreement of the provinces to make those regulations applicable to provincial employees.

[Senator Forsey.]

In this particular legislation, the government, being anxious again to get as much agreement as possible, did not try to impose its own views on the provinces. It said, "We are prepared to make arrangements with you; by agreement with you, we are prepared to let you hand over jurisdiction over these people to the Government of Canada. We could do it without any agreement at all but we are prepared to make an agreement with you so we can see just exactly how you feel the matter should be settled and we can get your advice and your judgment on the thing."

● (1550)

This was, in effect, an ex gratia concession by the Government of Canada to the governments of the provinces, and at least one, the Government of Ontario, has apparently decided it is prepared to take advantage of this. It is advised by its legal officers that this is perfectly valid, as it seems to me that it undoubtedly is. Therefore, it has undertaken to hand over jurisdiction simply by an agreement and without legislation.

All this, of course, is based upon the assumption that this legislation in general is valid. That, of course, is something on which nobody can pronounce finally unless and until it comes before the courts. But I think there is good reason to believe that it is a legitimate, proper and valid exercise of the power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, even under the restrictive emergency doctrine of Lords Watson and Haldane when they spoke for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

That is merely by way of parenthesis, because I think it is of some importance that there should not get abroad an impression that the government and the Parliament of Canada are invading provincial jurisdiction, or for that matter that the Conservative Government of Ontario is so recreant to its duty, or so negligent of constitutional propriety, that it is prepared to do something by agreement which in fact can only legitimately and legally be done by legislation.

Senator Phillips: Is the Province of Ontario different from the other provinces?

Senator Forsey: No.

Senator Phillips: Then why specify the Province of Ontario?

Senator Forsey: Why specify the Ontario Government? Because I have a peculiar respect for that government.

Senator Phillips: Well, if you have respect for that government, then I will join you in that respect.

Senator Forsey: I cannot forget that I was brought up a Conservative, and have probably voted Conservative oftener than I have voted anything else. And perhaps I shall do so again. I don't know. That depends on the circumstances. If the Conservative Party does what commends itself to my judgment and conscience, I shall have no hesitation in voting for it, as I did over and over again in the past; sometimes, I must admit, because there was no CCF candidate there, and sometimes for other and perhaps stronger reasons.

I wanted to make that final comment, that it seemed to me that the Government of Ontario was quite within its rights in feeling that it did not need to resort to legislation on this subject, and any other province, of course, would be equally within its rights. But any of them who chose to resort to legislation or any of them who chose not to make an agreement but to set up their own machinery would be perfectly at liberty to do so.

But I see the great authority on the rules and practices of this house shaking his head, intimating, no doubt correctly, that I have gone on quite long enough, if not too long, and I shall therefore, honourable senators, take my seat, hoping that I have contributed something of some value to the discussion of this measure.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if Senator Forsey would be generous enough to permit me another question?

Senator Forsey: Certainly.

Senator Smith (Colchester): The question is whether clause 20(1) is not one of those provisions in clause 20(8) referred to by the senator and myself, and if so does not clause 20(1) read as follows:

Where the Administrator is satisfied that a person is likely to contravene the guidelines, he may make such order as he deems appropriate to prohibit the person from contravening the guidelines generally, or in a particular manner specified in the order.

Senator Forsey: Yes, that is the way it reads. So what? All I was saying was that the power given in subclause (8) does not appear to me to be as wide as Senator Smith (Colchester) seemed to suggest. It is wide; it is very wide, and I think it has to be wide. Perhaps it is too wide. This is a matter which I think the committee could very well consider. It is possible that this is an excessive grant of power. I am not prepared to say offhand that it is not. I would like to hear arguments on that. I really wanted to make the point that clause 20(8) does not give the administrator power to override any laws whatsoever; it is limited to a certain degree, although possibly not enough.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I suppose I should not really carry on an argument because it is not in order to do so, so I shall not press the point at the moment. But I think I have made it rather clear that it is pretty wide.

Senator Forsey: It is wide. That is what I said.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned until later this day.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I suggest that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

RULES OF THE SENATE

COMMENCEMENT DATE OF AMENDMENTS CONTAINED IN REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING RULES AND ORDERS—AUTHORITY TO REPRINT RULES

Senator Molson moved pursuant to notice:

That the amendments to the Rules of the Senate contained in the Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, dated October 29, 1975, and adopted by the Senate on November 26, 1975, shall come into force on the first day of the Second Session of the Thirtieth Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, pursuant to rule 23, that the motion be modified to read as follows:

That the amendments to the Rules of the Senate contained in the Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, dated October 29, 1975, and adopted by the Senate on November 26, 1975, shall come into force on the first day of the Second Session of the Thirtieth Parliament; and

That the Rules of the Senate, as amended, be reprinted in the English and French languages in conformity with the arrangement, style, numbering and lettering used in the Statutes of Canada, with a detailed index, an appendix showing the bibliography of related statutes and an appendix containing the relevant forms of proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion as modified?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, may I have leave to complete a partial answer I gave to Senator Grosart this afternoon?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: The question posed by Senator Grosart was in connection with the legislation covered by the messages received today from the House of Commons. He inquired whether there was any timetable for the disposal of this legislation.

I refer the house to the first item, which is Bill S-27, to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act, which is returned to this house without amendment. Therefore, this item is merely placed on the list of those bills which will receive royal assent when that next takes place.

The second item is Bill C-1002, to incorporate the Northland Bank. As honourable senators will recall, Senator Cameron, the sponsor of this bill, moved today that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday, December 10, and it is expected that it will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on that or the following day. There is no urgency, but I should mention that I am informed that the officers of this bank are presently in Ottawa, and if we could refer the bill to the committee this week before they return it would be very convenient for them. However, this is simply a hope which I express at this time in order to endeavour to accommodate these distinguished visitors to the capital city.

The third item is Bill C-74, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act. I moved this afternoon that this bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Wednesday next, December 10. The sponsor of the bill will likely move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which, in my opinion, is the appropriate committee to consider this legislation. Again, there is no urgency, except for the importance of clearing the way for other legislation which may come to us between now and the end of the present session, as our committees will be quite busy from now until we recess.

I hope these remarks cover the points raised by the honourable senator.

Senator Grosart: My specific question related to Bill C-73. I was asking about the timetable respecting that.

Senator Langlois: I thought I had answered that this afternoon. I am sorry if I was not clear. I referred to the statement made last week by the Leader of the Government, when he mentioned that hopefully the bill could be dealt with during the present week. He mentioned, if I recall correctly, Thursday or Friday as being the day on which we could expect the bill to be disposed of.

I do not think I have anything further to add. If further information is required, no doubt it will be supplied by the Leader of the Government.

ANTI-INFLATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for second reading of Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices and dividends and compensation in Canada.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is probably unnecessary for much more comment on the bill from this side of the house in view of the thorough examination given it in the excellent speech made this afternoon by Senator Smith (Colchester).

However, I have some comments to make on that speech, and perhaps this is the occasion on which some specific answers might be sought on points raised by Senator Smith.

Senator Forsey, for example, suggested that it was a partisan speech. I am sure he was not surprised at that, because we are dealing with a bill where the elements of political opportunism, both in the background of the bill—the events leading up to it—and in the measure itself, are so obvious that it almost necessarily calls for partisanship, particularly because we are dealing with the solution suggested earlier by one party to the inflation problem and the solution now suggested by the government.

Senator Walker: Senator Forsey understands partisanship on all sides.

Senator Grosart: Senator Smith has made it clear why the government has changed its mind. It took a strong position rejecting completely the concept or controls during the election campaign and has now, in its wisdom, found it necessary to introduce controls.

[Senator Langlois.]

I do not object to a government's changing its mind—there is nothing wrong with that—but one has to be suspicious when one is faced with a situation where, during the election campaign, the major plank in the platform of the party which now forms the government was that it completely rejected this concept, and which now proposes a bill imposing controls, but in which it uses throughout the phrase “guidelines”—and I will have something to say about that in a moment.

Secondly, there is, I am quite sure, grounds for some partisanship when a government, after a long series of weak and ineffectual approaches to major economic and social problems, decided, as this government did, to spend its way out of the problem by such things as indexing and other measures just to patch up the results of its own inefficiency and weakness; and by so doing, by these excessive expenditures, as Senator Smith so well pointed out, escalated the problem it was attempting to solve. The result is that we have major galloping inflation, one of the major causes of which has been this increase in federal government expenditures.

There has been some reference by Senator Forsey and others to the government's attempt, first, to obtain voluntary agreement on guidelines. This is so. The government did make such attempts. It was suggested that this explains why the government finally had to come along and present Bill C-73 in the terms in which it is before us. But, of course, it should be pointed out that this decision to try the voluntary way was four years after the government itself had admitted that inflation was a serious problem.

● (2010)

In 1972 we had the statement by the Prime Minister that inflation was so serious that this government will wrestle it to the ground. What it did, of course, was wrestle it up to such serious proportions as we have never seen in our economy.

The Leader of the Government shakes his head. He may object to my metaphor, that it wrestled it up. I didn't say it “rested up”, but “it wrestled it up.” Hold by hold, piece by piece, excuse by excuse, by bad decisions and bad guesses, it wrestled it up slowly to the proportions with which we are now faced.

It has also been suggested that the government tried very hard to achieve a consensus as to how it should go about dealing with inflation. Well, one only has to know what has happened to the present bill to realize how absurd any suggestion might have been that a consensus could have been obtained in advance of the presentation of this bill. We have the organized labour movement rejecting the bill; we have management, large and small business, rejecting it; we have statements by the banks, the CMA, by the leaders of small business groups, saying it won't work. We have even had the Public Service itself, both federally and provincially, saying it won't work and, of course, we now have Ontario teachers saying that they have an organized plan to defy this law.

Senator Perrault: Shocking!

Senator Grosart: The Leader of the Government says "shocking", and I agree. I agree entirely. I find myself wondering what these teachers are going to teach their students when they resume teaching. Are they going to tell their students that if they regard any law—and what they are dealing with is the application of this proposed law—as unfair, they can defy it? Can you defy the laws limiting speed limits? If your street is made a one-way street in the public interest, can you defy that?

One would wonder if the teachers are saying to the bootleggers that they can defy the law—and bootleggers, no doubt, dislike our laws and regard them as unfair, restricting as they do their hours and their way of doing business. Are the teachers going to say that bootleggers can defy the law if they do not like it? Along the same lines, we have B-girls, or prostitutes. They, unquestionably, find the applicable laws at the moment unfair.

Are the teachers going to return to the classrooms and say that if anybody finds a law unfair, they can get together with those who are concerned with it, and plan to defy that law? That, if I read the morning paper correctly, is exactly what is happening, and with that, of course, I have no sympathy whatsoever. But it does indicate the hypocrisy—and I think that is not too strong a word—the hypocrisy of the government's saying, "Well, first of all, we tried voluntary controls"—it knew voluntary controls would not work—"and then we tried to achieve a consensus"—and it knew it would not get a consensus—"and because we could not get a consensus we have had to bring in this tough, tough law."

It is a familiar case of weak and inefficient leadership—whether it is parents, teachers, or anybody else—finally faced with the result of its own weakness and inefficiency, saying, "Now I am going to get tough." The minute they do that, comparing it with their former weakness and inefficiency, they completely lose their credibility. No one believes them. That, I suggest, is our position in respect of this bill.

Senator Greene asked Senator Smith a very good question, and a good question generally elicits a good answer, which is what he got. His question was whether the Progressive Conservative program was one of freeze or controls. Senator Smith said, "It is both," quite rightly so, because it was. The present bill certainly is not a freeze, because the government has gone out of its way to say, "Oh no, we are not putting in controls. We are putting in guidelines," which is about the height of utter hypocrisy in legislation in my time here. These are guidelines which are mandatory, which are not guidelines in any normal sense of the word. I say there are no guidelines in this bill in that sense.

The consensus of labour, management and the public service is that these so-called controls will not work, so we have neither a freeze nor controls. But we have guidelines. I say we have no controls in spite of the draconian, authoritarian terms in which these guidelines are presented to us. If they could work, if there was any chance that they might work, we might be inclined to go along with them, although I very much doubt it because of the very nature of the authoritarianism of this bill.

I have read this bill and read some of the comments on it, and the major criticism I find of it is that it is a panic overreach, an overreach to a panic situation created by the government, which, with the typical kind of reaction of people who have failed by their own weakness, their own indecision, suddenly say, "Now we are going to get tough." Usually when somebody says he is going to get tough, whether it is a parent or anyone else, he gets so tough that his authority diminishes, which is what I predict for this bill.

I said I would speak about guidelines. The bill uses the word "guidelines" throughout. I am quite sure we all understand the word "guidelines," which in normal parlance means suggestions for voluntary conduct in any kind of situation. The bill makes a quick pass at this where it suggests that there are these kinds of guidelines. This appears in clause 3(1), which says:

The Governor in Council may from time to time cause to be published and made known guidelineed for the guidance of all Canadians in restraining profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation.

Real guidelines for all Canadians. They then very quickly run away from that and say, "No, we are not talking about that at all," because in the interpretation clause we find:

"guidelines", except in subsection 3(1)—

The clause I have just referred to, the real guidelines.

means the guidelines from time to time established by the Governor in Council pursuant to subsection 3(2).

And so on. So we are told immediately, "We are only using guidelines because it would be impolitic, in our view, to use controls because that is what the Conservatives suggested." Thus we have this utter hypocrisy of this word "guidelines."

The earlier clauses of the bill talk about "guidelines by regulation," but then later on the bill forgets that because the interpretation clause covers it. Guidelines in the true sense are nowhere to be found in this bill except in that one reference in clause 3(1), of which there is no other mention. In this bill guidelines are nothing more than regulations. Why are they called guidelines? It is utter pretence, utter hypocrisy, running away from what the government says it is trying to do.

● (2020)

What are these guidelines? Well, guideline 3(2), which is the effective clause here, says:

The Governor in Council may, by regulation, establish guidelines for the restraint of . . .

Following upon that we have a long list of regulations which will restrain various activities of Canadians.

The previous clause 3(1) is the end of the pretence. From there on, we are given some kind of indication of what the so-called guidelines are. The guidelines repeal all price and profit margins previously established by law. All other law is washed out by the guidelines.

There are references throughout to "enforcement" of these so-called guidelines. There is a statement to be found in clause 12(1)(b) that "enforcement" will be not only by the letter of the law but by the spirit of the law. We are going to enforce the spirit of the guidelines by penalties. I am sure that has never been heard of in any act of Parliament in our entire history. So, over and over again, in this cheap guise of guidelines, we have the greatest transfer of authoritarian power to a civil servant—a civil servant known as the administrator, a single civil servant. Nothing like this has happened, I suggest, in our history. We would naturally expect that the administrator would have to account for his actions regularly, but, no, section 17(3) says that the administrator shall report as the minister may require. If the minister does not want him to report, he never reports. Guidelines!

Then, clause 19(1)(b) says that this civil servant administering the guidelines may authorize any employee to enter any premises or place where any business is carried on—he can do all sorts of things “in his opinion”—and examine property described by an inventory or any property, and so on, which may “in his opinion” assist him.

This civil servant may “in his opinion” if, during the course of an audit or examination, it “appears to him” that there has been a contravention of this act, seize and take away books. This is what may be done if it appears to him—this one civil servant—that there has been a contravention. Guidelines—this is what they are called.

On page 19 we find the orders. We are away now from any pretense of guidelines. We are now into the orders he can give. Clause 20 (1) says:

Where the Administrator is satisfied that a person is likely to contravene the guidelines, he may make such order as he deems appropriate . . .

“Likely to contravene!” And these are supposed to be guidelines, mind you. This is a civil servant who can give this order if he deems it appropriate to prohibit the person from doing certain things. There is no reference whatsoever to the courts. This civil servant says, “I deem it appropriate to do this,” and that is the end of it under this bill—and they call these guidelines.

What I find interesting under this notorious clause 20 is that if the administrator decides that someone is about to contravene or has contravened the act, he is then given these fantastic powers. But the fact is that the person has not contravened the act, has not been likely to contravene the act, because there is no evidence whatsoever except the opinion of this one civil servant. If the administrator thinks the person has contravened the act, then the civil servant has the power to impose penalties.

It is true that there are appeals, and I will come to them in a minute, but the appellate considerations in this bill are about as thin as they have ever been at any time. They are completely restricted in so many ways that anyone who appeals from a decision either of the administrator or of the Appeal Tribunal should have his head read, because he has not got a snowball's chance under the restrictions put in here, where the burden of proof is often on the appellant and where the Appeal Tribunal is not a court of record and does not have to give written opinions. And yet, despite these things, there is supposedly an appeal from the Appeal Tribunal to the Federal Court. But what will the Federal Court adjudicate on? It cannot, under this bill, consider the actions of the administrator. There is no authority—and if the Honourable Leader of the Government wants the citation I will give it to him—there is no authority whatsoever for the Federal Court to consider for one minute whether the administrator was right or wrong, whether he injured some person or whether he even destroyed that person's career. The Federal Court cannot look into that. It can only consider the judgment of the Appeal Tribunal.

[Senator Grosart.]

So much for the appeal, the fictional, false, fantastic right of appeal that is written into this bill. That is why I have used the word “hypocrisy.” I find nothing but hypocrisy throughout this bill, which pretends to give some substance to individual and collective rights when it is actually destroying them over and over again.

There is another equally alarming aspect to the business of appeals. The administrator can impose a penalty on anyone who, in his opinion, has contravened the act or might be about to contravene the act. He can say, “You must now deposit so much money with Her Majesty. This is your penalty.” The administrator can do that on his own judgment. The amount involved may be $100 a day for 20 days. It may be lower, it may be higher. It can be $5,000. It can be $10,000. If the person who is being penalized is a small businessman and cannot put up the money, his situation becomes even more dire, because he then loses his right of appeal. If he is a small businessman, and cannot put up the money when the administrator says he should, do you know what happens then? He loses his right of appeal to the Federal Court. This is the kind of bill that we are asked to pass, as a panacea for the weakness and inefficiency that has characterized the handling of this problem of inflation by the government over the years.

● (2030)

Of course, it will be suggested that the bill says, “There could be a real problem for us here. Perhaps there are other acts of Parliament that protect the rights of individuals, or the collective rights of all, so we had better take care of that.” This the bill most certainly does. It is clear that this bill actually attempts to say that notwithstanding any other act of Parliament, notwithstanding any act that may be passed in times to come, Parliament cannot, in the future, pass an act to repeal this measure. I do not know whether this would stand up in court. I cannot believe that it would. I cannot believe that any bill before Parliament can constrain that Parliament or any other in this way. Nevertheless, this is what the bill says.

Let me go back to the question of appeals for a moment. No matter how aggrieved or injured the appellant may be, the bill clearly states, in clause 35:

No costs may be awarded by the Appeal Tribunal on the disposition of an appeal.

The appellant may have been put out of business, he may be 100 per cent right, but under this bill no costs can be awarded to him. Honourable senators, what kind of legislation are we dealing with? I called it “over-reach,” but that is probably a euphemism.

I now come to the whole matter of the extent to which this panic over-reach has infringed the basic individual and collective human rights for which our forefathers have fought ever since Magna Carta. These basic human rights are completely abrogated in this bill. I believe this to be the case, and perhaps the Leader of the Government will tell me if I am right. I cannot ask him to interpret proposed legislation, but I can ask him to tell me if it is government policy under it to make explicit provision that neither existing nor future laws shall apply in respect to this bill, and particularly that future laws shall not apply? I refer him, with respect to the first case, to clauses 4.1 and 14 (3), and, with respect to future laws, to clause 20(8).

I wish also to ask the Leader of the Government if it is the intention of the government to make sure that there will be no judicial review of the act, and whether it is essential to deny the right of the courts to adjudicate on the legality of its administration.

I would also ask the leader if it is the intent of the government, in writing this bill as it stands, to abrogate completely those extraordinary remedies on which individuals have, in the process of the development of our legal system, relied for protection against the use of arbitrary powers by the Executive. I would ask him, for example, whether it is government policy—though, as I say, I cannot ask the Leader of the Government to interpret the law—to make an order of the administrator “binding on the person against whom it is made... notwithstanding that the order conflicts with any thing that was established in accordance with or approved pursuant to any such other act or law.” That is to say, notwithstanding any other act or law enacted or made before or after the coming into force of the act.

Is it the intention of the government in that phraseology completely to abrogate the basic rights of citizens to proceed by various writs which have been established over the years? The Leader of the Government shakes his head, and I hope he is right. I hope it was not the intention of the government to achieve what appears to be achieved in this bill, and I hope that he will get up and say that it was all a great mistake, that that was never the intention of the government, that he is terribly sorry that this is so, and that they are going to refer this bill immediately to the Supreme Court of Canada to find out if they have gone beyond their intentions. I am, as I say, glad to see him shake his head because I hope he is right.

I would ask if it is the intention of the government, for example, to abrogate the provisions of the Interpretation Act, section 34(1) of which provides:

Every Act shall be so construed as to reserve to Parliament the power of repealing or amending it, and of revoking, restricting or modifying any power, privilege or advantage thereby vested in or granted to any person.

That, honourable senators, is the Interpretation Act, but this bill says the very opposite.

I ask the Leader of the Government if it was the intention of the government to make the provisions of the Interpretation Act not applicable in the administration of this bill. I would ask him if it was the intention of the government to make the provisions of the Canada Evidence Act not applicable in relation to any matter covered by this bill. The Canada Evidence Act, as I understand it, does provide the safeguard that where a person is under examination, no answer given in the course of such examination or any statement can be used or received in evidence against him in any criminal trial. Was it the intention of the government to make sure that that protection of the Canada Evidence Act did not apply?

Of course, there is the case of the Bill of Rights, which Senator Smith referred to. I don't know, and I don't think anybody knows, whether the provisions of this bill are intended to make the provisions of the Bill of Rights completely inoperative. The Bill of Rights, of course, makes it clear that there must be an express statement that such and such a bill does not abrogate the provisions of the Bill of Rights. On the other hand, this notorious clause 20, and particularly subclause (8) which was discussed in the dialogue between Senator Smith (Colchester) and Senator Forsey, expressly declares that certain orders of the Administrator are binding on the person against whom they are made notwithstanding any other law enacted or made.

Is that an express declaration that the Bill of Rights does not apply? The minister says that he does not think it does. I would ask the Leader of the Government to tell us if it was the intention of the government that the Bill of Rights should not apply to any action taken under this act by a civil servant or other person? I would ask him also if it is the intention of the government to make inapplicable those extraordinary remedies for which we have fought for 700 years—the extraordinary remedies of the law like habeas corpus? The application of habeas corpus seems to be brought into doubt by this act, also the great writ of mandamus, the great writ of certiorari, and others. Is there anything in the bill that might suggest this?

There most certainly is, and I shall come to it in a moment. It is here—and I should remember the notorious phraseology of this clause, which says that all these traditional remedies cannot be applied against the administrator. This bill is so utterly confused—it runs back and forth—so that we can never tell quite where these things are. I thought I had marked it in red; I marked the notorious ones in red.

● (2040)

Senator Flynn: That is the proper colour.

Senator Grosart: The less notorious ones—

Senator Perrault: The ones you support are marked in blue, I suppose.

Senator Grosart: In blue. I am sorry, but I will find it.

Senator Croll: We hope you do not.

Senator Grosart: That is a good suggestion. Senator Croll says he hopes I do not find it, and I am sure that sentiment has great support on the other side.

I will continue, and deal with the question of the nullification of the power of the courts. When we go back we find that the draftsmen of the bill, no doubt acting on the instructions of the government, wondered if they had really done what they were supposed to and written the courts out. So we come to clause 38, where we read as follows:

For greater certainty, a decision or order of the Administrator under this Act is not subject to review or to—

This is the clause for which I was searching, and it is also marked in red. I shall read it once more:

For greater certainty, a decision or order of the Administrator under this Act is not subject to review or to be restrained, prohibited, removed, set aside or otherwise dealt with except to the extent and in the manner provided by this Act—

The "extent and manner provided in this act" is so minimal that it is not worth even quoting. I ask: Is it the intention, is it the policy, of the government in inserting this clause to make inapplicable completely all these traditional instruments for the protection of individual rights against arbitrariness on the part of the government or the executive? Perhaps the Leader of the Government, as he sponsored the bill, will help me in this. He only shook his head once. He is not shaking his head every time I ask these questions, but at least on one we have this indication that it was not the intention of the government, and I hope he will return to the subject and say that it was not the intention of the government to abrogate any or all of these fundamental civil rights and remedies.

Senator Perrault: I shall reply in due time, but I wish to give you a fair hearing first.

Senator Grosart: Yes. The Leader of Government always gives me a fair hearing, and I have no objection if he wishes to ask me some questions as I go along, because he knows I always appreciate his questions. I know they are very much to the point and are asked for no other reason than to be helpful to me.

I come now to my two final points. First, the provinces. There are various interpretations of this bill in this area. I will mention only one point. The bill says very clearly that if the Government of Canada enters into an agreement with the government of any province, the result of that agreement will become binding law.

All I ask is: Did someone forget that section 92 of the British North America Act does not give the government of any province the right to enter into any agreement to change the Constitution? Section 92 says explicitly that the legislature of the province has the exclusive jurisdiction. Yet we have this clear statement that if two governments get together they can change the Constitution. They cannot. Those rights are rights vested in the legislature and not in any government, either federal or provincial. There is no mention of this obvious fact that these rights are vested in the legislature, and in my view no agreement between any two governments can change the British North America Act.

Finally I come to the matter of regulations. There has been some discussion of this. Senator Smith raised the question. The "guts" of it are obviously the regulations; yet we do not have them. We have these fantastic powers for the administrator, for the Governor General in Council to make the regulations and the Anti-Inflation Board and the administrator to administer them. Senator Smith said that surely we should have the regulations before us before we are asked to pass the bill. The Leader of the Government said, "Oh no; are you really suggesting we should always have the regulations before us before we pass a bill?"

I think that was what Senator Smith was suggesting. Certainly it is what I have suggested before and will continue to suggest. I say that until we are in a position where we in the Senate say that we will not pass any bill until we have the regulations before us, we are probably not doing the job we could do in this respect, because we know that over and over again the regulations are the bill.

We always have this statement: "How can public servants come up with the regulations until the bill is passed?" What nonsense. Of course they have come up with the regulations.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator McIlraith: They have come up with proposed regulations.

Senator Grosart: Yes. Proposed to whom? Not Parliament. Parliament has nothing to do with them.

Senator Perrault: The most they can do is draft proposed regulations.

Senator Grosart: They are proposed at that time. Parliament never sees them. From being proposed at that stage they become regulations in force under the act, if there is an order in council to that effect. I say it is an abrogation of our responsibility ever to pass a bill when we do not have the regulations.

Public servants say that they have to wait until the regulations are passed. If someone says that the government proposes legislation and then says, "We do not know what regulations are necessary to make it effective," then that government has to be out of its mind. Of course they know what the regulations are, because the government lays down what it wants to achieve. When the government asks the draftsmen to draft a bill it says, "This is what we want to achieve." They do it in two ways: first in the wording of the bill, and, secondly, in the regulations.

The government in this case has come forward and said "We do not know what the regulations are." Yet we have the administrator prescribing regulations which are not yet in force. But he is making statements every day—I do not know what he calls them; that is my interpretation—such as to the effect, "All right, Falconbridge can have a 37 per cent increase." I am not objecting to that, but he does not have the regulations that permit him to do so, nor do we. We do not know on what authority he makes those decision, and this, of course, will continue until we have the regulations. Then we will be faced with a situation which we are faced with now—we will be faced with an act which we know nothing about now in terms of what it is intended to mean.

● (2050)

I say to the Leader of the Government, I hope the time will come when, not only in the case of this legislation but in the case of every bill that comes before us, we will insist on having the regulations, and if the public servants cannot come up with them, they can go home and go on the pensions to which they are entitled.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I should like to add a little to what has already been said on Bill C-73. First of all, this is an emergency bill, and my views will not differ in any significant respect from the views of those who want to see an improvement in the problem of inflation.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, Bill C-73 is in my view one of the most important pieces of legislation we have had to date.

About the year 300, Emperor Diocletian issued a decree to fight inflation then rampant, freezing prices and wages. He did not then refer to escalating expectancies, but much more directly to the greed of the people who, in his words, "think only of personal gain and profit margin."

Under that emperor, those violating the new decree incurred capital punishment. The edict provided for fixed and specified prices for approximately one thousand items. Well, that simple and comprehensive scheme, with capital punishment for violators, failed to stop the galloping inflation then rampant. Prices kept on rising. Money kept depreciating despite that harsh legislation without loopholes and without the contagious effects of spiralling inflation problems in foreign countries.

In the preamble to his edict, Diocletian attempted to put the blame for rising prices on dishonest merchants who, said he, were defrauding the people.

But the empire was at that time, much as is the state today, the most important business corporation by far, and the major inflationary force. But it had no wish to change and amend itself. The reason, at that time as today, was that the state did not dare indispose the people or reduce their benefits.

Rather than put its own house in order, the Roman state built up a bureaucracy to establish and maintain artificial economic ceilings. Nonetheless, the great hope to solve inflation by way of an edict totally collapsed.

Bill C-73 now before us proposes a series of emergency measures to solve an inflationary situation that has now become threatening, but that nobody will indeed solve in any way. Indeed, as I suggested a few days ago, nobody among our economists, among our government advisers or among our representatives ventured to recommend a superior economic plan that would offer a more valuable or surer alternative than the anti-inflation program proposed in Bill C-73.

Up to now, the government had refrained from price and wage control legislation to fight inflation. Lest it contribute to increase unemployment it had even refrained from tightening the purse strings, containing expansion and the abundant flow of Canadian currency outstanding, or compressing the economy and the gross national output as it could have done with appropriate anti-inflation monetary measures. Despite the warnings in our statistics, for the reasons I mentioned, our government then chose to help our Canadian citizens to live here with the least constraints possible due to unemployment in a greater freedom of action for their development and in the absence of punitive restraints or control over their economic liberties.

But this, like anything else here or elsewhere, had a price, a price that had to be paid and which could not be postponed indefinitely in the future or be submitted in the near future to a period of restriction and fight against inflation to counterbalance a nearly artificial and inflationary expansion. Other industrialized countries followed this very model in various degrees and the people of those countries benefited from the same advantages as we did. They must now also pay and return—as we will have to do—to the great realities and the great economic principles.

Observance of the great economic principles remains our best corrective guarantee and the desirable and sure way of really solving our inflation problems here in Canada. Unfortunately that is what the majority of Canadians are trying to avoid considering and refuse to see implemented by our government. Every day brings evidence that Canadians feel really incapable of worthy sacrifices to fight inflation. They do not even understand the appeal made on patriotic grounds.

The government was against controls. The measures proposed in Bill C-73 involve a fight plan which, I think, it never found attractive and in spite of all that was done to make it less cumbersome for the people, the plan proves to be most unpopular. The plan in itself gives rise to a score of serious problems. It does not give a mandate having enough scope to achieve its aim entirely. I do not share the opinion expressed earlier that this legislation grants some powers to the officials who will eventually enforce it.

This bill offers many loopholes to those who want to escape the controls. As it is now, this legislation cannot be enforced. It applies only to certain classes of people and corporations. I feel this is essentially bad and will bring about embarrassing confrontations.

As proposed, this legislation is still open to a great many interpretations which may change its scope and cause confusion in the minds of the Canadian people.

Some people even suggest that parts of Bill C-73 are unconstitutional. Therefore, this bill will hardly gain unanimous support, in spite of the fact that the sponsors hope to obtain universal endorsement and cooperation, to make it reasonably operative.

● (2100)

[English]

A number of references have been made to what was done through control legislation in Great Britain, the most experienced nation in the Western World with respect to control laws and how they operate. It is from such an examination that I must conclude that Britain cannot offer us a solid restrictive control law as an example to follow. During the past ten years Britain legislated certain control policies on six separate occasions. Mr. Harold Wilson introduced 13 bills between 1966 and 1968 to control, in one way or another, certain prices and incomes. The provisions became increasingly stringent and in 1969 the whole policy was abandoned, after having been declared a failure. Mr. Edward Heath introduced two bills, but electoral defeat obliterated the whole policy. The Government of the United Kingdom has claimed that the greed of business profiteers and labour leaders have been the major factor in rising prices. Measures for price and wage controls have been at the heart of political controversy. In Britain they challenged accepted traditions of free enterprise by business and free collective bargaining by unions. You can already sense that these traditions, and other principles as well, will be involved and challenged here.

At the other extreme, wage controls in Britain did not assist productivity there; quite the contrary. The one resulting cardinal point to be noted from their experience is that such a price and income freeze can be made effective for no more than approximately six months, after which the basic law of supply and demand resumes its reign with even more force. Indeed, that is exactly what happened in Britain in 1966, 1972 and 1973.

The only effectiveness of a price and income freeze is that it can, for a short time, allow a breathing space during which other policies can be formulated to tackle inflation at its source. Unfortunately, the lessons to be learned from Britain's experience have not been recognized in Bill C-73.

It seems to me that the public is gradually coming to the view that inflation derives from the government's tendency to create money when it cannot balance its budget. But in Britain, when they tried to put into effect a policy of centralized control of prices and wages, it proved to be insensitive to economic differences. It simply collided with the realities of world supply and demand—as it does wherever it is tried, and as it will again here, in spite of the control legislation we are now considering.

The government's purpose in proposing this legislation is to save Canada from yet another period of runaway inflation, which the country could not endure without serious long-range damage to its basic economy and growth as a progressive nation. Even if we admit that inflation is worldwide and that we can only buck it timidly, with little assurance of more than short-term, minimal results, nevertheless, we must try to fight it. That is the government's position.

But I am against controls. I have said so in this chamber a number of times. I stressed that point only a few days ago when speaking on the anti-inflation White Paper, "Attack on Inflation". Owing to the seriousness of runaway inflation, however, despite the stance I have taken previously, I will support what I consider acceptable legislation for establishing government controls so long as they meet two criteria: first, any attempt to restrain inflation must be restricted to this particular time; second, the method of restraint must be within reasonable or decent bounds. In that respect, the regulations under Bill C-73 are not sufficiently detailed. There are too many generalities and too little attention paid to their possible far-reaching implications.

Unfortunately, in my opinion, there are still some constitutional and controversial aspects to Bill C-73. It is not easy to resolve such difficult areas, but it seems clear to me that they could render certain aspects of the legislation somewhat weak, if not entirely inoperative.

● (2110)

Besides establishing inequalities, the proposed exemptions are insufficiently spelled out in the bill. I find in Bill C-73 no control of food prices at the farm gate level, if my interpretation of the bill is correct, whereas other prices and wages are controlled. Partial controls of this type have been tried elsewhere, but did not work. I do not believe they will work here either, even if the situation is temporarily eased by federal control of the federal marketing agencies and by provincial control of the provincial marketing agencies. How can one say that controls will not directly apply at the farm gate level to commodity items, to food, and to the operations of small merchants, which can only be controlled by a vast bureaucracy, since the items involved represent some 30 to 34 per cent of the family budget? This situation has started to create considerable resentment because of the fear of the two-wage, two measure legislation. We are adding to our problems. It may produce a backlash and could make this whole exercise messy and difficult.

In order to beat inflation we need investment in new productive capacity. This is stated in the White Paper,

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

"Attack on Inflation", and is agreed with by the business sector, and has been conceded by some labour leaders.

Investment in new productive capacity requires that corporate profits be used for such expansion. Such an arrangement is basic for providing jobs and at the same time for stemming increases in prices by avoiding shortages and increasing supply. To attain this end it will also be necessary to increase productivity per unit of labour; indeed, this cannot be achieved without the full cooperation and understanding of labour.

Acceptance of this bill is also essential on the part of the investment community. If the government's measures against inflation are judged by the investment community to be likely to fail, there will be only limited capital available in Canada for firms affected by Bill C-73, and this can only work against us.

The guidelines will allow prices to increase only to the extent of increases in costs where these can be related to a particular product. Where this relationship cannot be established, the profit margin allowed will not be permitted to exceed 95 per cent of the average of the pretax profit margin of the preceding five years.

If a firm's production is intended for the export market, sales of these goods will have to be at world market prices, which could, under Bill C-73, be higher than the prices at which the goods could be sold at home. This would make them subject to a special tax on export profits which, of course, would discourage the production of goods for export, and have a tendency to lower employment and growth.

Bill C-73 provides for the freezing of dividends. Investors, whose investments we so badly need, will become very coy because of this guideline, as any company will have to obtain permission if it feels there is a need to pay higher dividends to raise new capital, in which case it may be allowed by the board. This dependency will not be easily accepted by investors everywhere, and I am afraid we are not helping the expansion of our economy through capital investment with the provisions contained in Bill C-73 with respect to dividends.

Over the next 10 years Canada will need hundreds of billions of dollars if we are to provide jobs for our growing labour force, if we are to have the necessary energy for our industry and homes, and if we are to improve our standard of living. This expansion capital will have to come from somewhere. Its normal source is primarily the profits made by the firms which re-invest in expanding production. The tendency is to cut the corporate margin of profit more and more, and now, with Bill C-73, company profits will be further limited, at a time when foreign investors may be scared away because of their prospects.

Bill C-73 provides the anti-inflation guidelines, but business, labour and the public must realize that the profits of firms which are re-invested in Canada to improve activity or increase production must be allowed. There can be no uncertainty about this, or that the program will work, because if it does not we are in for runaway inflation or very tight controls.

Bill C-73 does not prohibit or control strikes based on pay demands that exceed the guidelines as it should, but it does limit the annual wage increase. How can this restrictive legislation be made operative on one side and not on the other?

There is no point in my going on and stating some of the other imperfections. As I have said, the seriousness of runaway inflation makes it imperative, in my opinion at least, to support legislation that tends to constructively correct and control our economy at this particular time. However, I realize how imperfect some of these provisions may be.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

● (2120)

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

FIFTH REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Senator Stanbury, for Senator Buckwold, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, tabled the following report:

Monday, December 8, 1975.

The Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service has the honour to present its Fifth Report as follows:

Pursuant to the Order of Reference of the House of Commons of Friday, November 7, 1975, your Committee has considered Bill C-52, An Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act and has agreed to report it with the following amendments:

Clause 9

Strike out line 19 on page 11 and substitute the following therefor:

"(i) if the contributor named his estate as his beneficiary or named another"

Strike out line 26 on page 12 and substitute the following therefor:

"deceased the contributor.

(5.1) The Treasury Board may, in its discretion, notwithstanding any direction made by the Board under subsection (5), direct that an annual allowance payable to a widow be apportioned among several applicants for the allowance, in which case any direction made under subsection (5) shall be deemed to be revoked.

(5.2) Any direction made under subsection (5.1) may from time to time be reviewed and varied."

Clause 11

Strike out line 2 on page 14 and substitute the following therefor:

"(c) if the contributor named his estate as his beneficiary or named another bene-"

Clause 23

Strike out lines 14 to 24 on page 23 and substitute the following therefor:

"to be the widow of a contributor, that the widow of a contributor be deemed to have predeceased him or that any annual allowance payable to a widow be apportioned, in similar circumstances, the Treasury Board may, for the purpose of determining entitlement under Part II to any benefit payable to the widow of the participant as such, direct that a woman be deemed to be the widow of the participant or that the widow of the participant be deemed to have predeceased him, as the case may be, and may apportion the benefit payable under Part II."

Clause 24

Strike out line 32 on page 23 and substitute the following therefor:

"under subsection 50(1), named his estate as his beneficiary or named another bene-"

Strike out lines 11 to 15 on page 24 and substitute the following therefor:

"his death, to his spouse, unless

(a) she does not survive him;

(b) he names his estate as his beneficiary under any regulations made under paragraphs 50(1) (e.1) and (e.2); or

(c) he names another beneficiary under any regulations made under paragraphs 50(1) (e.1) and (e.2)."

Clause 25

Strike out line 22 on page 24 and substitute the following therefor:

"(e.2) authorizing a contributor to name his estate as his beneficiary and prescribing classes of persons"

Clause 28

Strike out line 17 on page 26 and substitute the following therefor:

"poyees in the public service of Canada.

(3) The Governor in Council may, by regulation, provide that the service of an employee of the Institute or the Society in respect of which contributions have been made in anticipation of the addition to Part II of Schedule A to the Public Service Superannuation Act of the Institute or the Society may, to such extent, at such level of remuneration; and subject to such conditions as the regulations may prescribe, be counted by that employee as pensionable service for the purposes of Part I of that Act."

Clause 36

Strike out line 17 on page 32 and substitute the following therefor:

"36. (1) Subsection 9(1) of the said Act is amended by adding the word "or" at the end of paragraph (b) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(c) in the case of a contributor who has to his credit less than six years of pensionable service, the average annual pay received by him during the period of pensionable service to his credit."

(2) All that portion of subsection 9(2)"

Clause 39

Strike out line 25 on page 37 and substitute the following therefor:

"(i) if the contributor named his estate as his beneficiary or named another"

Strike out line 50 on page 38 and substitute the following therefor:

"deceased the contributor.

(5.1) The Treasury Board may, in its discretion, notwithstanding any direction made by the Board under subsection (5), direct that an annual allowance payable to a widow be apportioned among several applicants for the allowance, in which case any direction made under subsection (5) shall be deemed to be revoked.

(5.2) Any direction made under subsection (5.1) may from time to time be reviewed and varied."

Clause 42

Strike out line 7 on page 41 and substitute the following therefor:

"(c) if the contributor named his estate as his beneficiary or named another bene."

Clause 43

Strike out line 6 on page 43 and substitute the following therefor:

"into force of this subparagraph,"

(3) Paragraph 20 (1)(b) of the said Act is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of subparagraph (i) thereof and by adding thereto immediately after subparagraph (i) thereof the following subparagraph:

"(i.1) any amount paid to him as a return of contributions under this Act in respect of that period, and"

Clause 45

Strike out lines 21 to 39, inclusive, on page 44 and substitute the following therefor:

"45. Subsection 31(3) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(3) Where, in any circumstances, the Treasury Board may, for any purpose of the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act or Part I of this Act, direct that a woman be deemed to be the widow of a contributor, that the widow of a contributor be deemed to have predeceased him or that any pension or annual allowance payable to a widow be apportioned, in similar circumstances, the Treasury Board may, for the purpose of determining entitlement under Part II to any benefit payable to the widow of a participant as such, direct that a woman be deemed to be the widow of the participant or that the widow of the participant be deemed to have predeceased him, as the case may be, and may apportion the benefit payable under Part II."

[Senator Stanbury.]

Clause 46

Strike out line 8 on page 45 and substitute the following therefor:

"under subsection 42(1), named his estate as his beneficiary or named another bene."

Strike out lines 23 to 27 on page 45 and substitute the following therefor:

"death, to his widow, unless

(a) she does not survive him;

(b) he names his estate as his beneficiary under any regulations made under paragraph 42(1) (d.1) and (d.2); or

(c) he names another beneficiary under any regulations made under paragraphs 42(1) (d.1) and (d.2)."

Clause 47

Strike out line 35 on page 45 and substitute the following therefor:

"(d.2) authorizing a contributor to name his estate as his beneficiary and prescribing classes of per-"

Clause 51

Strike out line 3 on page 49 and substitute the following therefor:

"this Act, to have predeceased the officer.

(3) The Treasury Board may, in its discretion, notwithstanding any direction made by the Board under subsection (2), direct that a pension payable to a widow be apportioned among several applicants for the pension, in which case any direction made under subsection (3) shall be deemed to be revoked.

(4) Any direction made under subsection (3) may from time to time be reviewed and varied."

Clause 57

Strike out line 5 on page 53 and substitute the following therefor:

"57. (1) Subsection 9(1) of the said Act is amended by adding the word "or" at the end of paragraph (b) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(c) in the case of a contributor who has to his credit less than six years of pensionable service, the average annual pay received by him during the period of pensionable service to his credit."

(2) All that portion of subsection 9(2)"

Clause 60

Strike out line 3 on page 60 and substitute the following therefor:

"section 22(1), named his estate as his beneficiary or named another beneficiary"

Strike out lines 12 to 39 on page 60 and substitute the following therefor:

"(3) Subsections 13(4) and (5) of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(4) For the purposes of this Part, a woman who

(a) establishes to the satisfaction of the Treasury Board that she had, for a period of not less than three years immediately prior to the death of a contributor with whom she had been residing and whom by law she was prohibited from marrying by reason of a previous marriage either of the contributor or of herself to another person, been publicly represented by that contributor as his wife, or

(b) establishes to the satisfaction of the Treasury Board that she had, for a period of not less than one year immediately prior to the death of a contributor with whom she had been residing, been publicly represented by that contributor as his wife, and that at the time of the death of that contributor neither she nor the contributor was married to any other person, shall, if the Treasury Board so directs, be deemed to be the widow of that contributor and to have become married to him at such time as she commenced being so represented as his wife, and for the purpose of this Part a woman to whom this subsection would apply, but for her marriage to a contributor after such time as she commenced being so represented as his wife, shall, if the Treasury Board so directs, be deemed to have become married to that contributor at the time when, in fact, she commenced being so represented.

(5) If, upon the death of a contribu-

Strike out line 4 on page 61 and substitute the following therefor:

"tributor."

(5.1) The Treasury Board may, in its discretion, notwithstanding any direction made by the Board under subsection (5), direct that an annual allowance payable to a widow be apportioned among several applicants for the allowance, in which case any direction made under subsection (5) shall be deemed to be revoked.

(5.2) Any direction made under subsection (5.1) may from time to time be reviewed and varied."

Clause 63

Strike out line 38 on page 62 and substitute the following therefor:

"22(1), named his estate as his beneficiary or named another beneficiary who may"

Clause 65

Strike out line 38 on page 64 and substitute the following therefor:

"(i.2) authorizing a contributor to name his estate as his beneficiary and prescribing classes of persons."

Clause 73

Strike out line 30 on page 68 and substitute the following therefor:

"to the end of the month in which he ceases to be a child, the annuity being"

Clause 89

Strike out line 22 on page 76 and substitute the following therefor:

"89. (1) Paragraphs 24(2)(c), (d) and (e)"

Strike out line 14 on page 77 and substitute the following therefor:

"section 18(3).

(2) Section 24 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(3) For the purposes of paragraph 24(1)(a), any period during which a person is a member, after that person has, pursuant to paragraph 22(1)(c) ceased to contribute in respect of his current sessional indemnity, is deemed to be a period of pensionable service to the credit of that person."

Clause 98

Strike out line 1 on page 82 and substitute the following therefor:

"98. (1) Subsection 25(3) of the Judges Act,"

Strike out lines 8 to 10 on page 82 and substitute the following therefor:

"suspended in the event of her remarriage.

(3.1) Where payment of an annuity to the wife or widow of a judge has, upon her remarriage, been suspended pursuant to subsection (3) or ceased pursuant to subsection 25(3) of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, c. J-1 or any provision similar to that provision contained in any of the Acts mentioned in paragraph (1)(b); payment of the annuity to the former wife or widow of the judge shall be resumed on the dissolution or annulment of her subsequent marriage or the"

Strike out line 28 on page 82 and substitute the following therefor:

"this Act.

(2) Where an annuity is determined to be payable pursuant to the Judges Act, as amended by this Act, to a person who was not eligible for the annuity immediately prior to the coming into force of this section, the annuity is not payable for any period before the day on which this section came into force."

Your Committee has ordered a reprint of Bill C-52, as amended, for the use of the House of Commons at the report stage.

Respectfully submitted,

Sidney L. Buckwold.
Joint Chairman.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, December 9, 1975, at 11 a.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: I think we should have a word of explanation. It seems strange that we should adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning when committees are scheduled to meet. We have a lot of work to do. It would seem that the debate on Bill C-73 will not continue for more than two or three hours, and I cannot see why we should be sitting at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, it is true that committees will be sitting tomorrow morning. The National Finance Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. but the house will not sit until 11. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee scheduled a meeting in case the present legislation was referred to it. As the bill has not passed second reading, the committee will likely shift its sitting to tomorrow afternoon.

The second reason is that the Minister of Finance will be in Washington on Wednesday and therefore would not be able to appear before the committee before Thursday. If this bill is passed early tomorrow afternoon, the minister can attend the committee tomorrow afternoon and, if necessary, in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, if the Standing Senate Committees on Foreign Affairs and National Finance are sitting tomorrow morning, will they be seeking permission to carry on while the Senate is sitting?

Senator Langlois: The Committee on National Finance will very likely complete its hearing before 11 a.m. If the other committee has not received permission, it will have to adjourn at 11 a.m.

Senator Grosart: What about the Foreign Affairs Committee?

Senator Langlois: I have just explained that it will have to adjourn at 11 a.m. if it has not completed its sitting by then.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 9, 1975

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976, and I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of today and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix pp. 1565-1570.)

The Clerk Assistant (Reading):

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976, were referred, has in obedience to the order of, reference of Tuesday, November 13, 1975, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (A) and reports as follows:

1. In obedience to the foregoing the Committee made a general examination of the Supplementary Estimates (A) and heard evidence from the Honourable—

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Sparrow requested that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of Proceedings, so what is the purpose of reading it now? We will have occasion, I suggest, to do so.

Senator Langlois: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move adoption of the report now.

Senator Grosart: No. I happen to be a member of the committee and I have not even seen the report.

Senator Sparrow moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ANTI-INFLATION LEGISLATION

MEETING OF MINISTER OF FINANCE AND PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIVES RE IMPLEMENTATION OF GUIDELINES— QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I understand that the Minister of Finance met yesterday with provincial representatives to discuss the implementation of the anti-inflation legislation guidelines. I was wondering whether the Leader of the Government had a report to give to the Senate on that meeting.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am unable to give a report at this time. However, I think it is of importance to both chambers that we have a report, and I shall undertake to obtain the information as quickly as possible. With leave, I would like to report to the Senate later this day.

Senator Flynn: Apparently it was mentioned on the radio this morning that there was general agreement by the provinces that the duration of the anti-inflation legislation should not be for more than 18 months.

Senator Perrault: I understand the view has been expressed by one or two provinces that the duration of the program be not more than 18 months. Throughout this whole process of attempting to construct an effective campaign against inflation, the government has been quite flexible in its attitudes. The only information I have thus far is that the conversations were very constructive and positive. But, as I say, I shall attempt to have a more detailed reply later.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—ENLARGEMENT OF ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS NATIONAL PARK—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if it is a fact that the government plans to spend $30 million this year to enlarge the national park on the St. Lawrence River? I am asking this in view of the now frequently referred to curtailment of expenditures. Although not an enormous sum, this seems to be one item that could be dispensed with.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that I am unable to provide specific details with respect to the possible enlargement of this park, and I must take this part of the question as notice.

● (1110)

In reply to the broader point raised by Senator Molson—the expenditures by the federal government over the next 12 months—I want to assure honourable senators that the government is very cognizant of the fact that to develop a national consensus in support of the anti-inflation guidelines, an example must be set by the government itself.

Government expenditures in all areas are presently under intensive review, and perhaps an announcement will be made shortly with respect to the government's own spending program.

Senator Asselin: It is about time!

ANTI-INFLATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for second reading of Bill C-73, to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices and dividends and compensation in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the legislation contained in Bill C-73 is of an importance that cannot be ignored. In the more than seventeen years that I have been sitting in Parliament, I do not remember having before us more significant, more serious legislation, even the bill which followed the proclamation of war measures in 1970—nothing of that kind has been presented to Parliament since I began to sit here. As we all recall, that legislation was aimed at and affected the freedom of only a small group. Bill C-73 concerns the vast majority of the people by imposing a straitjacket on the economy in a really exceptional manner.

To find a precedent to this bill, one must go back to the Second World War and to the controls that were set then in all sectors, especially over prices and wages. That, to my knowledge, was the first experience of that type in Canada, and it occurred in circumstances far different from those surrounding the introduction of Bill C-73.

It is interesting to compare the two situations. In 1941, all of continental Europe except for Switzerland, Spain and Portugal was occupied by Germany and its allies. Spain and Portugal were rather sympathetic to Hitler and Mussolini. On the other hand, the United States had not yet entered the war. That was before Pearl Harbor. During that year as it was drawing to a close, in October 1941, inflation had reached a rate of 7 per cent only, but 7 per cent, at that time, was enough to alarm the government. Shortages of goods were developing. Black markets were springing up here and there and, the government, in order to cope with the situation, decided to consult the various sectors of the population, especially the union leaders. They obtained from them, in advance, the assurance of their cooperation with respect to the setting up of a wage and price freeze, for in that instance it was a freeze rather than a control measure.

Naturally, the general attitude amongst the people favoured controls, and the government at the time had only to invoke the War Measures Act which gave them all powers without their having to face constitutional problems. Such a situation was quite different from what we have today. The problem of inflation is not a recent one. It goes back five or six years. In any case, since the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau took the reins of power, inflation has gone up 58 percent. Up to now all the efforts made by the government to wrestle it to the ground have failed. Up until October, the government had absolutely refused to enforce any form of price and income controls; their point was that they were inefficient or, better still, they argued that they could not control inflation because it was caused by external factors.

[Senator Perrault.]

Last Spring, the government tried to achieve a voluntary freeze or a relative control of salaries through consultation with the union leaders. But the latter refused any form of cooperation in this respect.

On the other hand, a little over a year ago the Canadian people, being called upon to elect a new Parliament, rejected in no uncertain terms the program put forward by the Progressive Conservative Party and involving a freeze on salaries and prices followed by a relative control.

Another factor; finally, is that the government at this moment do not have at their disposal the War Measures Act. They must not forget in introducing Bill C-73, that their authority is limited under the provisions of the British North America Act.

Having described briefly the situation which prevailed in 1941 and the one prevailing in 1975, we find out that the legislative problem before us is much more complex than the one with which Mr. Mackenzie King was faced. It must be pointed out that part of the difficulties encountered by the central government—a large part I should say—is a result of its own turpitude, its failure to act quickly, and perhaps even its electoral hypocrisy.

In the White Paper, the government outlined for our information its anti-inflation program. We were thus given the general guidelines it intends to follow in order to control wages and prices. We were already given the opportunity of debating this matter and I do not intend to deal with it again today, but I would just like to consider Bill C-73 by itself, separately, if I may say so, from the guidelines, as they are called in the bill.

Once again, this is an exceptional bill, a frightening bill, a strange bill which leaves an extremely bad impression and makes us wonder what exactly the thought was which inspired those who wrote it. Several speakers who spoke before me, indeed almost all of them, apart from the Leader of the Government who introduced the legislation and who pointed out its advantages—of course, there are some, but he did not linger, and we did not expect him to do so actually, on the negative aspects or on the inadequacies of the legislation—had serious reservations concerning the bill, except maybe, if I am not mistaken, Senator Austin. He delivered a good speech. I did not have time to read it through but I would like to congratulate him as well as, of course, the Leader of the Government and all the others who took part in the debate up to now.

Although I may be repeating what has already been said, I would like to consider the way in which the government wants to control prices and wages. The bill divides this responsibility among four power levels: first, the Governor in Council, that is to say, the government; second, the Anti-Inflation Board; third, the Administrator responsible for enforcement and, fourth, the Appeal Tribunal.

● (1120)

It is interesting to see how the powers have been assigned to each of those four levels. But before going into this, I would like to refer the Senate to the areas of application of the act as outlined in clauses 3 and 4.

Clause 3 applies the guidelines to all suppliers and employees generally, in the areas of its jurisdiction.

Nevertheless—I wanted to point this out—the guidelines would not apply, under this section, to the employees of a supplier when they number less than 500, except in the case of the construction industry, where this minimum is reduced to 20. Only those building contractors who employ up to 20 workers will not come under these guidelines.

Now, there is another exception, and it would eventually be covered by provincial legislation or a federal government agreement, and that is the professional category, in respect of which the legislation would be applicable only if the provincial government, which has jurisdiction in such matters, were to decide to apply the guidelines with respect to them.

But, at this time, I only wanted to point out that there are rather important exceptions in the application of the guidelines, particularly with respect to employees.

I wonder whether such an exemption will not generate problems or pressures from those groups that are directly affected and will see other groups being exempted from the legislation.

The second point concerning the application of the legislation is, obviously, the fact that the government, in section 4, recognizes that this legislation can apply to provinces,—

- Subject to subsection (3), this Act is not binding on
- (a) Her Majesty in right of a province and agents of Her Majesty in right of a province;
 - (b) municipalities in a province . . .
 - (c) corporations, commissions . . .
 - (d) such other bodies in a province as provide what are generally considered to be public services and as are from time to time prescribed by the regulations for the purposes of that province.

However, the act provides that the minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into an agreement with the government of a province providing for the application of this act and the guidelines to a province, and to all public bodies or agencies under its authority.

Obviously, although I do not know for sure, nothing indicates that any such an agreement was entered into up to now. I know that two or three provinces either passed or are considering passing legislation which would make applicable some provisions of the act, or some guidelines in areas under their jurisdiction.

It is interesting to note the difference between subclauses 3 and 4 of clause 4, because in one case it deals with an agreement providing for the application of the act and guidelines, while in the other it deals with an agreement providing for the application of some guidelines, or if you prefer, part of the federal program.

However, I was wondering whether an agreement can be passed by a provincial government otherwise than under a power provided through special legislation. I do not see very well how, by a mere order in council, a provincial government could sign an agreement with the federal government. No doubt the federal government realizes the necessity of being allowed by Parliament to conclude that agreement since it is specifically provided for in subclause 4.

I point out those features concerning the scope of the act to indicate some of the problems which could occur, especially about the differences which might exist between provincial and federal programs. Undoubtedly, if the provinces do not agree to comply specifically with the federal program, there will still be some problems resulting from pressures exercised by some groups more strictly controlled than others, since under provincial jurisdiction precisely the same guidelines as those intended by the federal government will not have been applied.

One more word on this subject. I referred earlier to professional people. Clearly the control of their fees requires legislation or intervention by the provincial government. Most professional rates are set by the government and I cannot see how without the efficient and, let us say positive, assistance of the provincial government, professional fees could be controlled. I know very well that when the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau announced the program on October 13, he made much of the fact that it would apply to professional people, and I am all for it. There is no doubt about it. They like everybody else must be subject to the controls and guidelines. But enforcement is an entirely different thing, and wishing and hoping that the problem will be solved is not enough to solve it. New methods will have to be found which will require very strict controls, without which people might have reason to doubt that this program applies fairly to all categories of Canadians.

I come now to the sharing of responsibilities between the four levels.

First, the responsibilities of the Governor in Council: as indicated previously, the guidelines which the Governor in Council may publish from time to time pursuant to Clause 3 are not known. Of course, the White Paper has made us aware of the guidelines generally, but some people have suggested and continue to suggest that the guidelines cannot be made public before the adoption of the bill. This point having been examined yesterday, I shall dispense with it. In fact, if the government knew exactly where it stood, it could include the relevant regulations in the legislation. But the truth is, it is because the government wants some leeway to operate and change its guidelines and controls as it sees fit that it does not make them public now. If they were published now, Parliament or the public could believe that the legislation is nothing more than the already known, formulated and published guidelines, and it is clear that this legislation is giving the federal government an absolute and all-inclusive mandate. As a matter of fact, it can apply any guideline it pleases and in the manner it pleases, change them, reactivate them, and so on. It is an open mandate, a blank cheque which the Governor in Council is giving itself through this legislation.

Now, as regards the Anti-Inflation Board, we must recognize that it does not represent such a serious problem in the legislation, because its powers are primarily those of review, investigation and recommendation. It reports to the Governor in Council or to the administrator. Its role is important, but it does not create a problem in terms of administration or of restraint of the freedom of individuals.

However, such is not the case of the administrator in his administrative function. Here we find the bill's major weaknesses. The administrator has not yet been appointed and I am wondering who he is since most people believe, I feel, that the administrator and the board's chairman are the same person. It is really a czar who will be appointed to apply the law. I am wondering whether this administrator will not have more powers than Mr. Donald Gordon had when he was chairman of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board.

● (1130)

Indeed, this administrator can require anything from anyone at anytime, launch any investigation he deems appropriate, and his powers are not subject to court control except in cases of searches. Of course, when he has to search he must seek the authorization to do so from a superior court. But when he knows what he wants, he may go and take it without any problem. It is a power, I think, which goes beyond the one given to the Minister of National Revenue under the Income Tax Act.

But, the last straw, as pointed out by other speakers, is that Clause 20 authorizes the Administrator to make an order requiring whoever contravenes the guidelines to pay Her Majesty a certain amount. In short, he is empowered to levy, call it what you will, a tax or a fine. Both, in fact, because, in some cases, in addition to Mr. So and So having to reimburse Her Majesty the profits he should not have made or the increase in salary he should not have received, he will be required to pay, because he knew what he was doing, a 25 per cent fine. That order, as such, is equal to an indisputable assessment that can be recovered before the Federal Court and against which the offender has practically no recourse.

Of course, there is the one provided by the Appeal Tribunal but, as far as the administrator is concerned, it would seem that in such a case he is both lawyer and judge. He prepares everything; he decides. He supplies the evidence. The two responsibilities are combined here which, to my mind, is something rather unusual and of such a nature as to make us reflect on the extent of the powers this bill is trying to give the administrator.

Now, about the Appeal Tribunal. It can intervene only to a very limited extent. But, what is important, and this was mentioned yesterday, and I want to bring it up again, is that every effort is made to prevent the exercise of the right of appeal. First, if an order was made requiring someone to pay a certain amount, the appeal cannot be heard unless the amount has been deposited. That is the first requirement.

Secondly, if the appellant wins his case—and as I said his chances are slim—if he wins his appeal and if the Appeal Tribunal reverses the decision of the administrator, he has no right to costs. So you can imagine the conditions under which an offender will be allowed to avail himself of the rights given him here.

[English]

● (1140)

Senator Perrault: If he loses.

Senator Flynn: If he loses, of course, he should probably pay the cost. But here we are faced with a very special piece of legislation, and I am not too sure that I wouldn't agree that the costs should be allowed to the appellant, but no costs should be allowed against the appellant. As I say, this is a very exceptional situation, and all the possibilities of obtaining justice should be provided in the bill. It is rather like matters of expropriation in that there are some expropriation principles involved in this legislation.

[Senator Flynn.]

[Translation]

I wanted to point out that section 28 of the Federal Court Act restricts considerably the intervention of the Federal Court in respect of the decisions which could be taken by an administrator or the Appeal Tribunal. I think there is no need to point out that a principle of natural justice must have been breached since an order or a decision has been made through a miscarriage of the law.

Well, in the field we are dealing with at the moment, there are not many such mistakes. They almost invariably involve facts. Furthermore, any decision based on a conclusion absurdly or arbitrarily drawn from the wrong facts without due consideration for the elements which have come to one's attention may be repealed. But, once again, it is not easy to establish this in the field we are concerned with.

I would now like to say a few words about the implementation and repeal of this act.

The last section includes some odd and even peculiar provisions. Honourable senators no doubt recall my party's position on the length of time such controls should last, that is a maximum of eighteen months. But the government insists on a minimum of three years. Earlier I asked the Leader of the Government a question to find out what the attitudes of the provinces were. For example, I know that Alberta, in the legislation passed by its Parliament or Legislature, provides for a period of 18 months only. The Leader of the Government suggests that there may be others. It seems that on the radio this morning, it was said that most of the provinces are against any period exceeding eighteen months. But it is strange that the Act, in section 46 (2), provides the government with a way to extend the application of the act after 1978. To this effect, all the government has to do is to make an Order in Council and have it discussed by Parliament and if both Houses—but I will come back to this point—agree, the act is extended for the period provided in the Order in Council. In refusing obstinately the 18-month period of application, the government is being illogical. If under the procedure outlined in paragraph (2) it is allowed to extend it beyond three years, it could easily extend it beyond 18 months, should it feel it was necessary. I do not understand such stubbornness in refusing that the act apply only for 18 months, since it can be extended as provided herein.

The second remark I want to make is about the possible repeal. Here, the government makes a small concession which is quite similar to those it made previously in other acts not of the same nature, but that presented similar problems.

It is said that if a motion for consideration is tabled in the house after March 31, 1977, and before July 1, 1977, signed by not less than 50 members, to the effect that this legislation shall expire on a date before December 31, 1978, stated in the motion, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days after the motion is filed with the Speaker, consider it and dispose of it. And if this simple resolution is approved by the House of Commons alone, the act is repealed and becomes ineffective. In the other case, it is recognized that for the act to continue in force the approval of both houses is needed, but the house can unilaterally decide to repeal the act before December 31, 1978, without the approval of the Senate and the act ceases to have effect.

I wonder, honourable senators, if we can accept this formula. I think it is contrary to the bicameral principle of our parliamentary system to accept this procedure which gives the House of Commons alone the power to repeal the act before the date set for its normal, its natural termination.

Honourable senators, from what I have just said, you will realize that, in my view, and in our view on this side of the house, amendments should be made to this legislation with regard to the main points I have mentioned.

I hope that in committee there will be agreement to make those amendments to the bill. In fact, as it is, this bill is a big club in the hands of the government and particularly in the hands of the administrator. He can clobber everyone with it. I tell myself that to introduce such an arbitrary, such an authoritarian bill, the government must have lacked faith in what it was doing. That is probably the case. It did not believe in controls until it announced them. It knew that at the last election it won the approval of Canadians for not imposing controls. So, on the other hand, it did not have faith in the people. It was not confident that people would support it. That is the reason why it gave itself a club. I find this to be an extremely dangerous precedent. I hope that in committee we can take away at least from the Administrator some of the excessive powers he is given because that legislation once again, as has been said, will only succeed if the people are confident that the government is sincere. That is the basic condition. It is not by using a club that the government will manage to get the support of the people.

It is important, honourable senators, that we try to take out of that legislation the aspects that are absolutely irritating, restrictive, contrary to individual freedom, and the government should instead make an effort to offset this by showing sincerity, conviction. That is the only way for it to get the support of the people. That is the only way for it to succeed with its price and wage control program.

● (1150)

[English]

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, in following this debate I read the contributions made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and Senator Asselin. I heard the contributions made yesterday in addition, of course, to that which I have heard today. It seems to me that it was worth bringing the bill forward, if for no other reason than to hear those contributions, which were spirited and well presented. I hope I will in no way diminish, before concluding my remarks, what has already been well said.

Senator Asselin, of course, made a very good speech. I started to read it, saw that he agreed in principle and thought, "Ah, this is an easy ride." As I approached the end of his remarks I realized that the politician had not left him; he said yes in principle, but not in form. In such cases,

I am always reminded of the politician who wishes to oppose a bill but is not too sure on which side he should be. First, he says it is unconstitutional. That is the very first thing he says. Who can answer that? No one can, although it may be said, "Well, he may be wrong." Next, he says, "It is not a bad idea, but you are not doing it in the right manner." Then, when the bill is finally passed and accepted, he announces, "We were for it all the time." So there he has the best of both worlds. I can only say that that speech was well presented and well spoken.

That we will experience problems with this legislation is beyond question. The questions that were asked yesterday by Senator Grosart, for instance, were extraordinarily good. I am not sure whether I should complain to the Law Society that he practised law without a licence, or have them send him a bill for an annual fee, but he did exceptionally well. Senator Smith—

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Colchester.

Senator Croll: —is, of course, the seasoned politician. He made a fine presentation. He knew exactly when to diverge, read from the bill or give an interpretation. He did it in his own style, and did it very well. I did not agree with him, but that is another matter and does not make you entirely wrong, Senator Smith.

Senator Flynn: No, not at all.

Senator Croll: Well, I am giving him a little credit.

That this bill will present problems no one will deny. We all know that Senator Flynn has some qualifications to speak in this regard, having been one of the bright boys in the days of Donald Gordon. He served as one of the legal eagles. I believe Senator Fergusson also had something to do with housing during the war. I do not know of others in this house, as I did not make inquiries. In any event, some of them lived through it, and I will relate something of my experience in the same sense. I will endeavour to discuss subjects about which I have some knowledge, of which there are a few.

When we refer to the constitutional aspect, what is the use of my standing here and telling you, "Yes, no, no, yes"? There are 11 attorneys general in this Dominion of Canada. They know what affects them and their provinces and will not let go one bit more than they must, and if they are not complaining you will get no complaints from me. I leave that entirely to them. I have my views, but that is another matter altogether.

● (1200)

Reference was made to the professions. How are we to deal with lawyers, doctors, architects, engineers and others? These people may be hurt, but this bill will not draw blood from any of those people. Insofar as doctors are concerned, I think Mr. Lalonde took care of them very well the other day when he spoke about their appeal, and what he considered to be an outrageous demand. As I understand it, they are building up a case for tomorrow, so that they can say, "Look at what we gave up, and look at what you gave us at that time." There is not much to worry about in that respect. They will go along. They always do. Whether they like it or not, they know they have a responsibility.

We were speaking about regulations. A good deal has been made about that from the other side of the house. How do we expect to get definitive regulations until the bill is passed? We have in this house at least half a dozen former federal cabinet ministers. We have half a dozen former provincial cabinet ministers, and I put myself in that category. Never in my life did I think it was possible to place a bill and the regulations on the table at the same time.

Of course, regulations are drafted by the minister's staff over a period of time, but today Senator Flynn said, "We want to make changes in the bill." He may convince the committee to make some changes in the bill—I do not know exactly what he has in mind—in which case the regulations, if made, would be meaningless. So far as I know, they have not yet been drafted. However, that is not important.

Let me tell the house why I think I know something about this. I was out of the country during the control period of the Second World War. I was here in Parliament in 1945. Senator Benidickson and I came back together. I was the only Liberal elected in the city of Toronto, surrounded by a bevy of Conservatives. There I was. What happened? It was just after the war. I came back in May, and this was in June. I was over there when the war ended, and they flew about 10 or 15 of us back to Canada. Some of us were elected and some were not. What happened? Everyone wanted the controls taken off. It did not matter whether they were members of the labour sector or whether they were business people. They all seemed to descend on me. He was the Liberal member of Parliament for Toronto and the government was a Liberal government, and they thought, "Surely he must be able to do something about controls."

Those people came from all walks of life, and they told me about the difficulties they had, and the schemes they had for getting out of them. Some of them were administrators, dollar-a-year men, capable people, and they kept telling me about this.

I went into Parliament, made a few speeches, and then I said, "Take it off." Some people in Parliament didn't agree with me. They finally talked to me and said, "Take it easy. You don't know all you think you know about this business. You have been away too long. Listen for a while"—and when C. D. Howe tells you to listen for a while, you listen for a while.

In no time they started to decontrol. That's worse than controlling—take my word for it. They had already started, and then the labour unions said, "You're going too slowly. We want more money." Before long we had a strike at Stelco at Algoma, and we couldn't afford a strike at that time because there was a great demand for our goods all over the world. We were giving credit because other people had no productive capacity. We were losing real money which we couldn't afford to lose and didn't want to lose. We were able to get in and establish markets before other people had an opportunity to do anything.

So the government immediately appointed a committee for the purpose of going through the process of seeing how we could decontrol and deal with the strike. The next day they told me, "Croll, you're on the committee." I said, "You can't; I'm against it." They said, "You will have to change

